There was a long silence. Perhaps Mrs. Grainger felt relieved that there was no other love to come between her and her darling; but she urged Horace's suit no more; only, as they rose up to retire for the night, she said, "Well, I am glad that it was Horace, and not Stephen, who loved you; for he will bear the disappointment much better than poor Stephen would have done."

It was well that Mrs. Grainger's head was turned aside, so that she did not see the glowing crimson that suffused Ruth's face and neck at these words. Not until that moment had the young girl known the secret of her own heart.

For some weeks after Mrs. Grainger had imparted to Horace—kindly and gently as the young man deserved, and as her own motherly regard for him prompted—the intelligence of the hopelessness of his love, nothing was heard of or from the Leighs. Gentle as had been Ruth's rejection of her lover, she knew how acutely he must feel it; and her heart was sorely pained at the inevitable breaking of what had been such a pleasant tie. She grew so sad, and evidently suffered so much, that one might have thought she had really loved Horace: sometimes she almost thought so herself, but when she asked her own heart the question, the answer was, "No; not him, not him!"

Ruth was returning one day down the hill, from one of her forest rambles, when she saw a horse tied at the gate of the house: she feared it was Horace's and she shrank much from meeting him; so she turned back into the wood. A few minutes after, she was overtaken not by her lover, but by Stephen. Ruth held out her hand in cordial greeting, and her old companion took it in the same spirit. The young girl was relieved to find that either Stephen knew nothing of what had passed, or else that he bore no ill-will to her for it. In a few minutes the two were walking arm-in-arm, and talking as of old.

Stephen did not mention his brother's name for some time, and when he did, it was in a passing way; but he felt Ruth's hand tremble.

"How is Horace?" she asked, her kindly nature overcoming the reserve which was natural in such a case.

"He has been ill—he is not well now," answered Stephen, looking fixedly at his companion.

The tears came into the gentle girl's eyes; Stephen noticed it, and said kindly, "Do not be sad, dear Ruth; I know all; I would not have spoken of him, but that you asked me."

"And you are not angry with me, Stephen?"

"How should I be angry? You have done no wrong. You had no power over your own heart. Indeed it was natural, brought up as we have been, that you should only feel towards us as a sister," added Stephen, with a slight sigh.

Ruth made no answer, and they came in silence to an old and favourite spot, beside a little well that sprang from the hill-side, and flowed down to the valley; in old times it had been a medicinal spring of high repute; and the peculiar nature of its waters formed curious incrustations of various hues all round the sides; so that looking down into the well was like gazing on a fairy palace below the surface, which melted away at the touch. All round the well the two boys had planted primroses and wild hyacinths, which every spring grew more abundant; a sweeter spot could not be, and so Ruth and Stephen said for the hundredth time as they came and sat down by the well. Ruth dipped her slight fingers in the water, and played with the broad primrose leaves; while Stephen, after a short silence, again referred to Horace and his disappointment.

"He does not know of my coming here to-day; but I could not bear to wait longer without seeing you and your mother. Why should this affair make any difference between us?"

"Why indeed should it?" repeated Ruth anxiously. "Such old friends as we are—" She stopped.

Stephen waited a moment, and then continued: "I do not care what Horace says. I must come here; I will not part with you too."

"I should be sorry, very sorry;" and Ruth drooped her head so that he could not see her face.

Stephen's countenance was usually calm, but now every feature seemed disturbed: and his fingers were nervously tearing in pieces a handful of primroses which he had unconsciously plucked.

"We were very happy in our childish days, Ruth," he said, with an effort. "But I knew it could not be always so; it must end at last."

"Do not talk thus," answered Ruth, turning towards him her beautiful eyes. "Let us forget all that has happened. Horace himself will forget it in time; and meanwhile let me be, to you at least, the same—your sister."

"Oh, not my sister," cried the young man impetuously, "not my sister, but my wife. I did not mean to tell you, Ruth, but I must. I love you more than ever Horace did. Do not say to me as you did to him!"

Ruth did not, for her sole answer was a gush of silent tears.

The birds sang in the forest-boughs over head; the primroses dipped their heads in the water; the sunny earth was full of gladness and melody; as if all nature rejoiced at the union of the two loving hearts, whose secret had thus suddenly and unexpectedly been discovered each to each.

Mrs. Grainger's first emotion, on hearing of the love between Ruth and Stephen, was unmitigated surprise. In such cases people often have their eyes closed to the most likely and natural events, and then wonder at their own blindness. That Ruth should have preferred the quiet Stephen—whose gentle and retiring disposition made even his acknowledged talents scarcely perceptible—to the handsome, frank, noble-spirited Horace, was the wonder of the mother; yet she herself loved Stephen best; and what marvel was it that Ruth should do so too? But, poor Horace, brooding over his disappointment in solitary bitterness! Even the hearts of the happy lovers often ached for him, and they trembled for the time when the truth should come to his knowledge. It did come at last: for in like circumstances "a bird of the air will carry the matter." Fearful to witness was the wrath and despair of the unfortunate young man; he loaded with opprobrious epithets his regretful though innocent brother, who, pitying Horace, and almost reproaching him as the unwitting cause of such misery, had not a word to Stephen left his brother's house for ever, and the direct en took the place of that fraternal regard which had hitherto existed between them.

"Man proposes—God disposes!"

was an old and pious rhyme of our ancestors, and oh! true! Whether it was from the conflicting feelings which troubled Ruth's gentle bosom—the sorrow which was with her love—or whether from inherent delicacy, which needed some trifling cause to blight her youth and beauty, could tell; but she drooped even in the midst of her happiness as Stephen's plighted wife; he did not see it, nor did mother, until every one else knew that she was dying. A little more than a year from the time when Ruth had promised to be his own, Stephen laid his bride in the cold arms of death.

It is hardly sad when the aged depart—nor even the young when we know there is no more joy for them in this life; but when they die, as Ruth, with a future full of hope and love before them, in the midst of love and happiness, it is very bitter! Poor human nature clings to visible things, and to the unseen joys of immortality. We cannot bear to lose the light of our eyes, to lay our beloved down from our arms, to see happiness which we ourselves have not yet tasted, and know through faith; and faith itself grows weak some-when they die, as Ruth, with a future full of hope and love before them, in the midst of love and happiness, it is very bitter! Poor human nature clings to visible things, and to the unseen joys of immortality. We cannot bear to lose the light of our eyes, to lay our beloved down from our arms, to see happiness which we ourselves have not yet tasted, and know through faith; and faith itself grows weak some-

No wonder then, that when Stephen closed the eyes of his loved, and laid her form down from his bosom, where so softly breathed her life away, to its immovable repose, as if life was all darkness to him.

Of the widow's anguish, thus bereaved of her only child, dare not speak; God only knows the grief of a mother who has lost her only child.

It was a bleak autumn day when Ruth—no, not Ruth, the clay which had garmented her loving and gentle form was carried to its resting-place in the forest church-yard. Brown withered leaves drifted down on the white pall of the coffin was borne through the woods. Tears fell from the eyes of the holy words were uttered, and then all the departed, and Stephen Leigh was left alone with his dead heart was well nigh broken as he looked on the wide landscape seen from the hill church-yard, where many a Sunday Horace and Ruth had stood together; a dim autumn morn-creeping over it now, and it chilled his very soul. The all three so happy once, and now there was nothing but estrangement and death. Who had done this? Not he, Horace was as much to be pitied as himself—it might be yet grief had put bitterness in even Stephen's heart, at thought of his brother his hands clenched involuntarily knelt down on the grave, to drive away all thought save who was gone.

He remained many minutes without moving, and then looked up Horace was standing opposite to him. Motioned passed since the brothers had met; both were changed; fearfully so; he stood there immovable, his features and still as marble, and marked all over with deep anguish.

Stephen rose up, shocked at the expression of his face; and both stood gazing at each other in silence. The elder said, in a tone that made Stephen shudder: "away! You have no right to her now."

"I will not go," answered his brother. "My place is here. Why do you come to trouble me?"

"Go away!" Horace repeated more violently. "You have taken her from me; you deceived me; and now you would drive me away from her grave."

"I never did you wrong, Horace," said Stephen, to command himself and speak calmly. "I did not even love her till afterwards. I never stole her away from you. What sin was it if Ruth loved me?"

"Liar! How dare you mention her name?" cried Horace in a violent rage. "You have sinned, and you are requited. Have lost her for ever; she is mine now as much as I. Once more I say, go away from hence! You have no right to her even at her grave. But for her I would stay where you stand."

"I will save you that wickedness," said Stephen, gentler and not easily roused spirit grew calm in proportion as he saw his brother's anger increase. "It shall not be: we two contended even over Ruth's grave. I will strive with you no more for her sake." And he turned and went from the spot. As he reached the little gate of the church he looked round; Horace had flung himself beside the mound of earth, with his arms round it, and the strong frame quivered like that of a weeping child.

Stephen Leigh went home to his adopted mother, for promised Ruth to be to Mrs. Grainger as a son. Hence he took up his abode at the Hill Farm, and fulfilled towards his widow all the duties of a child of her own. This had Ruth's dying wish, and it was a comfort to both the bereaved ones.

Years passed, and no change took place, save that the widow's frame became feebler; and she talked with a more solemn yet joyful earnestness of meeting Ruth again. Stephen Leigh advanced towards middle age, becoming more immersed than ever in study; but he never thought of marriage. He had loved Ruth too well ever to love another; still his heart was as full of goodness and tenderness as in his youthful days; and no son or daughter, not even the lost one herself, could have soothed and cherished with more affectionate care the widow's declining years.

Upon Horace the blighting of his hopes had a different effect. Happy love might have conquered the errors of his nature, and made his brighter qualities shine forth; but misfortune worked otherwise on his character. Passionate in all his feelings, intense love changed into violent hatred, and the object of it was, as might be expected, his brother Stephen. Though living within a few miles of each other, the brothers seldom met; or, if they did, they met, as it were, in the presence of the dead.

Church Review and Ecclesiastical Register.

This Quarterly Magazine is devoted to the exposition and defence of the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church; to the promotion of an elevated Christian Literature, and to a faithful record of important Ecclesiastical, University and Missionary intelligence from all parts of the world. The effort to establish the Church Review has been warmly commended by a large number of the Bishops and Presbyters of the Church.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"The Editors of this journal have abundant ability and as much of industry; and we doubt not they will fill out their plan of usefulness to the cause of the Church, and of soundness in all good things."—Gospel Messenger.
"This Number has fully realised our highest expectations. It shows a degree of ability and sound judgment on the part of the Editors, which afford good promise that this Review will be a credit to the Church, and take rank among the ablest periodicals in the country. The Ecclesiastical Register is a new feature, and quite as useful as it is novel."—Witness and Churchman.
"It promises to be conducted with signal taste and ability."—Literary World.
"Should these misgivings [as to support, and concerning which the Editor need have no fears] prove to be unfounded, we shall be among the first to rejoice in the high and honorable career before it."—Protestant Churchman.

ly have brought, it is needless to say. She was one of those ministering angels who work by unseen but all powerful means; living to do good. At last Horace bore her visits with patience, almost with pleasure: he suffered her to do with him as she chose; and by degrees even endured to hear her speak of Stephen; but no arguments, no entreaties, could soften his inveterate hatred, or induce him to see or pardon his brother.

"You never injured me," he would say; "I was wrong to anger against you. I am sorry if I have caused you pain; no power on earth shall ever make me forgive him."

The widow dared not say that if forgiveness were needed, it was equally on Stephen's side. Oftentimes her heart failed; and at last her anxiety, and her frequent journeyings to visit her brother—for he never would come to her—proved too much for her aged frame. Mrs. Grainger was laid on a sick bed, from which she knew she would never rise.

When she felt her strength failing her, the widow sent a messenger to Horace Leigh.

"Tell him," she said, "that he will see me no more unless he comes, and quickly too; and that Ruth's mother cannot die in peace without speaking to him again."

There was a long struggle between Horace's pride and anger, and his long-smothered but still sincere love for one who had been as a mother to him. At last his better angel conquered, and peace came.

He had feared to see his brother, but Stephen was not there; Mrs. Grainger had sent him away, lest his presence might even rouse the evil spirit in Horace's heart. He saw nothing of the place where he had been once so happy, and the dying mother of Ruth.

"Thank you Horace," she said feebly, stretching out her hand; "this is good of you."

Horace clasped that withered hand—he was too deeply moved to speak.

"I wanted to say something to you," she continued; "will you not do one kindness towards me? I shall never ask more." "Anything—anything—but one," cried Horace. "Do not let me speak to Stephen."

The widow half raised herself from her pillow, and looked at him.

"Horace Leigh," she said slowly and solemnly, "I took you for your brother from the arms of your dead mother—the mother of both. I filled her place as far as another could do towards you. It was my child you both loved—which caused that deadly enmity between you. Do you think that my gentle heart would welcome her mother in heaven, if I have to tell her that the two she loved best here, one as a betrothed husband, and one as a brother—for as such she did indeed love you, Horace—that they were living in hatred towards one another on earth?"

The widow stopped from exhaustion; Horace had fallen on his knees before her; his head was bowed upon his clasped hands, but he made no answer. Mrs. Grainger laid her hand gently on his shoulder.

"Horace, my dear Horace, listen to the mother of the girl you loved; let me tell Ruth, that for her sake you gave up your anger."

"But he hates me too; and I will not ask forgiveness, I will not be the first to yield," muttered Horace.

There was a movement at the half-open door, and Stephen entered; but Horace did not see him until he felt his hand taken gently, and heard his brother say in low tones, with eyes full of tears—

"I do not hate you, Horace; I will be the first to say, Brother, forgive me—let us be friends!"

"My children, my children, forgive one another," said the dying woman faintly. They were her last words.

Hand in hand, the reconciled brothers knelt beside the couch of Ruth's mother, and watched her during the long hours of night, which she passed in unconscious lethargy, until the spirit fled on the wings of sunrise.

Horace and Stephen Leigh followed the remains of the aged widow to the grave, and saw her laid beside Ruth in the churchyard on the hill-side. Then they returned home—to a home which was henceforth to be the same for both brothers. They never spoke of the past, but lived together as though it had never been. They were not rivals now, for they knew that death sanctifieth all things, and that in heaven "there is neither marrying nor giving in marriage."

Under the willow tree was placed a stone, with Ruth's name and age, and that of her mother. Below the latter was engraved this line from the Holy Book—

"Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God."

The Jewels.

A TRADITION OF THE RABBINS.

The celebrated teacher, Rabbi Meir, sat during the whole of the Sabbath-day in the public school, instructing the people. During his absence from his house his two sons died, both of them of uncommon beauty, and enlightened in the law. His wife bore them to her bed-chamber, laid them upon the marriage-bed, and spread a white covering over their bodies. In the evening Rabbi Meir came home—"Where are my two sons," he asked, "that I may give them my blessing? I repeatedly looked round the school, and I did not see them there." He reached to him a goblet; he praised the Lord at the going out of the Sabbath, drank, and again asked—"Where are my sons, that they too may drink of the cup of blessing?" "They will not be far off," she said, and placed food before him that he might eat.—He was in a glad and genial mood, and when he had said grace after the meal, she thus addressed him:—"Rabbi, with thy permission I would fain propose to thee one question." "Ask it then, my love!" he replied. "A few days ago a person entrusted some jewels to my custody, and now he demands them again; should I give them back again?" "This is a question," said Rabbi Meir, which my wife should not have thought it necessary to ask. "What, wouldst thou hesitate or be reluctant to restore to every one his own?" "No," she replied; "but yet I thought it best not to restore them without acquainting thee therewith." She then led him to the chamber, and stepping to the bed, took the white covering off the dead bodies. "Ah, my sons, my sons!" thus loudly lamented the father; "my sons, the light of mine eyes and the light of my understanding; I was your father, but ye were my teachers in the law." The mother turned away and wept bitterly. At length she took her husband by the hand, and said, "Rabbi, didst thou not teach me that we must not be reluctant to restore that which was entrusted to our keeping? See, the Lord gave, the Lord has taken away, and blessed be the name of the Lord!" "Blessed be the name of the Lord!" echoed Rabbi Meir, "and blessed be his name for thy sake too; for well it is written, 'Whoso hath found a virtuous wife, hath a greater treasure than costly pearls; she openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness;'"—The Church.

The Spring.

FROM A DISCOURSE ON EASTER SUNDAY, APRIL 16, A.D. 383.

All nature now moves on in unison with our festivity, and rejoices in common with our joy. Behold the face of things. The queen of the seasons unfolds her pageantry to the queen of day; presenting from her native store whatever is most beautiful, whatever is most delightful. Now is the canopy of heaven cloudless; the sun rides higher in his course, raying out a more golden lustre; brighter is the circle of the moon, and purer the chorus of the stars; more pacific now, the waves murmur on the shore; the tempest is allayed; soft are the whispers of the breeze; genial is the earth to the opening flowrets, and grateful the flowrets to our eyes. Released from winter's tyranny, more limpid flow the fountains, in streams more copious the rivers; gay is the blossom on the plant, and sweet the fragrance of the meadow; the herbage is cropped by the cattle, the lambs disport on the blooming plains.

The vessel now rides forth majestic from the harbour, accompanied with shouts, for the most part shouts of gratitude; and is winged with its sails.—The dolphin glides on the bosom of the waters, dashing the silvery foam around, and following with alacrity, the mariner.

Now doth the husbandman prepare his implements of tillage raising his eye to heaven, and invoking Him who makes the fruitage flourish. How jocund he leads his oxen to the yoke! How patiently he cuts the prolific furrow, while hope sits smiling on his countenance!

The shepherd and the herdsman attune their reeds, meditating the rural strain, and revel with the Spring, in the grotto or the grove. The gardener now more anxiously tends his plants; the fowler renews his snare; inspects the branches, and curiously explores the flying of the bird. The fisherman sits on the summit of the rock, surveys the deep and repairs his net.

Again the assiduous bee, spreading wide her wings, and ascending from the pine demonstrates her native skill, skims o'er the meads and rifles the flowers of their sweets. One labours at the honey-comb, constructing the cells, hexagonal and mutually opposed; while another lays up the delicious store, providing for him who builds her a habitation, refection sweet, and sustenance untold for. Oh! that we could resemble them; we who have received so wondrous an example of industry and wisdom! Again the bird fabricates his nest; and one returns, and another enters the new-formed mansion, while a third traverses the air, and bids the forest re-echo to his harmonies, and greets the passenger with a song.

Even the inanimate part of the creation hymns and glorifies its Maker with a silent homage. For every thing which I behold, I magnify my God; and thus their hymn, from whom I have derived my melody, becomes my own.—From the writings of St. Gregory Nazianzen, Archbishop of Constantinople, who was born 328 after Christ, and died 390. The Book of the Fathers, p. 108.

Insubordination.

No enlightened Patriot or Christian can reflect upon the "signs of the times" without mingled feelings of hope and fear. Hope—that public opinion, rightly directed, may promote the social and spiritual condition of mankind, lest a spirit of insubordination lead to excess and infidelity.

Already has that vile dogma "vox populi, vox Dei" been revived. A decided tendency to rationalism is also apparent. But (however mortifying to the pride of man) past experience proves that there is a bound to the sway of Reason, and there is a Sovereign Will to which it must submit.

This seed is most prolific of those sown by the enemy in the human heart.—The cause of his own overthrow and misery, he seeks thus to effect the ruin of others.

It were wise to remember that personal ambition induced the first act of rebellion in Heaven and on earth! and is it not still the cause of many of those evils that disturb the peace of society and plant in man's own bosom his worst enemies? How admirably has the Church provided for this evil tendency in all Her goodly services, but more especially in that "form of sound words," the Church Catechism—a treasure of inestimable value. By it are we taught the duty of obedience, submission, and love as expressed in that excellent compendium of gospel truth, "our duty towards God, and our duty towards our neighbour!" which good Bishop Patrick said should be the subject of daily meditation.

The conservative influence of the Church must be apparent to every unprejudiced mind—and may we not trust that "all who profess and call themselves Christians may be led into the way of truth" and find within Her pale safety and peace.

The inspired Prophet has said—"It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth" as applying to our worldly estate—and our blessed Saviour, knowing full well that our deceitful hearts would prompt us to abuse the "liberty wherewith He hath made us free"—says—"Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls"—and does not Christian experience attest that His "yoke is easy, and His burden is light?" S.

Will some one of our learned readers oblige us by answering the following?—

MR. EDITOR:—Do me the favor to give room in your paper for an inquiry for the authorship of the following lines. I have no other clue to give than this, that they were in print as long ago as 1766.

"When e'er I ask'd for blessings on your head,
Nothing was cold or formal that I said;
My warmest vows to heaven were made for thee,
And love still mingled with my piety."

Sentences from Bishop Taylor.

"Few men dare reprove a potent sinner: he shall be flattered every day and seldom counseled."

"The Devil is more busy to disturb our prayers, than to hinder anything else."

"Habits are the daughters of action."

"See that your alms do not other men wrong; and let them do what they can to thyself, they will never prejudice thee by their abundance; but then be also careful that the pretences of justice do not cozen thyself of thy charity, and the poor of thine, and thy soul of the reward. He that is in debt is not excused from giving alms till his debts are paid, but only from giving away such portions which should and would pay them, and which he intended should do it."

"Plenty and pleasures are not the proper instruments of felicity. Felicity is not a jewel that can be locked in one man's cabinet. God intended that all men should be made happy, and He that gave to all men the same natural desires, and to all men provision of satisfactions by the same meats and drinks, intended that it should not go beyond that measure of good things, which corresponds to those desires that all men naturally have."

"Whoever is contented with poverty, is rich. Not he who hath little, but he who desires more than he hath, is the poor man."

"A man must labor infinitely to get more than he needs; but to drive away thirst and hunger, a man needs not to sit in the fields of the oppressed poor, nor lead armies, nor break his sleep."

"If men knew what felicity dwells in the cottage of a virtuous poor man, how sound he sleeps, how quiet his breast, how composed his mind, how free from care, how easy his position, how moist his month, how joyful his heart—they would never admire the noises, and the diseases, the throng of passions, and the violence of unnatural appetites, that fill the houses of the luxurious, and the heart of the ambitious."

"Health is the opportunity of wisdom, the fairest scene of religion, the advantages of the glorifications of God, the charitable ministries to men—it is a state of joy and thanksgiving, and in every of its period feels a pleasure from the blessed emanations of a merciful providence. Health carries us to church, and makes us rejoice in the communion of saints."

"Mary was commended for choosing the better part, yet Mary had done worse, if she had been at the foot of her Master, when she should have relieved a perishing brother. Martha was troubled with much serving; that was more than need, and therefore she was to blame; and sometimes hearing in some circumstances may be more than needs: and some women are troubled with overmuch hearing, and then they had better have been serving the necessities of their house."—St. Lu. 10: 39—42.

"Any thing can be done by him, that earnestly desires what he ought. Secure but your affections and passions, and then no temptation will be too strong. A wise man, and a full resolution, and an earnest spirit, can do anything of duty."

"We hate to see any man flattered but ourselves; and we can endure folly if it be on our side, and a sin for our interest."

"If we consider it wisely, we shall find, that in many good actions the flesh is the bigger ingredient, and we betray our weak constitutions, even when we do justice or charity, and many men pray in the flesh, when they pretend they pray in the spirit."

"Most men choose the sin, if it be once disputable whether it be a sin or no?"

"We say we had rather die than lose our faith, and yet we do not live according to it. We lose our estates and are impatient: we lose our virtue and bear it well enough."

"The heart never can rejoice and be secure—be pleased and be at rest, but when it dwells with holiness: the joys that come from thence are safe and great—unchangeable, healthful and holy."

ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE DIOCESE OF PENNSYLVANIA.—

The Convention met at 9 o'clock. After prayers the Minutes of the preceding Session were read, and with some amendments, approved.

On motion of William Welsh, Esq., it was Resolved, that there be no further balloting at the present Convention for members of the Standing Committee, and Delegates to the General Convention, and Treasurers of Convention and Episcopal Funds.

Consequently, according to the Canon, the Standing Committee and Delegates to the General Convention, &c., as elected last year, hold their office for another year.

On motion it was Resolved, that several Churches which had not, for some time, complied with the provision of the constitution, by sending Delegates or reporting to the Convention, be informed by the Secretary that they had forfeited this right.

The Rev. Mr. Davis moved the dividing of the Diocese into twelve Missionary Districts; and that a Committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of so doing. Adopted.

The following Committee was appointed.

Rev. Mr. Davis,	Mr. J. M. Aertsen,
Dr. Upfold,	Parry,
Mr. Natt,	Wheeler,
Mr. Hilton,	Sheafe,
Mr. Colton,	Day.

The Rev. Mr. Davis moved that Parochial reports state the number of children prepared by their parents, and guardians in the bounds of each Parish, to be publicly catechised—the number of poor belonging to each Parish, and the number of baptized persons in each Parish who neglect the worship of Almighty God and what means are employed to reform them.

This motion was debated, and finally laid on the table.

The delegates of several churches were admitted. Zion Church, Tuscarora; The Church of the Holy Apostles, St. Clair, Schuylkill county; St. Mark's and the Church of the Mediator, both of Philadelphia; St. Jude's, Spring Garden; St. Mark's, Northumberland.

On motion, a part of the unfinished business in relation to the admission of Lay Deacons, was taken up. After a brief debate, it was laid on the table.

It was moved to take up the Report of the Committee in relation to a Church Building Society. The motion was not carried.

The Rev. J. M. Douglass moved to take up the question in relation to "the African Church of St. Thomas." According to a Rule of order, it was necessary that notice should be given on the day previous, of any proposed change in the Revised Regulations of Rules of order.

The Rev. Mr. Leaf who gave such notice on this subject the day before, stated that without any change in his own views on the subject, he had, for prudential reasons, and on account of the solicitations of his brethren, resolved not to press his motion. It was decided that a notice of this kind could only be used by the individual who gave it. So the subject was dropped.

The Rev. Mr. Harris moved the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That to call the attention of the members of the church in this Diocese, to the duty of providing more ample free sittings—a committee be appointed to consider and report how this duty may be most effectually and wisely discharged.

Rev. Mr. Harris, Rev. Mr. Odenheimer, Messrs. W. Welch, Richard R. Montgomery, R. C. Biddle, were appointed said committee.

On motion, it was Resolved, that $300 be appropriated from Convention fund to pay the mileage of the members of the Convention—and also, that the travelling expenses of the Bishop be paid, provided they do not exceed $350.

The order of the day was now taken up, viz., the recommendations of the Committee upon the proposed alterations in the Canons and Constitution, as found in the following Report.

The Committee appointed at the last Diocesan Convention. (see Journal p. 78,) to consider and report on proposed alterations of the Constitution, and also to consider and report on a proposed alteration of the 9th Canon of the Church in this Diocese, (see Journal, p. 80,) beg leave to report:—

That, in the opinion of your Committee, the proposed alteration of the 9th Canon would be inexpedient.

They also think that the amendment proposed of the 7th article of the Constitution, (see Journal p. 77,) would not be expedient.

In reference to the proposition for amending the 6th article of the Constitution, (see Journal, p. 78,) your Committee would respectfully recommend the following resolution, viz.:—

Resolved, That the first three lines of the second paragraph of the 6th article of the Constitution be stricken out, and in place thereof, there be inserted as follows:—

"All officers and committees appointed by ballot must, in order to their election, receive a majority of the whole number of votes cast at such election by each order, provided that there shall be no election unless there are present at the time a majority of the clerical members and a majority of the lay representations, who shall have appeared during the session and been admitted to seats; and such election, excepting that of the secretary and assistant secretary of the Convention, shall be held at five o'clock in the afternoon of the second day of the session."

Your Committee do not deem it expedient to recommend any further alterations of the Constitution.

All which is respectfully submitted.

A. POTTER, Chairman.

Philadelphia, May 16th, 1848.

James S. Smith, Esq. explained the provisions of the above Report. Whereupon the first two recommendations of the Committee were adopted without opposition.

The proposed amendment to the Constitution was then taken up, and became the subject of a long debate. Various amendments were proposed. Those adopted were offered by Mr. Wharton and Judge Stroud.

The first moved the insertion of the words "excepting the secretary and assistant secretary" after the words "no election" in the 7th line.

Judge Stroud moved the following. Which was adopted.

"And provided also, that if no such majority of the clerical members and lay representatives be present, or if the election shall not be completed, such election shall be postponed until the next day at 10 A. M., when the same shall be proceeded in without regard to the number present."

The original resolution thus amended and with some other verbal alterations, was carried and laid over for the action of the next Convention.

The Rev. Dr. Coleman moved to lay the remaining order of the day on the table. Adopted.

James S. Smith, Esq. moved the following as an amendment to Canon IX.

CANON IX.

Of the Standing Committee, (page 28 of the edition of 1844.)

Strike out the first section, and substitute the following therefor.

Section First.—The Standing committee shall consist of five of the clergy and five of the laity, who shall be chosen by the Convention by ballot, by the concurrent vote of the members of each order. At the first meeting of the said committee after their election in the year the members shall be divided by lot into five classes; each class to consist of one clerical and one lay member. The seats of the members of the first class, shall be vacated at the expiration of the first year,—of the second class at the expiration of the second year,—of the third class at the expiration of the third year,—of the fourth class at the expiration of the fourth year,—and of the fifth class at the expiration of the fifth year; so that after the year one-fifth of the said committee may be chosen every year by the Convention.

Vacancies occurring by death or otherwise, in the said committee shall be supplied by the concurrent vote of the remaining clerical and lay members of the committee;—the person elected by them to continue in office until the next stated Convention, and until another is chosen by the convention for the unexpired time of the member whose seat had been filled by the Standing Committee.]

After some discussion this amendment being voted on was lost.

It was resolved that the next Convention be held in St. Andrew's Church, Philadelphia, on the third Tuesday in May, 1849.

On motion, it was resolved that seven hundred and fifty copies of the Journal of the Convention be printed, and that one copy be sent to each of the parishes.

Resolved, That one hundred and fifty extra copies of the Bishop's address be printed, for circulation among the clergy of the different churches.

The Rev. Dr. Bull moved to take up the following report offered by him as a member of the committee on "the constitution and canons."

Proposed instead of Article Fourth of the Constitution of this Diocese.

SEC. I. The Convention shall be composed of clergymen and laymen. The Bishop and assistant Bishop, shall have a seat and vote in Convention. Every clergyman of the church, of whatever order, if he has been actually and personally, as well as canonically resident in this diocese, for the space of calendar months, next before the meeting of the Convention; Deacons ordained under the 5th Canon of 45 of General Convention excepted, shall be entitled to a seat and vote in this Convention: Provided that any temporary absence, by reason of sickness, and any absence not exceeding two calendar months in one year, and any further absence, with the written permission of the ecclesiastical authority of the diocese, shall be taken into account in computing the said residence.

SEC. II. No church shall be admitted a member of this Convention, which does not by its charter or articles of association expressly recognize and accede to the constitution and canons; the doctrine of the church as set forth in her articles, and the discipline and worship of the church, as set forth in the Liturgy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in this diocese.

SEC. III. Each regularly established Protestant Episcopal church in this diocese, now a member, or which shall hereafter be admitted a member of the Convention, may send to the Convention lay deputy, provided that no person shall be competent to serve as a deputy, unless he has been a professing member and worshipper in the church he represents calendar months next before his election.

LEVI BULL.

The Convention not wishing to enter at this late period into a long discussion, and a motion being made that it adjourn sine die after the present session, decided not to enter into this question. At Dr. Bull's request the vote was taken "by orders," and being lost by a large majority of the clerical vote against it, the lay vote was not taken.

The Bishop appointed as a Committee on the state of the Church, Rev. Mr. Suddards, Rev. Dr. Dorr, Rev. Mr. Newton, Messrs. J. S. Newbold and Hoskins.

On motion of Dr. Upfold, it was resolved to adjourn sine die after the usual religious exercises.

The minutes of the session were read by the Secretary, George M. Wharton, Esq., and approved.

The Bishop made then a most impressive and earnest address to the Convention, which was heard by the members all standing.

For the following brief summary of the Bishop's address, we are indebted to the Pennsylvania Inquirer.

The Bishop observed that he would make a few remarks to the Convention, suggested partly by reading the minutes, and partly by the occurrences of the morning in the Convention—pertaining to his own duties in part, partly to the co-relative duties of this House (the Convention,) and the spirit in which the proceedings were conducted. He regarded the Chair merely as the organ of the Meeting—and that as President, it was his duty to give the fullest latitude to the expression of opinion and principle, on all subjects brought under discussion—in the proper way. And the chair knew of no rules in so doing, except the established and recognized constitutional rules for the Government of the Convention—the rules of order—and the maxims, laws and precedents that were recognized as the landmarks of similar Parliamentary bodies. The great purposes to be obtained—freedom and order in discussion—would most certainly be acquired, if those rules were rigidly adhered to. Therefore, if a question of order arose, he, the chairman, would always take an early opportunity of deciding upon it—even if not quite satisfied on every minute point of its bearings—because, by so doing, he opened all the merits of such point of order, by affording parties an opportunity of discussing the matter, in an appeal from the decision of the chair. But happily, difficult and doubtful points of order, did not very frequently arise. He had, to a certain extent, dwelt on a rigid adherence to the rules of order—but it should be remembered that we were a band of Christian brethren, as ready, and even more ready to recognize fraternal concession and conciliation, than to render appeals to the rigid rules of order necessary.

With regard to the expediency of admitting the discussion of a subject, not palatable always, perhaps, to a majority of the Convention, he would submit that the purposes of peace, truth and justice would be promoted by allowing a large latitude of debate. It may suit a doctrine of a temporary expediency, that such a matter should be postponed; but then, no earthly power could prevent its being brought forward at the next Convention.

tion. No danger could come from a fair, open and temperate discussion—but Christian feeling might be impaired by excluding it—and as “your father—my brethren—as one of your brethren—it appears to me that some regard might be paid to this feeling.” He was aware that in the freedom, and sometimes the impatience of debate, such things would occur, though never meant—and he threw out these views on the latitude of discussion and the salutary restraints of order, knowing that they would sink deep into the hearts of all, for the promotion, he hoped and believed, of a spirit of Christian love and unity.

After singing part of the 99th Psalm, and the offering of appropriate Prayer by the Bishop, the Convention adjourned with the Apostolic benediction.

DIOCESAN CONVENTIONS.—We give above the concluding account of the CONVENTION OF THE DIOCESE OF PENNSYLVANIA. In several accounts we think the members of this Diocese have cause to regard this Convention with satisfaction. All its discussions were marked by moderation, good feeling, and mutual forbearance. There was an evident disposition not to rush matters, which excited opposite feelings, to extremes. There was also a wise desire not to urge unnecessary measures or to admit needless legislation. Above all there was manifest a firm determination not to prolong the session of the Convention beyond the time required for the transaction of its proper business. The Convention seemed wisely determined not to resolve itself into a Debating Society. Out of this firm, wise, and determined resolve, or rather from a misapprehension of it, grew the only matter which called forth any feeling in this convention, and this we trust was only a momentary excitement, to subside under the calming influence of cool reflection. A measure of some importance being proposed at a late period of the Convention, this body refused to hear the subject discussed, because of their apprehension that a long debate would ensue. If one side was heard of course the other must be listened to. This decision was regarded by the mover as an infringement of his individual rights. But surely if individuals have rights, bodies composed of individuals have rights also. And a plain right of a deliberative and legislative body, assembled for the solemn object of considering the welfare of a portion of the church, is to decide what subjects shall or shall not be discussed before it. And if every, or any member has a right to introduce every or any subject, and give his private views thereon, our Diocesan Conventions must meet for weeks instead of days. As expressing the known opinions and feelings of many who voted against the proposed discussion, we utterly deny that any disrespect was intended, or any injury done to the member, for the sake of hearing whose views the Convention was not willing to hold another session.

As this is “the month of Conventions,” we may be excused for adding a word upon this important practical subject. In doing so we pretend not to speak ex cathedra, we utter only the opinions of an individual. We are convinced that further experience will add strength to the opinion, already a growing one, that our Diocesan Conventions are too frequent. We will state very briefly our reasons for this opinion.

1. The assembling of Conventions more frequently than the wants of the Church absolutely demand, imposes a needless expense upon the Clergy. This is more especially true in our larger Dioceses, wherein the remoter Clergy are thus burdened with a very inconvenient outlay of their scanty means.

2. It does injury to the Parishes, by leaving a large portion vacant for one or more Sundays every year. And this in new Parishes is not a small evil. And at least two additional Missionaries could be in part supported by the annual contributions to the Convention Fund.

3. Frequent Conventions, and this is the greatest evil of all, encourage unnecessary legislation. If there was more of law-keeping and less of law making among us, the Church would be better off. There is much of wisdom and just application in the following remarks, in the Christian Remembrancer, called forth by the Journal of the last General Convention.—“Were we disposed to be critical, we should regret in our daughter-church an over anxiety to be legislating. De minimis non curat lex, is a good maxim. Perpetual revisions cannot meet every possible case; and we suspect that what the United States wants, is rather a recognition of the principles of the settled ecclesiastical law of our universal Christendom, than an over anxious solicitude to meet, or to anticipate, difficulties in their isolated shape.”—(P. 520.) We think this over anxiety to be legislating, is the consequence of frequent Conventions. Whenever men meet in a legislative capacity they will not forego the exercise of their functions. And when so many minds are so often brought to think legislatively of our ecclesiastical laws, they will be sure to find some scope for their legislative propensities.

4. Another great practical evil, resulting from frequent Conventions, is the frequent elections resulting. The most unimportant offices are not filled without a conflict of opinions.—

Feelings are thus, for little cause, excited, and contests arise which stir up and keep alive flames which else might die out for want of aliment. Churchmen might almost forget, or at least lose sight of their differences were not our constantly recurring Conventions perpetual memorials. If these assemblies occurred every third year there would be too much real business to admit of over legislation, or needless discussion, or conflicts about trifling differences.

It is said on the other hand, that these frequent meetings of Clergy are beneficial. Well, let all such as can conveniently, meet with their Bishop, in convocation, once each year—but let our Diocesan Conventions meet only every third year before the General Convention.

These views, though expressed by an individual, are not so restricted in their acceptance. Many in the Church hold them in theory, we hope, and venture to predict, that the day is not far distant when they will be reduced to practice.

EPISCOPAL FEMALE INSTITUTE.—We refer our readers to the notice of this school, which will be found among our advertisements. That such an institution is much needed in our city none will deny. It is just as important that our day schools should be under proper religious influence, as that our boarding-schools should be thus happily controlled. The great success which has attended “the Protestant Episcopal Academy” for boys, is an earnest that a well conducted school for girls, under ecclesiastical supervision, will be well supported. The interest taken in this school by the Bishop of the Diocese, and the established character of the Principal, will commend it to patronage. The situation is an excellent one, and brings it within the reach of a large part of the city.

CORRECTION.—In our notice of the Bishop White Prayer Book Society, which was of course a hurried one, and a part of which we had no opportunity to correct, the two last names of the Board of Managers, were wrongly given. They should have been printed Messrs. T. WAGNER and J. R. WILMER. These are names which we would be the last to change for any others.

The brevity of our account also prevented a due notice of the sermon, which was a most instructive and able one. Its appropriate subject was the PRAYER BOOK, A MONUMENT OF THE TRUTHS OF THE GOSPEL.

We deeply regretted that owing to the late hour at which the Convention adjourned, the imperfect notice of the time of this meeting, and some other causes, this admirable sermon and the exercises of this Church institution had so few auditors.

We also omitted to state that the Bishop of the Diocese, notwithstanding the arduous duties of the day, presided.

Rev. Mr. Odenheimer.
PASTORAL FAITHFULNESS.—Among our communications will be found a most interesting one showing how truly the gospel is preached to the poor in the afflicted Church of Ireland. The article headed “Pastoral Counsel to a Servant,” for which we are indebted to “Sacerdos,” is but one of many similar cases which have come to our private knowledge. We speak what we do know when we say that we think honestly and truly that the pastoral office, in the richness and fullness of its blessed design, is nowhere on earth more faithfully developed than in the Church of Ireland.

We take this occasion to say that we fear that our pastoral duty is not fully discharged to the poor members of this flock who seek a refuge among us. The state is more merciful to them than the Church! The former offers them freely and nobly every privilege. They find a welcome and a home in her, while the Church of which they are members suffers them to wander as sheep having no shepherd. Each of our larger cities should have a Missionary to whom the special care of these poor strangers might be assigned. If means for his support could not be obtained among us, though we think they could and should be so obtained, no doubt upon proper representation the Church of England and Ireland would not refuse to assist in such an object. From our Diocesan Intelligence it will be seen that a clergyman has gone to England to obtain help for such a mission in New York. We wish him all success.

The corner-stone of the Church of the Ascension, Gloucester Point, New Jersey, will be laid on Friday afternoon at 5 o'clock by the Bishop of the Diocese. The Clergy and friends of the church in the vicinity are invited to attend.

WEBSTER'S AMERICAN DICTIONARY.—Price reduced to Six Dollars. The entire work unabridged, in one volume, crown quarto Revised and improved by Professor C. A. Goodrich, of Yale College. For a fuller account of this work, see advertisement, which contains also strong recommendations from high authority. We ask attention for the following communication.

WORTHY OF IMITATION.—The School Committee of the town of Bradford, Mass., have recently recommended that a copy of Webster's Dictionary, (Quarto Unabridged,) be placed in each of the principal schools, for the use of those pupils sufficiently advanced to be benefited by it, and as a book of reference for the teacher. To obtain an intimate knowledge of our own language, which we are to use in the transaction of business, or the enjoyments of every waking hour of life, is one of the principal objects of school education. What benefit of equal magnitude, at so small expense, can be placed within the reach of the rising generation? Many intelligent, active-minded children, whose parents are too poor to provide the work for their families, may thus have access to the fountain-head of the English Language. Teachers too, whose limited pecuniary means and scanty compensation, prevents them from reaping the advantages the work is designed to impart, would not only be greatly improved themselves, but would be so much better qualified to instruct their pupils that it would amply repay the comparatively trifling expense.

WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY IN ENGLAND.—The crown quarto edition of this valuable work, published by Messrs. G. & C. MERRIAM, we conclude will soon become the standard wherever the English language is spoken. The London Literary Gazette, of April 1st, speaks of it in the following just terms:

The original edition of the American Dictionary is too well known and appreciated in England to require us to dwell at length on its plan and execution. In the present edition Prof. Goodrich has been ably assisted by several eminent men, each distinguished in his own sphere of inquiry; and the result is in the highest degree satisfactory. The work is a noble monument of erudition, and indefatigable research; and the style and accuracy of its typography would do honor to the press of any country in Europe. This volume must find its way into all our public and good private libraries, for it provides the English student with a mass of the most valuable information, which he would in vain seek for elsewhere.

We have received several interesting works, notices of which we must defer. They shall appear in our next.

Foreign Intelligence.

We have received, by the last steamer, “the English Churchman,” of May 4th, and the London “Guardian,” of May 3d.

We take from these papers the following abridged account of two interesting ceremonies.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.—The enthronization of the Archbishop of Canterbury took place on Friday in the cathedral. The congregation were admitted to the choir by tickets, twelve hundred of which were issued by the Hon. Daniel Finch, the auditor, and as many more persons, we are told, were refused. The nave was crowded by parties who were prevented by the screen from seeing what was going on, and afforded another strong example in favour of our arguments in throwing open the naves of our cathedrals to worshippers. The Bishops of Winchester, Rochester, Chichester, Norwich, Lichfield, Lincoln, Llandaff, Manchester, Ripon, Worcester, Madras, Antigua, and Fredericton, and three hundred clergy, in their bands and gowns, were present, and several of the nobility and gentry.

“The doors of the choir were shut at half-past ten o'clock, and by eleven the confusion, arising from such a crowd being congregated in the precincts of the choir, having somewhat subsided, all eyes were directed towards the screen, in expectation of seeing the procession appear. The first intimation of its approach was made by the choristers chanting the three last Psalms, the 148th, 149th, and 150th. These solemn sounds, at first heard gently floating through the ‘high embowed roof,’ and then swelling into a fuller tide, as the procession moved up the nave, had a singular effect, admirably disposing the minds of the most unthinking to sympathise with the solemnities of the day. At last, as the procession entered the choir, the organ lent its deep tones to the voices of the choristers, and pealed forth the grand chorus.

“As the procession advanced up the nave, the clergy, who had previously formed two lines through the area, fell in behind and entered the choir, when the gate of the screen was closed, and a considerable portion of those assembled in the nave, being thus debarred from any farther witnessing of the ceremony, retired. Many, however, remained to the end of the service. In the meantime, the head of the procession, consisting of the choristers, King's scholars, &c., in their white robes, filed off into two lines, one on each side of the mid aisle, while the Archbishop was conducted to a seat placed for him on the north side of the high altar, where he spent some minutes in devotion; the Dean and Sub-Dean of the province took the seats appropriated for them on the south side of the altar; the Dean and the other members took their places in the stalls, at the opposite end of the choir, and the clergy, as many as could be accommodated in the limited space, in seats left for their use under the stalls. Order being restored, the service of the day began. The Venite was sung to Tallis's chant—the Psalms of the day to Gregorius. Prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Bennett, M.A., and the Lessons by the Rev. G. P. Marriott, M.A.

At the end of the first lesson—that in the Old Testament containing the promise which many in the cathedral would be inclined piously to accommodate to the ceremony of the day, that “David the King should never want a man to sit on the throne of Israel”—the Rev. Sub-Deacon Croft, attended by Dr. Lyall, the Dean, and Dr. Spry, the Vice-Dean of the cathedral, left his stall and proceeded to the altar to his Grace the Archbishop, who, rising at his approach, was conducted by him to the throne, placed in the centre of the choir on the south side, and having placed his Grace in that seat of dignity, Dr. Burnaby, the Vicar-General, presented to the Archdeacon the mandate of enthronization, which was read by the Hon. Daniel Finch, auditor of the cathedral, after which the Archdeacon read the form of induction.

“The service was then proceeded with; the Benedicite was sung to Purcell's chant, the Benedictus to that of Orlando Gibbon's, after which followed Farrant's anthem, "Lord, for thy tender mercy's sake," and the whole closed by the litany of Tallis, which was intoned by Precentor Stratton and the Rev. G. P. Marriott.

"Morning service being ended, the Archdeacon again approached the throne, and conducted his Grace, attended by the Dean and Sub-Dean of the province, and the Dean and Sub-Dean of the cathedral, to the marble chair, a venerable piece of ecclesiastical antiquity, which was placed in front of the high altar, at the head of the first flight of steps leading to that venerated place. Here his Grace was again seated, while the Archdeacon repeated the same form of induction; and as soon as it was ended he again rose and proceeded, conducted as before, down the choir to the Dean's stall under the grand screen, where the Archdeacon installed him in the following form:—"I, James Croft, Master of Arts, Archdeacon of Canterbury, place you, the Most Reverend Father in God, John Bird Sumner, Doctor in Divinity, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, in this stall or seat, in sign and token of your taking and having real and actual possession of the see of Canterbury, and of all the rights and privileges thereof."

"The ceremonies attending the enthronization being thus complete, the choristers sang the grand "Te Deum" of Mendelssohn, the sublime effect of which appeared to thrill through the whole of the vast assemblage.

"That done, the Archdeacon read the suffrages, the choir chanting the answers, and concluded with the following prayer:—"Almighty God, the giver of all good things, who by thy Holy Spirit hast appointed divers orders of ministers in thy Church, mercifully behold thy servant, John Bird Sumner, who is now admitted to the high office and dignity of Archbishop of this province, and so replenish him with the truth of thy doctrine, and adorn him with innocency of life, that both by word and deed he may faithfully serve thee in this office, to the glory of thy name, and to the edifying and well governing of thy Church. Grant, we beseech Thee, that he may long live happily to rule this Church, and that, having worthily fulfilled his course, at the latter day he may receive the crown of righteousness laid up by the Lord the Righteous Judge, who liveth and reigneth, one God with the Father and the Holy Ghost, world without end. Amen."

"His Grace then, from the Dean's stall, in a clear voice, pronounced the benediction, thus finishing the public services of this imposing ceremony, when the people gradually and slowly retired.

"The procession forming again, as it had entered, proceeded through the north door of the choir into the chapter-house, where the Archdeacon placed his Grace in the chief seat, and administered the oath:—"to maintain the rights and liberties of this Church, and to observe the approved customs thereof, &c. So help you God."

"Then the archdeacon, the dean, canons, the auditor, the six preachers, the schoolmasters, minor canons, and lay clerks promised canonical obedience. An act of the proceedings was then produced and signed, in the presence of and attested by a notary public, and the assembly was dismissed by the Dean."

DR. HAMPDEN.—The installation of Bishop Hampden took place on Thursday last at Hereford, under the following extraordinary circumstances, much in keeping with the whole proceeding:—"The mandate of the Archbishop to instal was sent to the Bishop's secretary, and by him given to Canon Musgrave, nephew to the late Bishop, now Archbishop of York, instead of passing through the hands of the chapter clerk. He intimated to the Dean by letter that he had the mandate, but as he neither gave it to him, nor shewed it to him, the Dean declined to interfere. Canon Musgrave then called upon Canons Morgan and Huntingford to meet, and by that meeting a citation was issued under the seal of the Dean and Chapter, to convene the general chapter to instal, according to the mandate, on Thursday the 27th of April, on which day the following met in the Lady Chapel:—Canon Musgrave, Canon in Residence; Canon Morgan, Residentiary; Canon Lord Saye and Sele, Residentiary; the Dean of St. Asaph, Prebendary; the Rev. W. E. Evans, the Rev. J. B. Webb, the Rev. R. L. Freer, and the Rev. G. Lewis, Honorary Prebendaries. The citation by which the meeting was convened was returned by the verger as served in the usual way. The mandate to instal was then read, the chapter clerk, in whose hands the verger of the cathedral, as apparitor, had duly placed the Dean's protest, then presented it to the Canons assembled, which they declined to receive, and ordered him not to read it.

They then proceeded to the choir, and the service commenced. After the first lesson the ceremony of induction from the western door of the cathedral and of installation proceeded, the congregation being placed in seats facing the west, and there was no altar.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The anniversary meeting of this Society took place on Tuesday at Exeter Hall. The chair was taken at ten o'clock by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The business of the meeting was opened by prayer; after which

The Archbishop of Canterbury said the reasons why he had been induced to occupy the chair to-day, at the request of the noble lord who had hitherto so ably filled that chair, were not because he conceived the office more appropriate to a Clergyman than a layman. His motive for doing so had been that he might give this public assurance of what he believed to be the duty and privilege of the office it had pleased God to call him to. He believed this Society to be one of the most useful engines God had set in motion for the great purpose of diffusing His Gospel through the world. Without troubling the meeting with any further remarks, he would call upon the secretary to read the report.

The report stated that the present was the fiftieth year of the Society's existence. The Bishops of Manchester, Melbourne, and Cape Town, and Lord Henry Cholmondeley, had consented to act as Vice Presidents for the present year. The accounts for the year ending March 31, 1848, set forth that the general and special funds paid into the Society's hands amounted to 91,980*l*. Besides this the local funds received and expended amounted to 9,312*l*, making a total of 101,292*l*. This total, however, was less than that of last year by 15,534*l*. Of this deficiency, however, 9,165*l*. was under the head of legacies. This was to be accounted for by the very munificent legacy of Mr. Scott last year. There were also several other accidental sources of revenue last year, so that the deficiency in the regular revenue this year amounted only to 3,788*l*., which, considering the general commercial difficulties, was not of an amount to be in any way discouraging. The expenditure of the past year, however, apart from local receipts and expenses, exceeded the general receipts by 6,426*l*., as they amounted altogether to 98,408*l*.

The report then proceeded to give an account of the general progress of the respective missions. In the African and north-west American missions, the accounts from the missionaries stationed there were highly encouraging to the members of the Society. In the Bombay and North Indian missions, with few exceptions, the progress of conversion had been also highly satisfactory. The same remarks apply to the Madras and South Indian, the China, and New Zealand missions. In the last the progress had been particularly satisfactory, and the ground lost in the previous year had been, in a great measure, recovered. In conclusion, the report stated that in every mission not only had there been an advance and consolidation of Christianity, but an increase particularly in the number of baptized persons and communicants. At present 138 missionaries were in the field, including 14 native clergymen, a number greater than at any earlier period. The committee were, however, compelled once more to advert to the pecuniary deficiency alluded to at the commencement of the report. They felt that, however much they might desire to widen the sphere of the Society's usefulness, it was a point of duty not to contract the engagements they could not fulfil; and while they would be discouraged by the falling off in the funds, they would not, until the capital account had been made up again, be able to send out fresh missionaries, except in some special and pressing cases.

From the same paper we take these curious facts respecting the National Assembly of the French Republic:

The celebrated Abbe Lacordaire is among the members returned for Marseilles, where he beat M. Thiers. It is very remarkable with regard to the Paris elections that while the Abbe Lacordaire, one of the most eloquent preachers in the Church, and the Abbe Daguerre, the Cure of St. Roch, one of the most popular of the Paris Clergy, and who was backed by the whole influence of the Church, were both rejected as candidates for the representation of Paris, in the National Assembly, the celebrated Protestant Pastor Coquerel was elected. They all three, however, occupied respectable places on the poll. The circumstance is remarkable, as showing how little the elections were influenced by the mere question of religion. The Catholic cure, the Dominican friar, the Protestant clergyman, and the Jew advocate, (Cremieux,) frequently figured on the same list; sometimes, indeed, in company with the infidel D'Alton Shee, whose boast it is that "he is neither Catholic nor Christian."

Three Prelates have been returned for the Assembly; the Archbishop of Paris is returned for Aveyron; the Bishop of Orleans, for Lozerre; and the Bishop of Quimper, for Furistère.

The Moniteur contains the following decree:

"The Provisional Government, considering that the principle of equality implies uniformity of costume for the citizens called to the same functions, decrees: The representatives of the people shall wear a black coat, a white waistcoat with lappels, and a tricolored sash with gold fringe. They shall also wear in the button-hole on the left side a red ribbon, in which shall be worked the fasces of the Republic."

It remains to be seen how the Bishops, Dominican Friars, and other Ministers, Catholic and Protestant, who are elected, will look when they put on the doubled-breasted white waistcoat, and tricolored sash and red ribbon!

For the Banner of the Cross.

REV. AND DEAR SIR: Rev. John W. Stokes, M.A., Archdeacon of Armagh
I ask the favor of an insertion in the Banner, of the following admirable counsels to a servant. They are transcribed from the original manuscript, omitting names and dates, by permission of her to whom they were addressed by her faithful Pastor—one of the most distinguished dignitaries of the church of God in Ireland. Such unobtrusive evidences of pastoral fidelity and christian consideration for the humblest of the flock, will outweigh a thousand rude words, boldly spoken by those who seek to cast discredit on the Irish church, (God prosper her!) and her estimable and laborious Clergy.

Rev. W. H. Odell
Pastoral Counsels to a Servant.

As you are going to live among strangers, in a strange land, and will never more see my face in the flesh, I wish you to take with you your Pastor's parting advice.

As you intend to be a servant, I will lay down a few rules for your guidance, and in this I shall have no difficulty as they are so plainly set forth in Holy Scripture.

Before I proceed I would strongly recommend you, when looking for a situation not to engage with a family who are not Episcopalians, members of the church to which you belong. It would I think, be a serious evil, and very injurious to your spiritual interests to live in a family that does not agree with you on the all-important subject of religion, and with whom you cannot with a safe conscience join in worship; if possible also let the family with which you engage, be one that bears a religious character, and where there is family worship. I would also most strongly recommend you, when you have engaged with such a family, and find a kind master and mistress, comfort and peace, and your soul's health cared for, not to indulge a restless spirit, nor let any trifling inducement, such as increase of wages, tempt you to leave it; for recollect that the interests of the next world ought to be our one great object in this; and money or any earthly comforts are but a poor exchange for the interests of our souls. "What," you may remember, our Lord says, who well knew the value of each, "what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" (Mat. xvi. 26.)

In whatever family you may be placed, I hope you will endeavor to observe the following rules.

Obeys readily and cheerfully the commands of your master or mistress, provided they do not interfere with your duty towards God. The directions of the word of God are plain on this point: "Servants be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart unto Christ, not with eye-service, as men please, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart, with good-will doing service as to the Lord, and not to men."—(Ephesians vi. 5, 6, 7.) And again, "Servants obey in all things your masters according to the flesh, not with eye-service, as men please, but in singleness of heart, fearing God; and whatsoever ye do, do it heartily as to the Lord, and not unto men."—(Colossians iii. 22, 23.)

Your master or mistress may sometimes be hot tempered, harsh, and unreasonable, and find fault unjustly, but do not let this tempt you to answer hastily or perty, but remember that "a soft answer turneth away wrath."—(Proverbs xv. 1.) And think of the advice which the word of God gives you under this very trial, "Servants be subject to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward; for this is thankworthy if a man for conscience towards God endure grief, suffering wrongfully."—(1 Peter ii. 19, 20.) If you read on to the end of this chapter you will find much comfort when suffering unjustly.

Be always faithful to your master's interest; be not merely content with not taking what does not belong to you, however trifling it may be in value, but do not allow others to defraud your master: for by consenting to the dishonesty of others, you make yourself partaker of their sin. "Exhort," says St. Paul, "servants to be obedient unto their own masters, and to please them well in all things: not answering again, not purloining, but showing all good fidelity, that they may adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour, in all things."—(Titus ii. 9, 10.)

While you will not, I hope, suffer your master to be wronged without informing him, do not imagine that I would encourage you to be a talebearer. Neither listen to idle stories to the prejudice of your fellow-servants, nor repeat them to others unless you clearly see that it is your duty to do so; idle talking often causes mischief and discord in families, "a whisperer," says Solomon, "separateth chief friends."—(Proverbs xvi. 28.) And "where there is no talebearer the strife ceaseth."—(Prov. xxvi. 20.) Strictly adhere to the truth—you may be sometimes under strong temptation to conceal it—when you have acted wrong, disobeyed your master's commands, or unintentionally injured his property; but whatever may be the consequences conceal nothing, but fully and freely tell the truth, the whole truth; do not like Ananias and Sapphira, keep back part.

In your intercourse with your fellow-servants be always ready to oblige; in your manner towards them be gentle, humble, and kind; such is the christian's character. "Put on," saith St. Paul, "bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long suffering, forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any: even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye."—(Colossians iii. 12, 13.)

Do not make too free with your fellow-servants, or allow them to make too free with you, and I advise you to be particularly guarded in this respect, in your intercourse with any young men with whom you may become acquainted—be reserved in your conduct towards them, and force them to respect you; the allowing even innocent freedoms has not only injured the character, but has led many a young woman to ruin. Remember, in choosing your companions, that while "he that walketh with wise men shall be wise, the companion of fools shall be destroyed."—(Proverbs xiii. 20.)

Observe strict modesty, not only in your conversation and conduct, but even in your dress, let it always be such as becomes your station in life, neat and tidy, but plain. "Let them behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear; while your adorning is not that outward adorning of plaiting the hair and wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel, but the hidden man of the heart in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price."—(1 Peter iii. 2, 3, 4.)

Remember that the eye of your Master in heaven is continually upon you, in the darkness as well as in the light, and while He is ready to strengthen you under trial, and to comfort you in sorrow; if you are unfaithful to Him, He will withdraw the light of His countenance, and leave you in darkness: be then above all things faithful to Him. I trust He is not only your Master, but your Father—that poor, weak sinner as you are, He has become your reconciled Father, and God, through Jesus Christ. Oh, what a happy thought will this prove to you, my poor child, when you are far removed from your earthly parents, your old familiar friends—when your heart perhaps sickens at the recollection of your forsaken home, and you feel alone and desolate, a stranger in a strange land; when you are in doubt or difficulty, or sorrow, what a source of comfort to be enabled to look up in faith and cheerful confidence to your Almighty Father, your Almighty never-failing Friend.

In serving either your earthly or heavenly master do not, I entreat you, rely upon your own strength, to enable you to do so, or to overcome the power of temptation. I fear you have too great confidence in yourself, and in the firmness of your own resolution, but believe me, your strength without God's grace is but weakness, and however firm your resolution may appear, it is God alone who can enable you to walk amidst the many and great dangers which will continually beset your path.

Kneel down then every morning and evening in private, not only to thank God for his past mercies to you, but to pray to Him to strengthen with his grace; to guide you with His counsel; to preserve and protect you. Let no hurry of business, no temptations of sloth, no weariness of the flesh prevent your doing this: it is not only your duty, but I trust you will find it a source of comfort, a great privilege.

Endeavor also to find time for a regular reading of God's word. I do not mean for merely reading over a few verses to be forgotten as soon as you have shut the book, but for seriously thinking over what you read, and praying to God to open your heart to receive His word in its spirit and power, and to bless it to your soul. A few verses read in this manner are more profitable than whole chapters read as a task.

When you engage with a master, make it a point in your agreement that he allow you to attend public worship, if possible, every Sunday; no really good master will refuse you—and do not on any account, neglect to avail yourself of the privilege.

You will find in ——— as well as in your own country, that you will be the member of a Flock, which has a regular Pastor; do not leave the Pastor whom God may give you, but in faith and patience, and prayer wait upon his ministry, looking to God alone for a blessing upon it. Resist all temptations to wander to other places of worship, to please a friend, to gratify your curiosity, or under the idea of hearing more gifted preachers. You would find it to be most unprofitable, it tends to encourage those itching ears which the word of God so strongly condemns, to unsettle the mind, and to retard the growth in grace.

I hope also that you will not only regularly attend the ministry of your stated Pastor, but also be a regular communicant, not neglecting whenever the opportunity is afforded you, to approach the Lord's table, with an humble, thankful, and penitent heart, to partake of the hallowed bread and wine, as being to you the body of your Saviour Christ, which was broken for you, and His blood shed for you; by this act you not only testify your faith in His atoning sacrifice, and your sense of His exceeding great love towards you, but by thus eating of this bread and drinking of the cup, by His divine appointment you claim the benefit of that sacrifice as yours, you feed on it in your heart by faith with thanksgiving. Never forget that it is through a living faith in that sacrifice, which the Lord Jesus Christ offered for you, that you can alone be saved.

I could say much more to you, but must now conclude. Do not my dear child neglect this my parting advice, but sometimes at least, when you are far, far away, read it over, and pray to God to bless it to you, and then, imperfect as I feel it to be, it will not be given in vain. Nothing now remains for me but to give you my parting blessing, which I do from my heart. May God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost bless, preserve, and keep you. May the Lord mercifully, with His favour look upon you, and so fill you with all spiritual benediction and grace, that you may be enabled to live not unto yourself, but unto Him who died for you, and to glorify Him with your body and your spirit, which are His. Amen.

YOUR AFFECTIONATE PASTOR.

MARYLAND CONVENTION.—The Sixtieth Annual Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Maryland, will be held in St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, commencing on Wednesday, 31st inst.

H. COLBURN, Secretary.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.—The Annual Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Connecticut will meet in St. Paul's Church, New Haven, on Tuesday in Whitsun-Week, June 13, at 4 o'clock, P.M. The organization for business will take place at that time. Convention to be opened with Divine Service, the Sermon, and the Holy Communion on Wednesday Morning.

By order of the Bishop.

WM. PAYNE, Secretary.

DAILY SERVICE.—"One thing have I desired of the Lord, that I will seek after, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in His temple."—Psalms xxvii. 4.

Public worship is celebrated every week day in the city of New York as follows:

Trinity Church, 9, A. M., 3, P. M.
St. Luke's Church, 8, A. M.
All Saints Church, 6, A. M.
St. Clement's Church, 8, A. M.
Calvary Church, 8, A. M. 6, P. M.
Church of The Annunciation, 8, A. M. 6, P. M.
Church of The Holy Communion, 6, A. M. 6, P. M.; and on Saints days a Second Service Lecture, and Offertory, 9, A. M.
The Church of The Crucifixion, 8, A. M.

The Rev. Moses Marcus, Rector of the Church of "St. George the Martyr," embarked on the 12th inst. in the Packet Ship Waterloo, Capt. Allen, for Liverpool. The Rev. gentleman, having devoted himself most indefatigably and perseveringly to the spiritual and temporal comforts of immigrants from England for many of whom he has been enabled to obtain situations, and otherwise materially aided, has, by his assiduity and attention, been enabled to procure from the Corporation of the City of New York, a grant of twenty-four lots of ground, with a view to have erected thereon a Church, a Hospital, and an Asylum, for destitute immigrants. The location is very eligible, healthy, and of convenient access, the estimated value of the land Thirty thousand dollars.

The object of Mr. Marcus's visit to Great Britain, is to solicit, from the liberal and charitable residents of that country, pecuniary aid, to enable a completion of the intended plan to benefit their countrymen in their time of need, among strangers at a distance from their home, on a scale sufficiently extensive to afford comfort to the distressed, relief to the sick, and a new found home to the destitute. The Rev. gentleman carries with him credentials of the highest and kindest order. With such an appeal to the known generosity of Englishmen, it is not doubted, he will receive that substantial evidence of it, which will exhibit an enduring memento of their piety, their regard for their fellow countrymen, and their benevolence in the cause of religion and charity, that shall be a testimony of their bounty and kindness in lasting ages.—Churchman.

Western New York.—CONFIRMATION.—On Tuesday last, the 16th instant, Bishop DeLancey held a Confirmation in this city for the benefit of several persons who were not ready or able to enjoy that ordinance at the time of his visitation in the last month.

The services were held in the evening, at Trinity Church, which, we were happy to see, was filled by a large and attentive congregation.

Evening Prayer was read by the Rector, the Rev. Dr. Proal, and the Rev. Mr. Leeds, Rector of Grace Church; the Rev. Almon Gregory of Rome, read the lesson; Dr. Proal administered holy baptism to two adults, and also read the Confirmation Preface. The Bishop then confirmed eleven persons, five of whom belonged to the parish of Trinity Church, and the others to Grace Church congregation. The sermon was preached by the Bishop, who had also confirmed, in private a sick person belonging to the congregation of Grace Church.

Besides the clergy named above, the Rev. George Platt, of South Carolina, and the Rev. Dr. Rudd of Ulrica, were present. Gos. Mess.

Maryland.—CONFIRMATION.—On the third Sunday after Easter, May 14th, in the morning, in St. Thomas's Parish Church, Baltimore Co., after Morning Prayer had been said by the Rev. Mr. Armstrong, of Wheeling, Va., the Bishop preached, confirmed eight persons, and administered the Holy Communion. The Rev. Mr. Austin, Rector of the parish, and the Rev. Mr. Allen, of St. John's in the Valley, were present. The candidates for confirmation were all pupils of that well conducted and flourishing institution, the Hannah More Academy, near Reisterstown. In the afternoon, in St. John's Church, in the Valley, the Rev. Mr. McKenney said Evening Prayer, the Rev. Mr. Austin read the Lessons, and the Bishop preached. On both these occasions numerous congregations filled the respective churches.

St. John's Church in the Valley.—We understand that the liberal-hearted member of this congregation who some years since erected its spacious and commodious parsonage at his sole expense, has recently bestowed on the congregation ten acres of wood land, to be inalienably held for the supply of fuel to the Rector. May God reward him!—Church Times.

South Carolina.—JOURNAL OF THE BISHOP OF THE DIOCESE OF SOUTH CAROLINA.—EXTRACTS FROM IT.—January 26th. At Summerville, at the house of the Rector, read "Evening prayer" the weather being inclement, and few in the Village to go to Church.

February 3d. At Beaufort, by special request, I was present in "St. Helena's Church," at the ministration of "holy matrimony," by the Rector of Prince William's Parish.

13th. At St. James' Church, Goosecreek, I officiated, and after the Sermon, addressed the black people. In the afternoon at St. Paul's Church, Summerville, I officiated; congregation very small.

14th. In Charleston, a candidate for Holy Orders had his first examination concluded, and his second entirely gone through—Rev. Messrs. Trapier, Pickney and Wallace assisting.

20th. Sunday at St. Paul's Church, Stono, officiated in the morning, and after Service instructed the negroes. In the afternoon, at the house of James Perry, Esq., I read "Evening Prayer" and preached.

21st. At Summerville in St. Paul's Church, I read "Evening prayer" and preached.

22d. Same place, I read "Evening prayer" and preached.

29th. At Aiken, I read "Evening prayer"—The Lessons by the Rector, I preached.

March 8th. Ash-Wednesday, at the Church of the Messiah, North Santee, I preached. "Morning prayer" was by the Rector, and the Lessons by the Rector of Christ Church Parish. At night, in the Parish of St. James, Santee, at a private house, read the "Evening Service" for Ash-Wednesday—the Lessons by Rev. Mr. Fell.

9th. In Christ Church Parish, read "Evening prayer."

19th. In St. Andrew's Parish, at the Chapel on Mr. N. R. Middleton's plantation, after "Morning prayer" by the Rector, I preached and administered the holy Rite of Confirmation to 24 black persons, servants of Mr. Middleton, Rev. Dr. Hancel and Mr. W. J. Bull. At the Church after the usual Sunday services I preached.

At the Chapel on Mr. Magwood's place,—after "Evening prayer" by the Rector I preached. The Chapels, both of them commodious, neat, and well adapted to their sacred purposes, were provided by the proprietors of the plantations, on which they are; and we humbly trust will prove a blessing to their people, to themselves and to the community.

26th. Sunday, at St. John's Parish, Colleton district, after "Morning prayer," and the Ante-Communion by the Minister (Rev. J. W. Miles), I preached, and administered the holy Rite of Confirmation to several persons.

At night, on the plantation of Mr. J. W. Simmons, a Candidate for Holy Orders, I read "Evening prayer," and the Minister of the Parish preached; the congregation consisted of white and black persons from the neighbourhood in this Parish. The number of the slave population who are members of the Church is unusually large—crowding the galleries on the Lord's Day and at home claiming much "pastoral care," and the attention of two Lay-Catechists; towards whose support some provision is made by a few pious planters.

29th. At St. Michael's Church, after "Morning prayer" by the Assistant Minister, I preached and administered Confirmation to a member of St. Paul's Church, Pendleton; about to return thither soon. I also administered in his sick chamber, the same holy Rite to a sick gentleman of St. Philip's Church.

April 4th. A Candidate for Deacon's Orders had his first examination; four Presbyters assisting.

7th. At the Chapel of Mr. N. R. Middleton, on his place, in St. Andrew's Parish, I read "Evening prayer" and preached to his labourers; addressing, in particular, those who were recently admitted to the holy Rite of Confirmation.

8th. On the journey to Wilton, in the midst of a wood, suddenly the vehicle fell; broken in several material parts, but we in it were unhurt. Thankful for safety, I was yet much perplexed, for to proceed was impossible, except on foot, and the rain was falling. In an hour, however, prompt and effectual assistance was obtained from a member of our Church, whose residence was not far off; in his carriage, leaving my own, in the care of his servants, I was enabled to pursue the journey. While waiting on the road a traveller looked on but declined any succour. The unexpectedness, and speediness and completeness of my relief, were as remarkable as the circumstances of the occurrence, and the transition from sorrow and solicitude, to a lively satisfaction, is now recollected; not without humility, and thankfulness, to a gracious providence, and to my now unknown generous benefactor.

9th. Sunday, at Christ Church, Wilton, after "Morning prayer" and the Ante-Communion by the Rector (Rev. E. Walker) I preached; and after "the blessing" to the blacks who remained, I expounded Acts 2: 41, 42, as to their obligation to be Confirmed, and when Confirmed, as to their duties.

At the residence of Benjamin Bailey, Esq., in St. Paul's Parish, I read "Evening prayer" and preached to his family and servants, also catechized some children, and baptized his infant daughter Julia Ella.

10th. While at Wilton, Mr. Bailey's servants had brought my broken carriage from the broad road a considerable distance and it was now so well repaired under his direction as to enable me in safety and comfort to arrive at home. Thanks be to Him who inclines his creatures to offices of kindness, and they are justly due; as to Mr. B. in particular, so to his agents. This morning, at Mr. Bailey's, my attention was directed to the site of an old Church which stood near the junction of Stono River, and a Creek called Church Creek. It is on Mr. Bailey's plantation, a few hundred yards from his residence. There remain several head stones, one to the memory of Mrs. Rawlins Lowndes, who died in 1750 aged 21, and three to members of the Seabrook family, one has the date 1716. This Church must have been conveniently accessible to a large population from the main and the islands on the other side of this river. I have not yet learned whether it was an Episcopal Church or not.

11th. At St. Peter's Church, Mr. G. L. Platt was admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons—presented by the Rector (Rev. W. H. Barnwell); the Sermon was delivered by me, but taken from Bishop Bowen's 2d volume of printed Sermons; and was peculiarly appropriate.

13th. At Pineville, after "Morning prayer" by the Assistant Minister (Rev. C. P. Gadsden), I preached, and administered to two white persons, the holy Rite of Confirmation.

At the plantation of Samuel Dubose, Esq., after "Evening prayer" by the Assistant Minister of the Parish, I Confirmed 20 servants of Mr. Dubose, and made an address to them. The services were in the Chapel, and several white members of the family were present.

14th. At the "Church of the Epiphany," after "Morning prayer" by the Rector (Rev. W. Dehon) I preached, and administered the holy Rite of Confirmation to 6 persons.

At the plantation of Thomas Porcher, Esq., after "Evening prayer" by the Assistant Minister, I Confirmed 10 of his servants, in a spacious room fitted up in a church-like manner.—The four Congregations of this cure to whom I have ministered on this occasion, were in good proportion to the persons, who might be expected to attend them, although the services were not on Sunday; and the chanting of the anthems, while it added interest to the devotions, was good evidence that zeal and diligence were not wanting to prepare for rendering to God an acceptable homage.

16th. At St. John's, Hampstead, after "Evening prayer" by the Minister (Rev. A. W. Marshall), I preached, Confirmed 20 persons, and after "the Congregation were dismissed," assisted the Minister in instructing the blacks.

18th. At St. Peter's Church, Charleston, after "Morning prayer" and the Ante-Communion by the Rector (Rev. W. H. Barnwell), I Confirmed 6 persons, and read to them Bishop Dehon's address to "the Confirmed."—Charleston Gospel Messenger.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Henry Zell having resigned the charge of Trinity Church, Woleotville, and accepted a call to the Rectorship of Christ Church, Bethany, Ct., desires all papers and letters to be directed hereafter to the latter place.

The Rev. H. V. Gardner has resigned the parishes of Harwinton, and East Plymouth, and has accepted a call to the cure of the united parishes of Tashua and Long Hill, Trumbull. His post office address is "Long Hill, Trumbull, Conn."

The Rev. George B. Eastman has accepted an invitation to the Rectorship of Zion Church, Avon, Livingston county, Western New York, and requests all communications to him addressed accordingly.

The Rev. P. O. Holcomb, late of St. Luke's Church, West Granby, N. Y., having removed to Cheshire, Ct., requests his letters and papers addressed accordingly.

THE LORD'S DAY.—He keeps the Lord's Day best that keeps it with most religion and with most charity.—Bishop Jeremy Taylor.

AFFECTATION may be compared to a coat of many pieces and divers colours, ill fitted, and neither stitched nor tied.

Notices.

Bishop White Prayer Book Society.

The Bishop White Prayer Book Society has just published a new edition of the Book of Common Prayer, (in 18mo. form,) from stereotype plates prepared by King & Baird, of Philadelphia. These plates have been corrected with great care; and are believed to be very accurate, having been diligently and minutely conformed to the Standard set forth by the General Convention of 1847, in its seventh canon. Should, however, any errors be discovered in them, they will immediately be rectified. The undersigned respectfully requests that any such that may be detected, may be made known to him, as soon as possible.

Episcopal Female Institute.

This Institution is to be opened for the reception of pupils, as day scholars, Sept. 1, in Oak street, West Penn Square, three doors north of Market street. It will be under the management of a Board of Trustees appointed by the Bishop of the Diocese, the Bishop being Chairman of the Board; and is designed to offer to parents the opportunity of a thorough education for their daughters, under the religious training and influence of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The terms will be moderate. Parents intending to place their daughters under its fostering care are referred for further information to the Bishop, or to the Rev. J. A. Vaughan, D.D., Rector of the Institute, Oak street, or to either of the following gentlemen, Trustees, viz: Jas. C. Booth, Joseph Cabot, Samuel V. Merrick, Caspar Morris, M. D., William Welsh.

It is important that, prior to Aug. 1, notice should be given to the Rector of those pupils who expect to enter at the opening of the Institute.

TESTIMONIALS.

From the London Literary Gazette, April 1, 1848.

In the present edition, Prof. Goodrich has been ably assisted by several eminent men, each distinguished in his own sphere of inquiry; and the result is in the highest degree satisfactory. The work is a noble monument of erudition, and indefatigable research; and the style and accuracy of its typography would do honor to the press of any country in Europe. This volume must find its way into all our public and good private libraries, for it provides the English student with a mass of the most valuable information, which he would in vain seek for elsewhere.

"The new edition of Webster's Dictionary, in crown quarto, seems to us deserving of general patronage."

"We recommend it to all who desire to possess THE MOST COMPLETE, ACCURATE AND RELIABLE DICTIONARY OF THE LANGUAGE."

Signed by the following gentlemen, March, 1848.

The previous edition of Webster's Quarto Dictionary, received the following recommendation, from Daniel Webster, Levi Woodbury, Theodore Frelinghuysen and 101 other members of Congress.

"It is very desirable that one standard dictionary should be used by the numerous millions of people who are to inhabit the vast extent of territory belonging to the United States; as the use of such a standard may prevent the formation of dialects in states remote from each other, and impress upon the language uniformity and stability. It is desirable, also, that the acquisition of the language should be rendered easy, not only to our own citizens, but to foreigners who wish to gain access to the rich stores of science which it contains. We rejoice that the American Dictionary bids fair to become such a standard." Published by

G. & C. MERRIAM, Springfield, Mass., and for sale in Philadelphia by Grigg, Elliot & Co., E. H. Butler & Co., Thomas Cowperthwait & Co., Carey & Hart, and by Booksellers generally throughout the country.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS ON THE LAST EDITION

"This is a new edition of these much admired poems."

—Burlington Gazette.

"A volume got up in a substantial and elegant style. Our readers have had frequent opportunity of judging of the peculiar excellence of its contents."—Philadelphia Saturday Courier.

"We have read these Songs with great pleasure, and regard them as at once chaste, graceful, and breathing genuine Christianity."—Penna. Inquirer.

"They are imbued with the spirit of piety, and have a just claim to the title, Christian Songs."—Banner of the Cross.

"They are truly poetical, though poetry appears in them constantly as the handmaid of religion."—N. Y. Churchman.

"We have read this elegantly printed volume with great delight. With rare excellencies, the author has no faults of style to mar the pleasure received from the perusal of his pages."—Protestant Churchman, N. Y.

"These brief poems are evidently the productions of a man of taste and genius. They are replete with sentiments of benevolence and piety."—Episcopal Recorder.

"The work contains thirty-one lyrical pieces, many of them of great merit."—Philad. North American.

"The present selection is small and choice; nothing has been admitted merely to swell the size of the book, but every song has decided merit and ability."—Hartford Calendar.

"They indicate a strong mind, sound sentiments, and a bright fancy."—Richmond Enquirer.

"A volume which should grace the collection of every reader of sensibility and taste."—Germantown Telegraph.

"The volume is a gem of the first water."—Missionary, N. Y.

"We congratulate the religious world on this addition to its stock of sacred poetry."—Toronto Church.

"Oh, steal not thou my faith away," and an "Evening Hymn," included in these "Christian Songs," are two of the most beautiful sacred lyrics we have ever met with."

—Natl. Gazette, Phila.

"It is really what it professes to be, a book of 'Christian Songs,' and one which every Christian of taste can and should appreciate."—Christian Repository.

"The versification of Dr. Lyons is smooth and graceful, his feelings those of a poet, his sentiments those of a Christian."—Presbyterian.

"Most of them are of a very high order."—Christian Chronicle.

"The subjects selected are chaste, elevated, and beautiful, and the poetry smooth, graceful, and flowing."—City Item.

"A perfect cluster of gems, set in fine work by the printer and binder, to be preserved for after ages."—Scott's Weekly Paper.

"They are no ephemeral pieces; they will live, and find their way to the heart, and delight the ear, among the few permanent contributions to our growing literature."—Baltimore Church Times.

"This elegant volume contains a collection of lyrical pieces, whose merits as sacred songs will commend them to the favorable regards of the lovers of poetry."—Christian Observer.

"They have been very extensively copied—a proof at they appealed to the finer feelings of many hearts."—Phila. Saturday Post.

"The author is a true poet."—Philadelphia Lotus.

from the oldest English Psalter, with some of our language in the 11th century: it is from Psalm 109.

PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1848.

[Vol. X.—No. 22.—Whole No. 492.]

"Mirthes to God al erthe that es
Sowes to louerd in faines
In go yhe ai in his siht
In gladnes that is so bright.

"Whites that louerd God is he thus
He us made and ourself noht us
Ais folk and shep of his fode,
In gos his yhates that are gode."

"The first literal English translation of any part of Holy Writ was made towards the middle of the 14th century, by Richard Rolle, who however, translated only the Psalter; the versio princeps of the Psalms in English. In the preface, the author says, 'in this work seke no stranger Ynglis, but lightest and communest, and swilk that is most like unto the Latyne, so that thai that knows not the Latyne be the Ynglis may come to many Latyne words.'

"But to John Wiclif, 'the morning star of the Reformation,' belongs the honor of having made the first complete English version of the Holy Bible. This translation was made from the vulgar Latin, about the year 1380. We shall conclude this article with brief specimen of Wiclif's version of the Lord's Prayer. 'Our fader that art in hevenys; halewid be thi namv; thy kyngdom come to, be thy wil done in erthe as in hevene. Give us this day our breed ovir other substance. And forgive to us our dettis as we forgiven to our dettouris. And lede us not into temptation; but delyvere us from yvil, amen.'—The American Quarterly Register, and Magazine.

A Funeral at Sea.

"It was a morning at sea. The sun had just risen, and not a cloud appeared to obstruct his rays. A light breeze played on the bosom of the slumbering ocean. The stillness of the morning was disturbed only by the ripple of the water or the diving of the flying fish. It seemed as if the calm and noiseless spirit of the deep was brooding over the waters. The national flag displayed half-way down the royal mast, played in the breeze, unconscious of its solemn import.—The vessel glided in stately serenity, and seemed tranquil as the element on which she moved. She knew not the sorrows that were in her own bosom. And seemed to look down on the briny expanse beneath her, in all the confidence and security of strength.

To the minds of the crew, it was a morning of gloom. They had been boarded by the angel of death; and the fore-castle now contained all that was mortal of its victim. His soul had gone to its final audit. Grouped around the windless, and left to their own reflections, the hardy sons of the ocean mingled their sympathies with each other. They seemed to think on their own mortality.—Conscience was at her post; and I believe their minds were somewhat impressed with realities of eternity.

They spoke of the virtues of their deceased messmate; of his honesty; his sensibility; his generosity. One remembered to have seen him share his last dollar, of his hard earned wages, with a distressed shipmate.—All could attest his liberality. They spoke too of his accomplishments as a sailor; of the nerve of his arm, and the intrepidity of his soul. They had seen him in an hour of peril, when the winds of heaven were let loose in all their fury, and destruction seemed to be at hand. They had seen him, in the midst of the storm, a pestilence burst on the helm, and when comprehending the civilized world. It continued for fifteen years, and "ragged without interruption in every province, in every city, and almost in every family of the empire. During some time five thousand persons died daily in Rome."

A reference to the registers of Alexandria shows that "above half the population of that city had perished; and, could we venture to extend the analogy to the other provinces, we might suspect that war, pestilence and famine had consumed in a few years the moiety of the human species."

In the middle of the sixth century, Constantinople, then the capital of the world, was startled by the approach of the plague. From the terror of the time, it is difficult to discover its origin. But it was supposed to have come from Egypt. Its mortality was indescribable. "During three months, five, and at length ten thousand persons died each day in Constantinople. Many cities of the east were left vacant; and in several districts of Italy the harvest and the vintage perished in the ground."

"The disease pursued a double path: it spread to the east, over Syria, Persia, and the Indies; and penetrated to the east, along the coast of Africa, and over the continent of Europe." This pestilence was of such peculiar malignity that it was not abated by the change of the seasons. In time it vanished, but revived; and "it was not till the end of the calamitous period of fifty-two years that mankind recovered their health, or the air recovered its salubrious quality."

"He that has kable circumstance is, that no plague ever ap-and will have produced a moral reform. Instead of the natural awe of heaven, it seems to have been signalized by the wildest excesses—by the fiercer crimes and more reckless carousals of despair. Rebellion, murder, and the frantic indulgence of every passion and appetite have in general characterized the progress of the mortality. Thucydides dates the especial profligacy of Athens from the era of the plague. "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die"—the strong expression used by Isaiah to represent the last mad festivity of a city about to be stormed, and despairing of resistance; the words used by St. Paul, to express the condition of man hopeless of immortality—were evidently the popular impulse in the majority of instances, perhaps in all. The plague was simply a divine punishment; the scourge, and not the teacher.

Present Number of the Jews.

The following extract showing the present number of the Jews, is taken from "Burden's Religious Ceremonies and Customs," published by "G. B. Zieber & Co., Philadelphia."

*Gibbon's "Decline and Fall," vol. iv.

†In 1625, London had lost 35,000 persons by plague. In 1636, the numbers were 10,000. In 1665, the bills of mortality stated the deaths to be the number given above. But, from the imperfect nature of those registers, the deaths were probably more. The deaths by other diseases were registered at 28,000. The number of deaths by plague increased with the approach to autumn; in June they were 590; in July, 4, 129; in August, 20,046; in September, 26,230; in October, 14,372. The deaths then began to decrease rapidly. In November they were 3,449; and in December, 1,000.

It only remains to give the best estimate we can afford of the number of the Jews now dispersed throughout the four quarters of the world. Such statements must of necessity be extremely loose and imperfect. Even in Europe it would be difficult to approximate closely to the truth; how much more so in Africa and Asia, where our data depend on no statistic returns, and where the habits of the people are probably less stationary!

It is calculated that there exist between four and five millions* of this people, descended in a direct line from, and maintaining the same laws with, their forefathers, who, above 3000 years ago, retreated from Egypt under the guidance of their inspired lawgiver.

In Africa, we know little more of their numbers than that they are found along the whole coast, from Morocco to Egypt; they travel with the caravans into the interior: nor is there probably a region undiscovered by Christian enterprise, which has not been visited by the Jewish trafficker. In Morocco, they are said to be held in low estimation, and treated with great indignity by the Moors.

In Egypt, 150 families alone inhabit that great city, Alexandria, which has so often flowed with torrents of Jewish blood, and where, in the splendid days of the Macedonian city, their still recruited wealth excited the rapacious jealousy of the hostile populace or oppressive government.

In Cairo, the number of Jews is stated at 2000, including, it should seem, sixty Karaite families. The Falishas, or Jewish tribe named by Bruce, inhabit the borders of Abyssinia; and it is probable that in that singular kingdom, many Jews either dwell or make their periodical visits.†

In Asia,‡ the Jews still, most likely, might be found in considerable numbers on the verge of the continent; in China, where we are not aware that their communities have ceased to exist, and on the coast of Malabar, in Cochin, were two distinct races, called black and white Jews, were visited by Dr. Buchanan. The traditions of the latter averred that they had found their way to that region after the fall of Jerusalem, but the date they assigned for their migration singularly coincided with that of a persecution in Persia, about A. C. 508, from whence, it is probable, they found their way to India. The origin of the black Jews is more obscure; it is not impossible that they may have been converts of the more civilized whites; or, perhaps, they are descendants of black slaves. The Malabar Jews were about 1000; they possessed a copy of the Old Testament. Many are found in other parts of the East Indies.

In Bokhara reside 2000 families of Jews; in Balkh, 150.

In Persia, they have deeply partaken of the desolation which has fallen on the fair provinces of that land; their numbers were variously stated to Mr. Woolff, at 2974 and 3590 families. Their chief communities are at Shiraz and Ispahan, Kashaan and Yazd. They are subject to the heaviest exactions, and to the capricious despotism of the governors. "I have travelled far," said a Jew to Mr. Woolff; "the Jews are everywhere princes in comparison with those in the land of Persia. Heavy is our captivity, heavy is our burden, heavy is our slavery; anxiously we wait for redemption."

In Mesopotamia and Assyria, the ancient seats of the Babylonian Jews are still occupied by 5270 families, exclusive of those in Bagdad and Bassora. The latter are described as a fine race, both in form and intellect; in the provinces they are broken in mind and body by the heavy exactions of the pashas, and by long ages of sluggish ignorance. At Bagdad, the ancient title of Prince of the Captivity, so long, according to the accounts of the Jews, entirely suppressed, was borne by an ancient Jew named Isaac. He paid dear for his honour; he was suddenly summoned to Constantinople and imprisoned.

At Damascus, there are seven synagogues and four colleges.

In Arabia, whether or not entirely expelled by Mohammed, or having returned to their ancient dwellings in later periods, the Beni-Khaibr still retain their Jewish descent and faith. In Yemen reside 2658 families, 18,000 souls.—

In Palestine, of late years, their numbers have greatly increased; it is said, but we are inclined to doubt the numbers, that 10,000 inhabit Safet and Jerusalem. They are partly Karaites. Some very pathetic hymns of this interesting Israelitish race have been published in the Journals of Mr. Woolff, which must have a singularly affecting sound when heard from children of Israel, bewailing, upon the very ruins of Jerusalem, the fallen city, and the suffering people.

*A statement has just been published from the Weimar Geographical Ephemerides, which gives the whole number of Jews at little more than three millions. We should conceive the Asiatic, and perhaps the Russian, stated too low; but we subjoin their numbers.

†In the Weimar statement, the Jews of Africa stand as follows: Morocco and Fez, 300,000; Tunis, 130,000; Algiers, 30,000; Gabes or Habesh, 20,000; Tripoli, 12,000; Egypt, 12,000. Total, 504,000.

We shall only observe respecting these versions, that they appear to have been made, not from the Vulgate, but the Old Italic.

"It has been often said that Alfred the Great translated the whole Bible; he prefixed to his body of laws a translation of a few chapters of Exodus, and in his age began a version of the Psalms, which he did not live to finish; according to Mr. Barber, there is no evidence of his having done more.

"Of the early Saxon scholars, the first one who attempted to give his countrymen the Old Testament in their own tongue, was Elfric, a monk of the 10th century. This version, which embraced only the historical books, was published in 1698. In consequence of the disturbed state of the kingdom, produced by incursions of the Danes, and the conquest by the Normans, Saxon literature gradually declined, and we may date its fall to about one hundred years after the conquest, when the language had become so far changed as to have assumed that form which entitles it to the appellation of English. The following extract from the oldest English Psalter, will serve to show the state of our language in the 11th century: it is from Psalm 100.

"Mirthes to God al erthe that es
Sowes to lound in faines
In go yhe ai in his siht
In gladnes that is so bright.

"Whites that lound God is he thus
He us made and ourself noht us
Ais folk and shep of his fode,
In gos his yhates that are gode."

"The first literal English translation of any part of Holy Writ was made towards the middle of the 14th century, by Richard Rolle, who however, translated only the Psalter; the versio princeps of the Psalms in English. In the preface, the author says, 'in this work seke no stranger Ynglis, but lightest and communest, and swilk that is most like unto the Latyne, so that thai that knows not the Latyne be the Ynglis may come to many Latyne words.'

"But to John Wiclif, 'the morning star of the Reformation,' belongs the honor of having made the first complete English version of the Holy Bible. This translation was made from the vulgar Latin, about the year 1380. We shall conclude this article with brief specimen of Wiclif's version of the Lord's Prayer. "Our fader that art in hevenys; halewid be thi namv; thy kyngdom come to, be thy wil done in erthe as in hevene. Give us this day our breed ovir other substance. And forgive to us our dettis as we forgiven to our dettouris. And lede us not into temptation; but delyvere us from yvil, amen."—The American Quarterly Register, and Magazine.

A Funeral at Sea.

"It was a morning at sea. The sun had just risen, and not a cloud appeared to obstruct his rays. A light breeze played on the bosom of the slumbering ocean. The stillness of the morning was disturbed only by the ripple of the water or the diving of the flying fish. It seemed as if the calm and noiseless spirit of the deep was brooding over the waters. The national flag displayed half-way down the royal mast, played in the breeze, unconscious of its solemn import.—The vessel glided in stately serenity, and seemed tranquil as the element on which she moved. She knew not the sorrows that were in her own bosom, and seemed to look down on the briny expanse beneath her, in all the confidence and security of strength.

To the minds of the crew, it was a morning of gloom. They had been boarded by the angel of death; and the fore-castle now contained all that was mortal of its victim. His soul had gone to its final audit. Grouped around the windless, and left to their own reflections, the hardy sons of the ocean mingled their sympathies with each other. They seemed to think on their own mortality.—Conscience was at her post; and I believe their minds were somewhat impressed with realities of eternity.

They spoke of the virtues of their deceased messmate; of his honesty; his sensibility; his generosity. One remembered to have seen him share his last dollar, of his hard earned wages, with a distressed shipmate.—All could attest his liberality. They spoke too of his accomplishments as a sailor; of the nerve of his arm, and the intrepidity of his soul. They had seen him in an hour of peril, when the winds of heaven were let loose in all their fury, and destruction was on the wing, seize the helm, and hold the ship securely within his grasp, till the danger was over.

They would have indulged long in their reveries, but they were summoned to prepare the rites of the sepulchre, and pay the last honors to their dead companion. The work of preparation was commenced with heavy hearts and with many a sigh; a rude coffin was soon constructed, and the body deposited within it. All was ready for the final scenes. The main hatches were his bier; a spare sail his pall. His surviving companions, in their tar-stained habiliments stood around.

All was silent; the fresh breeze moaned thro' the cordage; the main top-sail was hove to the mast; and the ship stood still. The funeral service began; and as "we commit this body to the deep," was pronounced, I heard the knell of the ship bell—I heard the plunge of the coffin. I saw tears start from the eyes of the generous tars. My soul melted within me, as I reverted to the home scenes of him whom we had buried in the deep—to the hopes that were to be dashed with woe; to the joys that were to be drowned in lamentation.

Forty Days Wandering in an American Forest.

There is a class of men on the St. John's River, in East Florida, whose employment consists in felling and squaring the huge forest-trees which grow in its neighbourhood; they live, during the season most favourable to their operations, in small isolated log-huts, near the banks of the river, the married men having their families under the same roof. At the time of year we are alluding to, the country is visited during the fore-part of the day by very heavy fogs, which completely prevent the traveller from ascertaining the direction in which he is moving. One of the men we have been describing had left his cabin to proceed to the hammock at which he had been at work, and anxious to reach the spot, he incautiously proceeded in the supposed direction during the continuance of one of these fogs, but, to his alarm, as soon as the fog dispersed, he saw the sun at its meridian height, and could not recognise a single object around him. Fancying, as he had walked at a rapid rate, that he had gone beyond the spot, he turned back, and proceeded in a contrary direction; but his efforts to discover his road were useless, and the sun set on the forest, leaving him a houseless wanderer. "The night was spent in the greatest agony and terror. I knew my situation," he said to the narrator; "I was fully aware that unless Almighty God came to my assistance, I must perish in those uninhabited woods. I knew that I had walked more than fifty miles, although I had not met with a brook from which I could quench my thirst; I knew that if I should not meet with some stream I must die, for my axe was my only weapon, and although deer and bears now and then started within a few yards, or even feet of me, not one of them could I kill."

For several days and nights he continued to wander thus without food, until, he continued, "God must have taken pity on me, for as I ran wildly through those dreadful pine barrens, I met with a tortoise." This he killed with one blow of his axe, and having sucked the blood to allay his thirst, he made a hearty meal on the carcase; this night he slept soundly. In the morning he awoke much refreshed, and proceeded on his wanderings with greater spirit, while in the course of the day he killed a racoon, which he found sleeping. The remainder of his wanderings we shall describe in the words of the celebrated naturalist.

"Days passed, nay weeks, in succession; he fed now on cabbage-trees, then on frogs and snakes; all that fell in his way was welcome and savoury; yet he became daily emaciated, until at length he was scarcely able to crawl. Forty days had elapsed, by his own reckoning, when he at length reached the banks of the river; his clothes in tatters, his once bright axe dimmed with rust, his face begrimed with beard, his hair matted, and his feeble frame little better than a skeleton covered with parchment. There he laid himself down to die. Amid the perturbed dreams of a fevered fancy, he thought he heard the noise of oars far away on the silent river. He listened, but the sounds died away on his ear. It was indeed a dream, the last glimmer of expiring hope; and now the light of life was about to be quenched for ever, but again the sound of oars awoke him from his lethargy; he listened so eagerly that the hum of a fly could not have escaped his ear; they were indeed the measured beats of oars: and now, joy to the forlorn soul! the sound of human voices thrilled to his heart, and awoke the tumultuous pulses of returning hope. On his knees did the eye of God see that poor man, by the broad still stream that glittered in the sunbeams, and human eyes soon saw him too, for round that head-land, covered with brushwood, boldly advances the little boat, propelled by its lusty rowers. The lost one raises his feeble voice on high,—it was a loud shrill scream of joy and fear. The rowers pause and look around; another, but feeble scream, and they observe him. It comes—his heart flutters—his sight is dimmed—his brain reels—he gasps for breath—it comes! it has run upon the beach, and the lost one is found."

It only remains to say, that the distance between the cabin and the hammock to which the woodsman was bound scarcely exceeded eight miles, while the part of the river at which he was found was thirty-eight miles from his house; calculating his daily wanderings at ten miles, we may believe that they amounted in all to four hundred; he must, therefore, have rambled in a circuitous direction, which people generally do under such circumstances. Nothing but the great strength of his constitution and the merciful aid of his Maker, could have supported him for so long a time.—Saturday Magazine.

Sentences from Bishop Taylor.

"He that hath a charitable soul, will have a charitable hand, and will give his money to the poor, as he hath given his heart to God."

"A man must first learn himself before he can learn God."

"There is in every righteous man a new vital principle: the spirit of grace is the spirit of wisdom, and teaches us by secret inspirations, by proper arguments, by actual persuasions, by personal applications, by effects and energies; and as the soul of a man is the cause of all his vital operations, so is the Spirit of God the life of that life, and the cause of all actions and productions spiritual."

"A good life is the best way to understand wisdom and religion, because by the experiences and relishes of religion there is conveyed to them such a sweetness, to which all wicked men are strangers. There is in the things of God to them who practice them, a deliciousness that makes us love them, and that love admits us into God's cabinet, and strangely clarifies the understanding by the purification of the heart. When our reason is raised up by the Spirit of Christ, it is turned quickly into experience: when our faith relies upon the principles of Christ, it is changed into vision. So long as we know God only in the ways of man, by contentious learning, by arguing and dispute, we see nothing but the shadow of Him, and in that shadow we meet with many dark appearances, little certainty, and much conjecture."

"No man can be convinced well and wisely of the article of the holy, blessed, and undivided Trinity, but he that feels the mightiness of the Father begetting him to a new life, the wisdom of the Son, building him up in a most holy faith, and the love of the Spirit of God making him to become like God."

A Word from a Stranger about "Old St. Peter's."

MR. EDITOR,—REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

I read with great pleasure a few weeks since, in your columns, the appeal of "B." to the parishioners of St. Peter's; and with feelings of proportionate disappointment the reply of "Old Mortality" and the response of the Vestry.

Being frequently called by business to spend a day or two in your city, I have delighted, when detained over Sunday, or when my business allowed at the hour of prayer on a week day, to spend a part of my time in old St. Peter's; and, without attempting to account for the feeling, I may say that in no place from home do I feel so much at home. Whether it be from the peculiarly Church atmosphere, which, notwithstanding the awkward and incongruous form of the house, appears to fill its walls; or the politeness, or rather the courtesy shown by the congregation toward strangers, to which I bear grateful testimony, I know not; but whatever the feelings with which I may have trod your streets, whenever I entered its doors I felt myself no longer a stranger.

I well remember, on one occasion, hearing for the first time in that part of your city the unwonted but true Church sound of a merry chime of bells; and following the sound was led to St. Peter's; around which I found gathered quite a concourse of citizens gazing upward and wondering. Upon asking one of the spectators the occasion of the ringing and of the outside gathering, he significantly pointed upward. Following the direction of his finger, my eye rested on the holy symbol of the Christian's faith which surmounts the spire, until the overflowing of my heart dimmed its vision. I hope no member of the vestry who voted against rebuilding will sneer if I confess that I entered its walls and did, with a deeper devotion, "fall down and kneel before the Lord our Maker." When I left the city, as I stood looking backward from the deck of the vessel that was bearing me away, and above a fog, which then hid the city itself, caught sight of the cross of St. Peter's, resplendent in the morning sun, I could not but regard it as performing, in a secondary manner, the office of "Mother Church" herself, by drawing our eyes from the darkness of earth to the brightness of heaven; and its splendor, typical of the brightness reflected by that Church from the brighter Sun of Righteousness.

But having expressed the satisfaction I have had in worshipping in St. Peter's, I must now confess the extent to which I have realized the inconveniences of its uncouth arrangements, so truthfully stated by Mr. B. I pass over the shock to my feelings when, on my first visit, while kneeling at the ante-communion, I heard the minister's voice from behind me, and found I had turned my back to the chancel, to describe the embarrassment I felt every time I knelt, in endeavouring to assume a position that should not incommode those to whose politeness I was indebted. On more than one occasion I have been obliged to kneel in such a manner to prevent my feet from annoying a lady opposite, that I found it almost impossible to direct my thoughts to any thing but the uneasiness of my posture throughout the prayers; and not without fear that I had occasioned similar uneasiness to her. At one time I went into the gallery—thinking that, though I might not see or hear so well there, I should know that I did not disturb the devotions of others; and my experience confirms all B.'s objections to a seat there. My last visit happened to be on communion day. The pew in which I sat being full, in order not to incommode any one, I knelt in a position so constrained and uncomfortable that I was seized with a cramp in one of my legs, which was so painful that it was with great difficulty that I kept my position. Being loth to disturb the congregation or draw attention to myself by rising and leaving on so solemn an occasion, I endeavoured, by pinching and rubbing the muscles of my leg under my overcoat, to get through the service without exciting attention, after which, with some difficulty, I walked to my hotel.

After this experience, to which I suppose that of many others will agree, to some extent, I am surprised to learn that the vestry have "Resolved that it is inexpedient to make any material alteration in the interior of the Church." It does appear to me that, unless their object be to save all unnecessary expenditure with the view of rebuilding, it should be entirely remodelled inside. So much, in addition to the remarks of Mr. B. for objections to the present structure. As I could probably add little to the force of his reply to objections against rebuilding, I will content myself with relating a short anecdote.

Some time since a lady of your city visited ours. Wishing to impart interest to her visit, I proposed to show her our "lions." I took her to "the Holy Communion" and to "Old Trinity," as we still call her, and as you will speak of "Old St. Peter's" even when rebuilt. The first she admired of course, as every person of taste and feeling must; but as she was of the purely utilitarian school I watched with some interest to observe the effect which the latter would produce upon her. To my surprise she went through and around it, examining every part in perfect silence, except an occasional question for explanation of some of the decorations. After we had left the Church she said she supposed I wondered that she said nothing in praise of it, but that the truth was, her mind was so overpowered with a sense of solemnity and sublimity that she felt no disposition to talk, that she had never before been so affected; "but," she added after a pause, "think of so much cost laid out upon one building!" "My friend," said I, addressing her, "you have confessed that this building has excited a feeling of solemnity in your mind that no other ever produced. Let me ask you to represent the value of that feeling, if you can, by a sum of money. Then think of the ages this pile will stand and of the number that in the meantime will be similarly impressed by it. Multiply the sum by that number, and then tell me if you think "Old Trinity" has cost too much." She was again silent; but that silence could not be misunderstood.

In conclusion, Trinity, glorious as it is, and justly our boast, has some serious defects. The architect has, I suppose, done all that he could do in the trammels which the vestry put upon him; but, from my knowledge of the Rector and congregation of St. Peter's, I look to them for the most perfect stone embodiment of the "beauty of holiness," that shall adorn our land. For this it is not necessary to emulate the size or cost of Trinity. A moiety of each will suffice. I think with B. that, notwithstanding the recent action of its vestry, St. Peter's will yet be reconstructed; and, blest as the congregation is with means, until that time the question will apply with peculiar force to them "How much owest thou unto my Lord?"

Yours, in the "one faith,"
D. F., of Mannahata.

BISHOP OTEY'S ADDRESS TO THE MISSISSIPPI CONVENTION.

A Clergyman of the Diocese has kindly favored us with the following extract from Bishop Otey's Address to the Convention of Mississippi. The Bishop, it will be seen, has taken strong and decided ground in reference to the "Society for promoting Evangelical Knowledge." Had not our Right Reverend Fathers seen fit to speak on this subject, the Banner would have kept silence. We have therefore rejected able communications on this subject. As some of the Bishops were among the leaders in this matter, it became the office of the Bishops to declare the grounds upon which this organization should be opposed.

We consider it a pleasing proof of the discretion and good temper of that class of our Church Journals, which must from principle be opposed to this movement, that they have carefully abstained from giving any provocation. Thus the whole burden of blame, for the evil wrought to the Church of God by this movement, must rest upon those who have originated it. What they have done they have done deliberately and without opposition or provocation. It is not for us to speak of the action of those Bishops who have thought it their duty to encourage this Society in their own Dioceses. But we reiterate what we before said, that if a regularly constituted organization can be formed in a Diocese, in opposition to the wish of the BISHOP, THE STANDING COMMITTEE and THE CONVENTION, there is an end at once of all rule and all authority among us. The effect of such movements and unwarrantable interferences will be to hasten on the day when our Church Confederation will be broken up, and the Church in the United States resolve herself into independent Dioceses. It is remarkable that two of our Bishops from the extremes of the Church, have, without concert, at the same time and in almost the same terms, spoken on this subject. And we doubt not these voices from the North and South will soon be followed by similar voices from the East and West.

The Evangelical Knowledge Society.

An Extract from the Address of the Rt. Rev. J. H. Otey, D. D., to the Convention of Mississippi, in 1848.

 The only drawback to the happy influence, which the meeting together of so many Clergymen and laymen of our communion, at the late General Convention, and the friendly interchange of opinions were calculated to produce, was the organization of a Society styling itself the Evangelical Association, for the avowed purpose of arresting an alleged tendency to corruptions and errors, which that Society, in its published circular, asserts unhappily pervades the whole Church. I heard nothing of this movement while at the General Convention.—Those who were concerned in it, of course had a right to conceal their objects and purposes from whomsoever they pleased. We deny not their right to organize for any purpose which they may conceive to be good; but we do deny to them, most emphatically, the right, in subordination to sound principles of order and charity, of pronouncing a judgment upon the character of brethren, who, holding to the Head, may happen to differ in opinion with them—of proclaiming to the world that error, soul-perilling error is pervading the whole church, and then inviting every man who will pay a dollar per annum to assist them in the work of expounding the Articles, Liturgy, and Homilies of the Church—of interpreting and declaring what are the true doctrines of the Reformation.

I speak for myself, when I declare that this movement is the most dangerous to our peace I have ever known to be made in the Church in this country; and if sustained by any large number of our Communion, as inevitably destined to end in schism. I deny the right or authority of this Association to send its publications, without my consent, into the Dioceses over which I am overseer, and I humbly trust that the Clergy and people of my charge, instead of taking the sweeping declarations of this Association, that errors and corruptions are pervading the whole Church, will examine and judge for themselves, and will give no preference to the publications of the Society over that of any other which may present equal or stronger claims to patronage, founded upon a just understanding, and fearless avowal of Evangelical truth, and Apostolic order.

In the list of members appended to the published circular of the Association, I find the names of many brethren of the highest character for intelligence, zeal, and piety; and while purity of motive is readily conceded to them, as influencing their purpose, we claim with them the right of declaring our opinion of its wisdom. We heartily wish they had let it alone; and we as heartily exhort you, brethren, to have nothing to do with an enterprise, which grounding its pretensions to acceptance upon alleged corruptions in doctrine in our communion, undertakes to correct through an irresponsible Association, what it would not attempt through the General Council or Convention, and which promises, as you may well believe, to end in nothing good to our ancient, venerable apostolical church.

Our kind correspondent adds to the above extract, the following remarks, and gives us also an interesting account of the ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE DIOCESE OF MISSISSIPPI. This Diocese meets with a great loss in Bishop Otey's withdrawal from its oversight. We are pained to hear that the state of his health renders this necessary. Of the blessing which has rested upon his Episcopal labors, the following account will also tell. Earnest prayers will be offered up that he may be completely restored to health, and his valuable life long preserved to his friends and the church for whose good he has so long and faithfully labored.

So far as I am aware (and I had the means of knowing) all, both Clergy and Laity, responded to the Bishop's views and opinions. Had we deemed it necessary, resolutions reiterating our apprehension of the bad principles and tendencies of this Evangelical Knowledge Society, would have been proposed and passed in full Convention.

At Bishop Otey's own earnest, and often repeated request, the Convention released him from his provisional charge of Mississippi. To us this is a sad separation: for we know him well, having had his services now for thirteen years, during which time he has built up our church, and now leaves it upon such a footing as no American Diocese ever had previous to the election of its first permanent Diocesan. When he first came among us, we had but one settled Clergyman—he leaves us with not less than twenty actively engaged; and had we half as many more approved laborers, they could be at once usefully employed, and comfortably supported. Bishop Otey came amongst us in our weakness—he leaves us in strength. God has graciously and abundantly blessed his labors in our behalf; and now a peaceful, united, happy, and prosperous Diocese bids him a tearful adieu. Though he long since urged upon us to release him, yet we did not until his failing health wrung from us our reluctant consent. Our heart's desire and prayer to God is, that when we elect a Bishop (at our next Convention) we may find him just such a man as we now have lost.

On Saturday, May 14, in the morning, the Rev. David Kerr, was instituted as Rector of his Church, Jefferson county, and in the evening seven persons were confirmed.

On Sunday, the Rev. E. H. Downing, (of Kirkwood,) and Rev. E. Fontaine, (of Aberdeen,) deacons, were admitted by the Bishop to Priest's orders. Morning prayer was said by Rev. J. A. Fox, and Rev. S. C. Kerr. The Rev. S. Patterson, (of Vicksburg,) preached. Revs. McLeod, D. Kerr, Fox, Giles, and Patterson, joined in the imposition of hands.

Of the Clergy, Revs. Patterson, Giles, D. Kerr, and Cleaver were elected delegates to the General Convention.

The Standing Committee consists of Revs. Messrs. Patterson (President) and Giles, and Geo. S. Yerger and W. C. Smedes, Esqrs., of Vicksburg.

But little actual business was done in the Convention, for it was our happiness to have but little to do. The great object and office of such assemblies together, should ever be to commune with each other, and with our Lord—to plan for the enlargement and edification of His kingdom, and to begin the work at once, by laboring in prayer and exhortation, to bring the plan of our meeting to that soundness of knowledge, that energy of purpose, and that warmth of zeal that from it, as a centre, both heat and light may emanate to the salvation of men, and the glory of God. Such was the object of the late Mississippi Convention; all residents and visitors, were blessed, and we feel that it "was good to be there." May God revive His work in the midst of the years, so that Zion may arise and shine—that her light may come, and the glory of her Lord arise upon her.

We learn from another correspondent, that "eight new Parishes were received into union with the Convention. Through the blessing of God we have a united and happy Diocese. God hath done great things for us, whereof we may well be glad."

The Church and Odd fellowship.

MR. EDITOR:

In the last "Banner of the Cross" you re-publish, with approbatory comment, a Communication from "The Churchman," upon the subject of Odd-fellowship, and its all-god interference with the sacred offices of the Church. As this Communication is founded upon views that are entirely erroneous, and assumes as facts many things that are in nowise countenanced as part of the system of Odd-fellowship, I am impelled, albeit, no controversialist, to pen a reply in refutation of its statements; trusting that you will cheerfully accord a hearing to both sides of the question.

I am a Churchman and an Odd-fellow; and while I humbly trust that my Church is, and ever will be, first in my affections, I hesitate not to confess a warm attachment to my Lodge; nor from an intimate knowledge of the principles and practices of the institution, have I ever been able to discover that the two relations are in the smallest degree inconsistent with each other. Odd-fellowship has no pretensions to being a religious association, in any sense of the word; its members arrogate to it no religious sanctity; nor are any of its acts performed in the name of religion. It claims no divine origin, nor does it like Masonry, an institution of which many of our Clergy are members, date its existence anterior to apostolical times, and attempt to prove one of the inspired evangelists to have been of the brotherhood. Odd-fellowship is of worldly origin; it was devised by men—fallible men, for the inculcation of those principles and the performance of those duties among men, which as rational and social beings, members of the great human family, that owns a common Creator, they are bound to cherish and practice. It is designed for the cultivation of fraternal feelings among men, regardless of condition, station, party or creed; and to keep them alive by the exercise of the benevolent and charitable offices that spring spontaneously from the human heart, until choked, withered and blighted by the rough blasts of intercourse with a selfish world. It takes for its guiding-star one of the sublime commandments on which "hang all the law and the prophets," and which our Divine Redeemer has aptly illustrated in the beautiful parable of "the Good Samaritan." If, in the performance of such kindly offices, the Odd-fellow chances to tread upon ground which the Church leaves neglected, surely it would be uncharitable to find fault with him, and unfair to charge him with improper interference.

I have no knowledge of any "official exposition of the principles of Odd-fellowship," other than what is contained in the books and documents emanating from, and sanctioned by the highest authority of the Order. True, we have newspapers, &c. professing to be its organs; but I believe they are in no case recognized as such by the constituted authority aforesaid. They are mostly established and conducted by irresponsible individuals, for the purpose of gain, and entirely independent of any supervision by the chief officers of the Order. Such being the case, you will readily acknowledge that they are no more to be implicitly relied on, as true exponents of Odd-fellowship, than are the various party newspapers that are published in the name of the Church, as correct sources of information regarding its distinctive features and doctrines. For these, we must refer to its articles and liturgy; and for the true explanation of Odd-fellowship, we must look to its authorized Constitutions.

The "burial service" of the Odd-fellows appears to be its principal objection on the part of our Clergy. Well, I do not intend to prove the necessity, or show the propriety of this service; but merely to state that it is a prescribed ceremony, simple in form and unobjectionable in feature; not intended as a substitute for, or to interfere with the solemn devotions of religion, but only as a tribute to the memory of a departed brother. Its use is not obligatory, never obtruded, or in any way recommended; but adopted in such cases alone, where desired by a deceased brother, or his family connections. I have never seen an attempt made to append it to the sacred service of the Church, or mix it up with it in any way. When performed, it modestly defers to the solemn rites of religion, and never commences until all but Odd-fellows (and those who choose to remain) have left the grave. To my view, there is nothing more objectionable in this, than in following up the burial service of the Church, with a volley of musketry, as is invariably done when a soldier is interred with military honors, and against which I have never heard our Clergy complain.

The usages of the Order nowhere sanction the blasphemy of addressing our Blessed Redeemer as the Grand Patriarch, Five Grand, &c., and the Almighty Father, as the Great Lodge Master; and I need hardly add, that none but the irreverent tongue of a "Socinian preacher" would dare to utter such blasphemous words. But here again, it is as unfair to judge the character of an Association, by the sayings and acts of some of its members, as it is to estimate Christianity by what many of its professed disciples do in its name.

It appears to me, Mr. Editor, and I say it respectfully, that many of our Clergy, in their exclusive devotion to the interests of those "who are of the household of faith," forget entirely the injunction of Holy Writ, to "do good unto all men, as they have opportunity." They draw a contracted circle around them, which they call "the Church," and imagining that they are to cherish no sympathies, except for those within it, and have no duties to perform amongst the multitude without it, they live along in frigid exclusiveness, so totally different from their divine Exemplar, who went about doing good, while he sojourned on earth, that one would scarcely believe them his commissioned heralds of peace and good-will. In this respect, the "Socinian preacher" adopts a wiser, and to say the least, more politic course. He does not confine himself at home; but goes abroad daily, vigilantly seeking a favorable time and place to sow his tares. He applies for admission to the Odd-fellows Lodge, and finding that here he has the ground almost entirely clear, (for the prejudices of the Orthodox Clergy generally, deter them from becoming Odd-fellows) goes to work insidiously to promulgate his dangerous and damning heresies, by acting as speaker upon the public occasions that from time to time transpire, and officiating as Chaplain whenever he can insinuate himself into the funeral processions of the Order, in his ministerial capacity.

I trust, Mr. Editor, that my crude remarks—too long, I fear, to gain admission into your columns—may lead you and the Clergy of the Church generally, to think less harshly of an institution of whose principles you must necessarily be mainly ignorant; and whatever may be its seeming inconsistencies, to judge it in the spirit of true charity, not by these, but by its legitimate fruits. What they are, it does not become me to boast; suffice it to say, that they will be found in many a humble abode of poverty; at the sick-bed of many a friendless sufferer; in the habitations of the dying; and in the cheerless dwellings of the widow and orphan. I. O. O. F.

Reading, Pa. May 22, 1848.

We publish the above communication as we consider it due to justice that every accused party should be heard in defence. We would request the writer, and those who feel with him, to reconsider our editorial remarks, to which he refers. It will be seen that we found more fault with the Church for her sins of omission, than with the Society of Odd-fellows for any sins of commission. We admit and deplore the lack of that practical and comprehensive charity in the Church, which has caused the establishment of such institutions to supply the deficiency. We hold most decidedly the opinion, that the Church of God is His commissioned agent for extending and perpetuating upon earth, Religion and Morality, and for supplying not only the spiritual but temporal wants of the destitute. The Church of Christ should be the general Almoner of Heaven upon earth, "dispensing good" to the bodies as well as souls of men. We believe that there can be no true Christianity without charity, and equally do we believe in the converse of this proposition, that there can be no true charity separate and distinct from Christianity. This St. Paul teaches us in his sublime and comprehensive picture of charity, wherein he tells us that we may bestow all our goods to feed the poor "and have not charity."

Now, our correspondent "I. O. O. F.," states plainly that the Order of Odd-fellows have no connection with any religious system, and recognize no form of Christianity. He says, "Odd-fellowship has no pretensions to being a religious association in any sense of the word—nor are any of its acts performed in the name of Religion." And yet he complains of the Ministers of the Church for not joining in such an institution of charity, and therein battling with "all sorts" of Ministers for influence. By his own showing there must be something wrong in a scheme which one of its friends admits, offers "the ground almost entirely clear" where any one can "go to work insidiously to promulgate his dangerous and damning heresies."—As to what this correspondent says about our Ministers, "they draw a contracted circle around them, which they call the Church"—we have only to remark, if the Church is "a contracted circle," it is because man's unfaithfulness has made it so. The circle of her blessed influence should be broad as the horizon of heavenly mercy. Her "sympathies" should be warm and wide reaching as the love of Christ. Her members may be faithless in carrying out the glorious principles by which she is to be animated, but it is at their peril; in opposition to such charges as this—"Whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" In our Master's name we protest against man's taking from the Church the noblest functions and offices which He has given her to perform on earth. If human societies, altogether distinct from her, must be formed to uphold temperance, morality and charity in the earth, then what has the Church to do for the present good of man? Will not the hearts of men be thus more turned from the Gospel and its institutions of mercy, to drink from the cisterns which they have hewn for themselves?

In conclusion, although we admit the Church does not acquit herself of all her duty in this respect, she is not so far delinquent as some would think. The help which these human societies administer, and we honor them and bless them for their noble deeds of mercy, is often proclaimed to the world. We read in the public newspapers the account of sick strangers who have been watched over in their last hours, and then buried by their brethren of the "I. O. O. F." But who knows how many poor and needy are supplied, in their daily wants, by every Parish and Church in our land? Who can tell how many sick-beds of the poor and the stranger are attended by our Ministers and others? Who can say how many are thus provided with their last earthly resting places? Let these human societies give their means to swell the scanty coffers of the Church, and the record of her deeds of mercy will present a still richer and more blessed account. And they who thus "lend to the Lord," will receive the reward promised by our Gracious Master. "And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only, IN THE NAME OF A DISCIPLE, verily I say unto you, he shall in nowise lose his reward."

Although this article is longer than we designed, we must add the following communication, whose closing fact is a most startling one, and demands thoughtful attention."

For the Banner of the Cross.

"Independent Order of Odd-fellows."

MR. EDITOR:—I observe that The Churchman of last week contained several communications, pro and con, in relation to this growing Society; and infer from the editor's remarks, that its columns are to be opened to a free and full discussion of the subject. This is well; and I presume that you are no less willing to have examined, such grave questions as it cannot fail to suggest to the sober Christian and thoughtful Churchman. Of the benevolent and philanthropic objects of the Society, I desire to speak with respect and kindness; but this, as your contemporary justly says, "is entirely consistent with a painful apprehension, and even with a clear opinion, that the Society itself may come, in sundry points, in collision with the Church." Of its ultimate tendencies I have always had serious fears; and these fears are increased by two of the communications in The Churchman, which are evidently from intelligent and earnest men, who are well acquainted with the principles of the Constitution of the Order. One speaks plainly of "the infidel tendencies of Odd-fellowship"—calls it "an instrument for the promulgation of infidelity"—and declares that "its principles are opposed to and inconsistent with our duty to the Church." He says he "speaks deliberately and from experience," and "stands prepared to defend his assertions"; and adds, "as a professed infidel I once defended the principles of Odd-fellowship; as a Churchman, I hold it to be my duty to oppose them, and shall not shrink from the responsibility."

Another correspondent, who tells us that he is "a member of the 'friendly Order'—but not an acting one," says, "there is no human association so well calculated as 'Odd-fellowship', to lure away the members of the Church from religious ordinances and duties, and to make infidels of them. I know one instance where a Christian, and a communicant, gave up communion of the Church for 'Odd-fellowship.'"

I know another precisely similar instance, Mr. Editor; and it is to give it, as an additional illustration of the tendencies of this Order, that I trouble you with this article. The following is a copy, verbatim, of a letter addressed to the Acting Warden of one of our Churches in this city. Philadelphia

April 14, 1847.

DEAR SIR:—The circumstances under which I find myself, as a member of the Independent Order of Odd-fellows, and at the same time a member of ~~any~~ Church, renders it necessary for me to withdraw my connexion from one or the other of these institutions.

As Mr. — (the Rector of the parish) has declared that the ceremonies pertaining to Odd-fellowship are incompatible with the Government of the Church, and as I believe that the spirit and genius of Odd-fellowship is most congenial to genuine Christianity, I therefore deem it my duty, as a consistent man and a Christian, to withdraw from the Church altogether. You will therefore have the goodness to erase my name from the list of members of — Church, as I shall no longer consider myself a member of the same. But believe me ever to remain respectfully yours,

I fear that not a few have unhappily followed the awful example of this poor man, and that many more may be betrayed into the same dreadful snare. Surely it is time for the Church to speak out on this subject.

Rev. Dr. Coleman

CONVENTION OF VIRGINIA.—While we thank "a subscriber" for his kindness in sending an account of this Convention, the Rule laid down by us, will forbid our publishing it. As it contains strong censures of others besides the Bishops, we could not publish it without the name of the author. This Convention besides the usual exercises of a Diocesan Convention, held frequent religious services, beginning at early hours in the morning, and was also much occupied in forming an auxiliary to the Society, for the promotion of Evangelical Knowledge.—We learn from the Southern Churchman that at the opening services on Wednesday morning, Bishop Johns preached from 2 Thess. iii. 1.

After the morning service of Wednesday, the Convention assembled for business in the Lecture room of the Church, a large and handsome building, capable of containing some three or four hundred persons. About seventy of the Clergy answered to their names. The addresses of the Bishops were delivered, the certificates of Lay Delegates read and the Convention adjourned to Thursday.

On Thursday, the most important business was the reading a new code of Diocesan canons, proposed by a Committee appointed for the purpose, of which Bishop Johns is chairman, and the appointment of committees.

On Friday morning the first subject discussed was a proposed amendment to the Constitution, by which some Clergymen not at present entitled to seats, may be admitted. On motion the subject was laid upon the table.

The remainder of the day was chiefly taken up with a discussion of the proposed Canons.

On Friday evening a meeting was held in the Lecture room to organize an auxiliary to the Society for promoting Evangelical Knowledge. Such an auxiliary was formed, of which Bishop Meade is President, and Bishop Johns, Vice President, with other officers, whose names will duly appear. Immediately after a public meeting was held in Christ Church, which was filled to overflowing. Addresses were delivered by the Bishops, by the Rev. Mr. Newton, of Philadelphia, Philip Williams, Esq., and the Rev. Dr. Jones.

On Saturday morning the Convention adopted a report and resolutions recommending the Southern Churchman to the confidence and patronage of the Diocese. In the Bishop's address it will be seen the same subject is referred to as one of importance.

The remainder of the morning was occupied with an animated discussion on the new code of Canons proposed. These when duly considered, will be referred to the next Convention for final decision.

A Canon which occupied considerable time and excited much discussion, was one with respect to cases of repelled communiciants. It was proposed that in certain circumstances a court of five laymen should be called, if required, to judge such cases and report to the Bishop for his approval or otherwise. This provision was rejected and another adopted, the purport of which was merely for the examination of evidence in any required case, by a commission of one layman and one Clergyman, who shall report to the Bishop for his final judgment.

But the Canon which excited most interest was another of the same class. It was proposed that among the subjects of discipline to be enumerated, the following should be added to the report of the committee:

"— Gaming, attendance on horse-racing and theatrical amusements, witnessing immodest and licentious exhibitions or shows, attending public balls, habitual neglect of public worship, or a denial of the doctrines of the Gospel as generally set forth in the authorized standards of the Church, are offences for which discipline should be exercised. This enumeration however, shall not be construed to include all the subjects of discipline in the Church."

This Canon, proposed by the Rev. Mr. Norwood, was very cordially and with much feeling responded to by several influential lay-gentlemen, and finally unanimously passed. It is still subject to the decision of another Convention, but from the strong and general feeling and the unanimous vote in its favor, there can be no doubt of the result. In the course of the discussion some few objected on the ground of expediency. The Bishops both signified their cordial approbation of the Canon.

During the afternoon session the whole body of Canons was adopted, and referred for final consideration to the next Convention.

It was also decided that the next session of the Convention should be held at WHEELING.

On Saturday evening, at 8 o'clock, the Convention re-assembled. The report of the committee on the State of the Church was read. It gave a favorable representation of the condition of the Diocese, especially in relation to the harmony and unity of sentiment generally prevalent. The number of communicants added during the past year has been about five hundred.

Foreign Intelligence.

The most important news received by the last steamer is that from Rome. Concerning this the English Churchman gives the following.

ROME.—The Genoa Gazette publishes the following from Civita Vecchia of the 1st:—"The people of Rome, aware of the uncertain policy of Pius IX. in the Italian question, had been stimulating him for some time past with addresses, to induce him to declare war against Austria. He assembled the College of Cardinals, and in a consistory made a speech which caused the greatest anxiety throughout Rome. He said that all he had done up to this day was the mere fulfilment of the memorandum of 1830; that he could not, as the head of the Church, declare war against his children in Christ; that if the other Princes of Italy had taken a part in the struggle, they had been driven to do so by their subjects; that the Pontifical troops had received no other mission than that of defending his own states, and that if they had crossed the Po they had transgressed his orders. Meanwhile, great preparations were in progress. The Ministry resigned en masse, but Pius refused to accept their resignation. On the 30th ultimo the whole general staff held a sitting. The municipality went in procession to the Pope, to demand explanations as to his policy, and recommend him to abdicate. The civic guard took possession of all the gates of the city, and had orders to let no one, whether Priest, Bishop, or even the Pope himself, leave the town. The spirit of the ten thousand civic guard is excellent. It is said this act of Pius IX. was caused by numerous protests of German Bishops, who threatened him with a schism should he declare himself the enemy of Austria. On the 29th the excitement was extreme. The Pope has been allowed time to consider till the 30th. It appears that, should he refuse, a Provisional Government would be established. Terenzio Mamiani was spoken of as the future Minister of Foreign Affairs. The Pope would retain the title of Bishop of Rome. There are scarcely any troops of the line in the capital."

To which the same paper adds the following in a postscript.

The Piedmontese Gazette, of the 5th inst., contains a letter from Civita Vecchia of the 2d inst., which states that the Pope had yielded to the persuasions of the patriot Mauriani, who announced to the people that the Ministers remained, except Cardinal Antonelli replaced by him, Mauriani. The Ministers possess full power over all temporal affairs, including the questions of war. All the private correspondence of the Cardinals, which had been seized, was read to the public on the Capitol by a Senator. Mauriani, after haranguing the people, made the following declarations:—

- 1st. No Priest shall be appointed to fill any public employment.
- 2d. War shall be formally declared.
- 3d. Pius IX. is the head of the Government.
- 4th. A daily official bulletin shall be published of the great war.
- 5th. Encouragement shall be afforded to the Roman youth to arm, and to proceed to drive the barbarians from Italy.

Some arrests have been made, and amongst others the Commander of the Fort of Ancona. The Romans are perfectly united, and the Cardinals are gathering round the Pope now that they see his departure is impossible, for which they had made every preparation. The Ministers have promised to press the war, and to co-operate with the other powers of the State to drive out the Austrians. The Austrian Minister was to be expelled from Rome. The Austrian Government, in conjunction with the Jesuits, it is said, had concerted a cabal, in consequence of which all the German Bishops menaced the Pope with a schism if he declared war against Austria.

This paper also contains an interesting account of the Ninth Anniversary of "the Ecclesiological, late Cambridge Camden Society." We extract the following, and regret we have not room for the whole report.

"The Committee have continued a friendly intercourse with the sister associations of a similar nature. The Architectural and Archaeological Society of Buckinghamshire may be mentioned as a new one during the past year. They have also the great pleasure of mentioning their connection with the New York Ecclesiological Society, just established in that city. Another Ecclesiological Society in the United States is also proposed to be founded; and your Committee are glad to say that their assistance has been frequently asked, and prized in the most flattering way, by many of their brethren of the American Church.

"In the United States, indeed, and in the English Colonies, the Society may now reckon some of its best friends, and may see the most gratifying results of its exertions. Your Committee do not propose to enter at large upon the services they have been able to render to the Colonial Dioceses. The series of contributions, from various hands, on Colonial Church Architecture in the Ecclesiologist, will show what interest has been taken in that practically useful subject."

The (London) Guardian of May 10th in its notice of "the week" says:

"The Jewish legislation bill has gone through committee in the House of Commons, and been read a first time in the House of Lords. The second reading stands at present for to-morrow (Thursday) fortnight the 25th of this month. The third reading in the Lower House was strongly opposed. Sir F. Thesiger, the Attorney-General of the late Administration, heading the opposition. The strangest part of the present debates on this measure—a measure which, often as it has been discussed before, has never hitherto been advocated, as far as we remember, on positively religious grounds—has been the ingenuity with which earnest and good men, whose sympathies have been against the innovation, but who have been unable to endure the obloquy of opposing themselves to the general current of liberal opinion, have persuaded themselves that to make Jews legislators for the Church was good Christianity, and the right and religious thing to do. Lord Morpeth thinks the step a fulfilment of prophecy; Mr. Palmer finds no Scripture warrant for excluding the holder of any anti-Christian principles from legislation; and Mr. Wood thinks it a Christian duty to submit ourselves to Jewish power. There is one short answer to all this, viz., that Parliament now legislates for Christian communities on the very questions of their constitution, government, and even tenets. And as to there being no authority for Christian government in the New Testament, it might as well be said there was none for Christian life. A people of Christians ought to be governed by Christians; and if there is no text which says in terms that Jews ought not to sit in St. Stephen's Chapel in the nineteenth century, there is certainly none either which says that a Christian member of Parliament, as soon as elected, ought to divest himself of his Christianity, and act upon principles of universal (that is, infidel) application. The division was 234 to 173, leaving a majority only of 61. The majority on the second reading was 73."

SILENT MEETINGS.—The spirited and practical communication of "Vocula," claims particular attention. Our animated service loses its life when the responses are unheard, or heard only as unmeaning murmurs. The people of God resign the noble privilege which the Church gives them of taking their part in the worship of the Most High, when they do not audibly respond. We must refer "Vocula" to some one who keeps the run of the new Canons to say whether there has been any enactment on the subject. There are so many new Canons made that one who has charge of a parish and a paper, can hardly be expected to know all these changes.

A SERMON before the CHURCHMEN'S MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION for Seamen of the PORT of PHILADELPHIA. By the RT. REV. ALONZO POTTER, Bishop of the Diocese of Pennsylvania. Preached Sunday evening, February 20th, 1848, in St. Andrew's Church, Philada. R. S. H. George, 16 South Seventh street, 1848.

This admirable sermon, which was preached and is now published for the benefit of a noble enterprise, is filled not only with strong reasoning and forcible eloquence, but also with most interesting facts bearing upon its subject. It will well repay those who give it an attentive perusal. And as the profits of its sale are to be given to the Association, we hope it may be widely circulated. Its appropriate text is from St. Mark iv: 1 and 2. We will give an extract in our next number as the surest means of exciting more desire to procure the whole sermon.

ADDRESS OF THE RT. REV. A. POTTER, D. D., to the 64th Convention of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, delivered May 17th, 1848, Phila., King & Baird, 9 George st.

As the Convention recommended this address to be read in every parish in the Diocese, we shall withhold, for a number of two, such extracts as are of interest to the church at large. The form in which it is published does great credit to the printers.

THOUGHTS ON THE GOSPEL MIRACLES. By the REV. JOHN WILLIAMS, D. D., Rector of St. George's, Schenectady, New York: Stanford and Swords, 139 Broadway, 1848.

This work treats of a most important class of subjects, which are often imperfectly comprehended and not seldom altogether misunderstood. Although the author has confined himself to narrow limits he gives us much valuable and important information. It is a grateful proof of the progress of our Church, not only in the number but in the character of her ministry, that her young and hard working Clergy can find time for such good works. The scope of this work may be inferred from the author's "division of the Gospel Miracles."

- I. Those miracles that relate to the world of nature.
- II. Those that relate to the physical world of man.
- III. Those that relate to the world of Spirits; and
- IV. Those that relate to the resurrection of the dead."

The author takes entirely a distinct track from that pursued by "Trench," though he has inadvertently stated in the Preface that "Trench" is not republished in this country. "Appleton's beautiful republication of this admirable work was noticed in the Banner some time ago. But this makes Dr. Williams' work none the less valuable or acceptable.

The work is very well printed and in most convenient form.

ECCLESIASTICAL MNEMONIKA, or Aid to the memory in storing a correct knowledge of Ecclesiastical Dates. Together with such other aid to the memory as may be served by a summary of interesting facts. Alphabetically arranged and established by the best Authorities. By R. M. ABERCROMBIE, Rector of St. Andrew's Church, and Church of the Intercession, New York. Spalding & Shepard, 189½ Broadway, 1848.

This work, a copy of which has just reached us, will be found a most useful companion for a study table. For ourselves, we much prefer having such a store of useful facts laid up, in convenient form, and in a well bound volume, than to tax the memory with such a difficult charge. This most useful book, which shows very great labor and extensive research, will serve those who have good memories, and through means of this collection of names, dates, and facts they may "store it well"—or it will answer for those whose memories are not retentive, and who prefer trusting to the more faithful pages of a well arranged Manual.

THE BRITISH FEMALE POETS; WITH BIOGRAPHICAL AND CRITICAL NOTICES, by GEO. W. BETHUNE, Philadelphia: Lindsay & Blakiston, 1848. This is truly a beautiful volume. And its external form is a meet symbol of the grace and beauty found within. Dr. Bethune has chosen a popular subject, on which to show his taste and learning. This Rev. gentleman's well deserved fame as a poet, gives him peculiar fitness for his office. He has sustained this repute in our esteem, by the judgment with which he has culled the choicest flowers from a garden filled with such varied beauty. The biographical notices are peculiarly happy. They are of necessity brief, but they generally have the merit of giving much in few words. "The British Female Poets" is a proof that lofty genius often chooses to abide with the gentler portion of our race. This publication is a tribute worthy of a true poet, to the sex which has ever been esteemed that of the Muses.

THE AMERICAN QUARTERLY REGISTER AND MAGAZINE.—Conducted by James Stryker. May, 1848, Volume I, No. 1, Philadelphia. E. C. & J. Biddle, No. 6 South Fifth Street. The first number of this Periodical promises well. It is full of valuable information, and will no doubt, be a most useful and interesting work. We have quoted one or two articles from its selections.

CHURCH REVIEW AND ECCLESIASTICAL REGISTER.—This Quarterly Magazine is published at New Haven, Ct., on the first of April, July, October, and January. It is devoted to the exposition and defence of the doctrine, discipline and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States; to the promotion of an elevated Christian Literature; and to a faithful record of important Ecclesiastical, University and Missionary intelligence from all parts of the world.

An outline of our plan was submitted to the Bishops of the American Church, and several Right Rev. Gentlemen expressed their approbation of the enterprise, in the following language:—

"We are of opinion that the American Church needs a periodical of high character, through which her ablest writers may, from time to time, convey their sentiments to the public, and we feel confident, that by avoiding extremes, and adhering closely to the principles laid down in our Book of Common Prayer, the proposed Review will meet the hearty co-operation of Churchmen."

Rt. Rev. Thos. C. Brownell, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Connecticut.

Rt. Rev. L. Silliman Ives, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of N. C.
 " J. H. Hopkins, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Vt.
 " Jackson Kemper, D. D., Missionary Bishop, &c.
 " Samuel A. McCoskry, D. D., Bishop of Michigan.
 " J. P. K. Henshaw, D. D., Bishop of Rhode Island.
 " Carlton Chase, D. D., Bishop of New Hampshire.
 " N. H. Cobbs, D. D., Bishop of Alabama.
 " George W. Freeman, D. D., Missionary Bishop for Arkansas, &c.

Rt. Rev. George Burgess, D. D., Bishop of Maine.

"A Quarterly Review, conducted with ability, and representing the interests and principles of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, would be of great service. Should the proposed Church Review assume this character, it will richly merit the support of Episcopalians."

Rt. Rev. Alonzo Potter, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Pa.
 A large number of prominent Presbyters of the Church also kindly allowed us to use their names in commendation of the work.

We are sorry to learn from good authority, that the above work is not receiving in our city, that patronage which it well deserves. We hope that the above recommendations will have their effect in urging the members of the Church to sustain this able Review. The only way of doing so is by subscribing at once and not waiting until it fails to see whether it will succeed.

MR. EDITOR:

Will you be kind enough to inform me if, during my absence of six years, there were any canons made, or rubrics altered, to prevent the members of the Episcopal Church from repeating the responses?

Having been deprived for a long time, of the enjoyment of the services of the Sanctuary, I anticipated a renewal of my privileges with peculiar delight. I cannot describe my various sensations when I found myself again seated in the beloved old church which I had regularly attended from my earliest childhood. A train of painfully pleasing reminiscences presented themselves in rapid succession to my mind when I thought how many of my former fellow-worshippers in this holy temple had been translated, I firmly believed, into the courts above. I soared on the wings of contemplation, and in imagination beheld them offering their adorations before the throne; I heard the hallelujahs of the blest, and longed to be emancipated from the shackles of mortality, that I might join the celestial choir. In no way can we enjoy a greater foretaste of these heavenly delights than by uniting, heart, soul and voice, in the varied and elevating services of our incomparable Liturgy. Upon this occasion I hoped to enjoy a prelibation of the bliss of heaven, but my expectations were not realized. When the minister repeated the confession I did not hear an audible response. This I thought might proceed from a misapprehension of the words "humble voice," which they considered synonymous with "whispering." I did hear a low murmuring or buzzing sound, and thought I had wandered into an assembly of that zealous denomination who abandoned the Liturgy, but being accustomed to respond, substituted this unintelligible murmuring. It appeared anomalous to pronounce the absolution where there had been no distinct confession of sin.

When the minister so devoutly prayed, "O Lord, open thou our lips," and no one responded, and "our lips shall show forth thy praise," I felt bewildered, thinking I had wandered into a meeting house where the members were engaged in silent worship. But I observed by the dress of the congregation, although it was unexceptionable, that they did not belong to that denomination of Christians who are distinguished by the plainness and simplicity of their costume. As the estimation of their religious character is graduated by almost imperceptible shades of difference in the plain colours they adopt, the selection frequently excites more interest than the preparation of grayer apparel in those who attach no undue importance to dress, and as the officiating minister performed his part, I knew I was in a Church. I looked around and examined the peculiar architecture of the church, and was convinced that I was in the right place.

When they arose after the first Lesson, I thought it would be impossible for them to refuse to unite in the "Te Deum laudamus, with the Cherubim and Seraphim, the Apostles, Prophets and noble army of martyrs, but observed they left their part of the worship to be performed exclusively by the heavenly host, and "the angels who excel in strength," as it is said in this sublime chant, "The Holy Church throughout the world doth acknowledge Thee." By their silence, they virtually unchurched themselves. From the operative faith, practical piety, and Christian courtesy which characterized many of this congregation, I felt convinced that they were worshipping God in "spirit and in truth." At first I regretted that they had forgotten the last clause of the 10th verse, in the 10th chapter of Romans, "with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation," (see also 9th verse, and passim;) but I knew they had studied the word of God too diligently to forget such an essential part. During the singing I again felt bewildered, when I observed the choir were expected to perform that part of the worship exclusively, as they do in the Roman Catholic Churches. But when I observed the ten unmutated commandments, inscribed in bright characters on the wall, I knew I was in a Protestant Episcopal Church.

Formerly, when the old gray-headed clerk said "let us sing to the praise and glory of God," those who could sing accepted the invitation; and there were comparatively few who could not join in the plain simple tunes which were constantly sung, with the occasional addition of some more elaborate anthem especially provided for some high festival. But since the opera has become so fashionable, and some of the organists approach as near as they dare to that style of music, and the choir sing those complicated airs in which few can unite, the habit of singing the chants, psalms and hymns, has gone into desuetude. I thought it wrong to countenance this innovation, and sang as I had been accustomed to do, but felt like Alexander Selkirk during his solitary abode in the island of Juan Fernandez, when he uttered the pathetic lament,

"I am out of humanity's reach,
I must finish my journey alone,
Never hear the sweet music of speech,
I start at the sound of my own."

As I was never particularly distinguished for my musical skill, and was one of the oldest members of the congregation, I could not be accused of vain-glory, I consequently persevered in my determination to "go through," and observed that several persons were emboldened by my example, to "tune up," and sing lustily and with a good courage. I perceived that it was not from want of talent or inclination that they had been silent, but from an undue humility, or mauvaise honte. I always admired the imperturbable serenity of the philosopher who possessed more fondness for the vocal art, than scientific knowledge of its rules, when he was told that even the boys laughed at his singing: although astonished, he replied, with great tranquillity, "Ah! then, I must learn to sing better." If any were deterred from singing by the fear of ridicule, let them imitate his resolution to learn to sing better. I should hope that sincere worshippers would be so engaged in their own devotions that they would not annoy the performances of others, unless they had some very annoying peculiarities. If there be any who will not contribute their share, and laugh at those who make unsuccessful attempts, they render themselves obnoxious to the reproachful interrogatory of the incensed Frenchman, who excited the risibility of the audience by his ludicrous performance, and then exclaimed, "for why you laugh? if you can do it better, come and do it."

Mothers who have had vast sums lavished upon their musical education, might teach their children to sing to "the praise and glory of God": and the pupils of every school might be taught all the popular psalm and hymn tunes, at a small expense, by a teacher accompanying them with a musical instrument. I visited several other churches, and observed the same "death-like silence," the same "dead repose," and thought if, "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," this melancholy silence unequivocally proclaims how little true love is left for the Liturgy! and accounts for the empty treasuries of the Prayer Book Societies. There are comparatively few episcopians so incorrigibly selfish as to wish to monopolize the enjoyment of any delicacy; and we regard that man as an insane miser who hoards up his wealth, neither enjoying it himself, nor imparting it to others. Episcopalians possess an inexhaustible treasure in the Liturgy; those who can appreciate its inimitable beauties, will experience more delight in the use of it, than in the enjoyment of any pleasures that wealth can procure, and cannot withhold it from others.

Although I had no enjoyment, I learnt a lesson of resignation in my visits to the Churches. Upon the recurrence of every Lord's day, I imagined that the members of my beloved Church were animating and exciting each other in the performance of their devotional duties; but when I attended divine service, and none united in the chant, "O come let us sing unto the Lord," &c., I thought it would be as pleasant and profitable singing in my solitary apartment, "Praise thou the Lord, O my soul," and if I could not worship with my fellow-sinners in God's Holy Temple, I could unite with the "angels and archangels and all the company of heaven, in lauding and magnifying His holy name." Now, Mr. Editor, if the apparent apathy lamented be owing to any disability, would it not be advisable to call a special convention to repeal these prohibitory edicts?—Then should we hear the voices of multitudes in our Churches like the "sound of many waters," as it was in primitive times, the Prayer Book presses would be in constant operation, and the sound of the workmen's axe and hammer, employed in the erection of Missionary Churches, would resound in all our interested districts, and spiritual wildernesses.

VOCULA.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Died,

At Red Bank, N. J., on Tuesday, May 23d, Miss ELIZA HARTSHORNE, eldest daughter of the late Richard Hartshorne, Esq.

Hear, a gracious voice from heaven
Bids the mourner's tear be dry;
"Blest the parting soul forgiven,
Blest are all in Christ who die."

Even so, declares the Spirit;
Warfare past, the conquest won;
Peace eternal they inherit,
Sabbath rest for labours done.

Faithful here, their faith, repentance,
Follow them before the Lord;
There,—through Him, the happy sentence,
Overflows their bright reward.

Mourner, 'tis the Voice from heaven;
Hear, and stay the gushing eye:
"Blest the parting soul forgiven,

New York.—TRINITY CHURCH, ALBANY.—The corner-stone of the new edifice now in progress of erection by the parish of Trinity Church, was laid yesterday afternoon, in the presence of a large assembly. The services commenced at the church at present occupied by the parish, after which the congregation, headed by the clergy, proceeded to the location selected for the new edifice. On reaching the ground, the 122d Psalm was read in response; Prayer was then offered, after which the stone was laid by Rev. Mr. Selkirk. The metal box which was placed in the stone, contains the Bible, the Book of Common Prayer, a Copy of the last General and Diocesan Convention, History of Trinity Church, a map of the City, and the Newspapers of Albany and New York, of the latest dates, also a City directory. The stone being laid, the Choir chanted a hymn, commencing with "O praise the Lord; laud ye the name of the Lord." The Rev. Dr. Potter offered up a prayer, and the Choir then sang "Gloria in Excelsis." An appropriate Address was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Selkirk, and the exercises were closed by the singing of the 47th Psalm, and Prayer and Benediction.

ST. PETER'S CHURCH, BROOKLYN.—A new parish under the above designation, was organized on Thursday, May 18th, in the city of Brooklyn. The Rev. William Staunton Rector, presided at the meeting, and gentlemen were duly elected officers of the parish for the year.

Western New York.—BISHOP DELANCEY'S VISITATION.—On the 17th, the Bishop preached and confirmed three in St. Paul's Parish Hill. In the afternoon of the same day, the Bishop preached in Christ Church, Bridgewater.

On the 18th, the Bishop preached and confirmed three persons in Grace Church, Waterville;

On the 19th the Bishop preached in the morning, in the Methodist chapel, at East Hamilton;

At St. Thomas' church, Hamilton, in the afternoon, the Bishop preached and confirmed twenty one, including one very aged colored woman, baptized and confirmed in private.

In the afternoon of the 20th, in Christ church, the Bishop preached.

On Sunday morning, the 21st, in the same church, the Bishop confirmed seven, preached and administered the Holy Communion, in the afternoon the Bishop preached.—Gospel Messenger.

Connecticut.—Bishop Brownell has in his recent visitation administered the Holy Rite of Confirmation in the following Parishes:

May 7 Portland,	-	-	-	Confirmed 21
" Middletown,	-	-	-	12
" 9 Essex,	-	-	-	4
" Saybrook,	-	-	-	3

INSTITUTION.—The Institution of the Rev. P. S. Chauncey as Rector of Christ Church in this City, took place on Thursday, 18th, inst. Morning prayer was read by Rev. F. J. Clerc of Broad Brook, assisted in the Lessons by Rev. C. R. Fisher of this city. The Sermon was by Rev. Dr. Wainwright of New York, from Ezek. xxi. 27. Bishop Brownell performed the Institution Service, and the Keys of the Church were presented by Dudley Buck, Esq., Senior Warden. The Rector was assisted in the Holy Communion, by the Rev. Dr. Totten, and Messrs. Jarvis and Cox.

There were present of the Clergy besides the above, the Rev. Messrs. Watson, Payne, Abel Nichols, and professor Jackson.

The day was one of peculiar beauty, and the congregation were presented by the Rev. preacher with a very interesting discourse, upon the dealings of Christ with the kingdoms of this world, and the relations of His own Kingdom, the Church, to the present times. He concluded with a fervent and impressive address to the newly instituted Pastor; and heartily do we respond to the prayer to which he gave utterance, that the important relations thus happily begun may be as lasting and blessed as they now bid fair to become.—Calendar.

Rhode Island.—EPISCOPAL ACTS.—On the second Sunday after Easter, May 7th, the Bishop said Morning prayer and preached in St. Mary's Church, Portsmouth. At three o'clock, P. M., he preached in Trinity Church, Newport, and at 7 o'clock P. M., three persons were confirmed in Zion Church, Newport. A sermon and address were delivered by the Bishop.

On Monday, May 8th, the Bishop preached in St. Matthew's Church, Jamestown.

Tuesday, May 9th, four persons were confirmed in the Chapel of the Holy Cross, Middletown. Sermon and address by the Bishop.

Friday, May 12. The Bishop preached in St. Paul's Church, Portsmouth.

Third Sunday after Easter, May 13th, the Bishop preached in St. Mark's Church, Warren, in the morning.

At 3 o'clock P. M., the Bishop preached in St. Michael's Church, Bristol. At half past 7 o'clock, in the same Church, eighteen persons were confirmed. Sermon and address by the Bishop.—Christian Witness.

TEXAS.—BISHOP FREEMAN'S VISITATION AT MATAGORDA.—From an interesting letter which we have just received from Matagorda, we learn that the Missionary Bishop of the South west has visited that place. He arrived there on Thursday in Holy Week, accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Gillett of Houston, the Rev. Mr. Young of Brazoria, and Mr. Pierce, a candidate for Holy Orders, recently from Florida.

Daily Service had been celebrated during Passion Week, and a daily Lecture delivered by the Missionary prior to this period.

On Good Friday a sermon, was preached by the Rev. Mr. Gillett. At night, Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Mr. Ives, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Gillett, who read the Lessons. The Bishop preached.

At night, Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Mr. Young. The Lessons were read by the Rev. Mr. Gillett, and a sermon was preached by the Bishop.

On Easter Day the Bishop held an ordination, when Mr. Pierce was admitted to the Holy order of Deacons. Morning Prayer was said by Rev. Mr. Ives, who also read the Lessons. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Mr. Young. In the afternoon Prayer was said by the Rev. Mr. Young. The Rev. Mr. Gillett read the Lessons, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Pierce. At night, Prayer was said by the Rev. Mr. Pierce, who also read the Lessons. The Bishop preached, and confirmed nine persons.

Our correspondent concludes as follows:

"On Monday morning the Bishop and clergy all left us: and they left many a quickened and glowing heart behind them—it having been to many among us the happiest week we have ever spent in Texas. It was a hallowed week; it was a happy week; for we in sincerity believe, that "God, the Holy Ghost," the "Sanctifier of the Faithful," did "visit the congregation with His love and favor;" and we pray that the "Blessed Spirit" may of his "great mercy," ever "keep them in the same."

Maryland.—CONFIRMATIONS.—On Wednesday afternoon, May 17th, in St. John's Church, Havre de Grace. The Bishop baptized the infant son of the Rector, preached, and confirmed four persons.

On Thursday morning, the 18th, in St. Mark's Chapel, St. Mary Anne's Parish, Cecil Co., the Bishop preached, confirmed two persons, and administered the Lord's Supper, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Goldsborough, the Rector.

On the Fourth Sunday after Easter, May 21st, in the morning at Mt. Calvary Church, Baltimore, the Bishop preached and confirmed nine persons; this being the second confirmation in the congregation within three months.

In the afternoon, at St. Andrew's Church, the Bishop preached, and confirmed eighteen persons.—Church Times.

Virginia.—CONFIRMATION.—By Bishop Johns, in St. Paul's Church, May 20th, five persons. By the same, in Christ Church, Sunday morning, May 22d, seventeen persons.

ORDINATION.—Bishop Meade in St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, on Sunday morning, May 21st, admitted the Rev. G. H. Norton to Priests orders.

Illinois.—The Bishop has just returned to Jubilee College from a short visit northward. In his absence of two weeks he preached 8 times, baptized several and confirmed 15 persons.

There are five Churches now waiting to be consecrated—four more will be ready for consecration after the Convention.

The Bishop's health is better than during the last summer and winter.

He regrets that his appointments are such as to prevent him from writing and publishing a fourth number of the Motto until after the 8th of June, the time of the meeting of the Convention at Jacksonville.

N. B. This is a week earlier than that set down in Swords' Almanac, by mistake.—Church Times.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. James Dixon Carder, of the Diocese of New York, has received and accepted a call to the Rectorship of St. George's Church, Milford, Ct.

The Rev. Timothy Wilcoxson, (Deacon,) being at present engaged as Assistant to the Rev. William Watson, Rector of St. Peter's Church, Plymouth, Ct., desires all communications intended for him to be directed to that place.

Afterwards my worthy associate in Illinois (1850—1854)
The Rev. Mr. Putnam, minister of Trinity Church, Fairfield Vt. has accepted an invitation to become the minister of St. Andrew's Church, Hopkinton, N. H. He is expected to enter upon his duties at the latter place about the first of June.

INFIDELITY and FAITH look both through the same perspective glass, but at contrary ends. Infidelity looks through the wrong end of the glass; and, therefore, sees those objects near, which are afar off, and makes great things little,—diminishing the greatest spiritual blessings, and removing far from us threatened evils: Faith looks at the right end, and brings the blessings that are far off in time close to our eye, and multiplies God's mercies, which, in a distance, lose their greatness.—Bishop Hall.

SHIPS and LETTERS.—If, says Lord Bacon, the invention of the ship was thought so noble, and consociateth the most remote regions in participation of their fruits, how much more are letters to be magnified, which, as ships, pass through the vast sea of time, and makes ages so distant participate of the modern illuminations and inventions the one of the other.

VIRTUE is not to be considered in the light of mere innocence—or abstaining from harm—but as the exertion of our faculties in doing good: as Titus, when he had let a day slip undistinguished by some act of virtue, cried out, "I have lost a day!" If we regard our time in this light, how many days shall we look back upon as irretrievably lost? And to how narrow a compass would such a method of calculation frequently reduce the longest life.

VIRTUE is the queen of labourers; Opinion the mistress of fools; Vanity the pride of nature; and Contention the overthrow of families. Virtue is not obtained in seeking strange countries, but in mending old errors. Pythagoras compares Virtue to the letter P, which is small at the foot and broad at the head; meaning, that to attain Virtue is very painful, but its possession very pleasant.

ADVICE.—If I were to venture any advice, in any case, it would be my best. The sacred duty of an adviser (one of the most inviolable that exists) would lead me, towards a real enemy, to act as if my best friend were the party concerned.—Burke.

WISE sayings often fall on barren ground: but a kind word is never thrown away.—Thoughts in the Chamber and the Crowd.

THE BEST MERCHANDIZE.—No man is a better merchant than he that lays out his time upon God, and his money upon the poor.—Jeremy Taylor.

DEFER not thy charities till death; for certainly, if a man weigh it rightly, he that doth so is rather liberal of another man's than his own.—Bacon.

EVERY man has just as much vanity as he wants understanding.—Swift.

Notices.

Bishop White Prayer Book Society.

The Bishop White Prayer Book Society has just published a new edition of the Book of Common Prayer, (in 18mo. form) from stereotype plates prepared by King & Baird, of Philadelphia. These plates have been corrected with great care; and are believed to be very accurate, having been diligently and minutely conformed to the Standard set forth by the General Convention of 1847, in its seventh canon. Should, however, any errors be discovered in them, they will immediately be rectified. The undersigned respectfully requests that any such that may be detected, may be made known to him, as soon as possible.

"The definitions are models of condensation and purity."—Hon. Wm. B. Calhoun.

TESTIMONIALS.

From the London Literary Gazette, April 1, 1848.

In the present edition, Prof. Goodrich has been ably assisted by several eminent men, each distinguished in his own sphere of inquiry; and the result is in the highest degree satisfactory. The work is a noble monument of erudition, and indefatigable research; and the style and accuracy of its typography would do honor to the press of any country in Europe. This volume must find its way into all our public and good private libraries, for it provides the English student with a mass of the most valuable information, which he would in vain seek for elsewhere.

"The new edition of Webster's Dictionary, in crown quarto, seems to us deserving of general patronage."

"We recommend it to all who desire to possess THE MOST COMPLETE, ACCURATE AND RELIABLE DICTIONARY OF THE LANGUAGE."

Signed by the following gentlemen, March, 1848.

The previous edition of Webster's Quarto Dictionary, received the following recommendation, from Daniel Webster, Levi Woodbury, Theodore Frelinghuysen and 101 other members of Congress.

"It is very desirable that one standard dictionary should be used by the numerous millions of people who are to inhabit the vast extent of territory belonging to the United States; as the use of such a standard may prevent the formation of dialects in states remote from each other, and impress upon the language uniformity and stability. It is desirable, also, that the acquisition of the language should be rendered easy, not only to our own citizens, but to foreigners who wish to gain access to the rich stores of science which it contains. We rejoice that the American Dictionary bids fair to become such a standard." Published by woman courted only to pollute, and doors were opened only to decoy and plunder him. When the crew of a vessel was discharged, as it came into port, what was expected from them? If in their own country, was it expected that they would save their earnings, visit their friends, respect the proprieties of life, reverence the law of the land? If they were strangers in a strange land, was it expected that they would be objects of hospitality and kindness? No, not even those who employed them, who extracted riches from their toil, and luxuries from their privations, not even they were usually kind. How much less those who dwelt far off. Every man's hand seemed to be against the sailor, and we need not wonder if the sailor's hand was against every man. They were indeed the Ishmaelites of the sea. No Saviour came down to the shore to say to them "Repent" and "be at peace with God." No John the Baptist lifted up his voice to them, as they were tossed to and fro on the wilderness of waters. At sea there was no man to care for their souls, and on land men lay in wait to make them a prey.

There is nothing more needed in our schools than good histories; not the dry compends in present use, but elementary books, that shall suggest the moral uses of history and the providence of God manifested in the affairs of man. Mrs. Markham's history was used by that model of all teachers, the late Dr. Arnold, master of the great English school at Rugby, and agrees in its character with his enlightened and pious views of teaching history. It is now several years since I adapted this history to the form and the price acceptable in the schools of the United States. I have recently revised it, and trust that it may be extensively serviceable in education.—Extract from American Editor's Preface.

Thus it was—and thus it too often is, even now. Let us thank God, however, that a brighter day for sailors begins, as we trust, to dawn. Much was done for them, when some twenty-five years ago, Christians in England and in America first awoke to the truth that those who live on the waters are entitled to the gospel, no less than they who live on the land, and that as men they must have hearts to feel its power. Yet more was done when the conviction of that truth ripened into action; when missions among seamen were established; when afterwards the intoxicating cup was banished from a large portion of our merchant vessels, and when in some of them the rough discipline of the deck and the comfortless cheer of the fore-castle were improved. And the results—how cheering!—They have demonstrated not merely that these men can be reached—not merely here, as everywhere, God's blessing will follow faithful efforts to proclaim his truth and save souls; they show that this is the effort on which God seems to vouchsafe his peculiar smiles. In proportion to the means employed and the difficulties to be vanquished, no missions were ever more successful than those among seamen. Twenty years ago, a pious sailor, whether in the navies of England and America, or in their merchant service, was almost unknown;—officers and men alike seemed to agree with the world at large, in thinking, that religion was not made for sailors. Now it is computed, that

erec was in the year 1844 that the Institute assumed its present and lopment. Already was its original home—a house in the ger bouring 'Rue des Trois Sabres'—too small for its inmates, another Council had been for two years on the lookout for larger cause when those which it now occupies fell vacant. They is neviously been used as a school for 200 children; the can ds covered a space of two French acres, and were sur- a few ed by high walls. But how was it possible to acquire Episc property, for which 100,000 fr. (4000l.) were asked, with a servie income not yet reaching the quarter of that sum? A lease tracte term of years, with a right of purchase at a fixed price, other, however, proposed, and had been nearly accepted by the But then suddenly the news came that a Roman Catholic wards nity, somewhat analogous in purpose, had agreed to the can ca terms, and that the purchase was to be concluded the structio day! By one of those happy temerities which are for eve to vulgar eyes by the success which sometimes befalls changes reflecting minds by the earnest faith which can alone ascripti them, the President of the poor and struggling Protestant or that v, hastened the very next morning to the proprietor, won both to lately rejected bargain, and found himself the owner of a supper- property, with a personal debt of 110,000fr.—of which out in ere to be paid down immediately—and with scarcely expositio andred francs of ready money! In two days 75,000fr. him a pel lent by a few Protestant friends (including the honored led, whe the Andres, the Delesserts, the Eynards, the Hotting- appreciat allets); other sums have since been lent from time And y while the yearly income of the Institute has risen from palians—00fr. in 1842-3 to upwards of 80,000fr. in 1846-7!— done for S seeming madness prove greater wisdom.

for prom sent buildings, we have said, are extensive; a good portion to the street, two long wings, and a very large garden in large e to the facade and wings correspond respectively, more are enlarge cly, the three great divisions of the Institute—the the more he School, and the Penitentiary. To the left stands as yet, for, which, together with the 'Creche,' its adjunct, pro- worship a and for the complete education and training of girls until the age of eighteen. The Creche is small; the Infant School, on the other hand, numbers 200 children of both sexes on its lists, of whom from 90 to 120 are daily present; singularly plain-looking generally to an English eye, but for the most part fat and happy. Next comes the Upper School, for girls only, on the monitorial system, comprising about 90 pupils, of whom about 60 are day scholars, and the remaining 30 belong to the different branches of the establishment. Here education is carried on, as far as practicable; and not only the general principles of religion, but its distinctive dogmas, begin to be taught. Nevertheless, many Roman Catholic mothers have been so struck with the advantages which their children have derived from the Infant School, that they have solicited their admission to the Upper School; which implies as many conversions from Romanism, not made by any proselytising spirit, but through the mere influence of a good and holy example. No child, it may be added, is admitted to either of these Schools, the Infant or the Upper, without the written consent of its parents; if Roman Catholics, testifying that they are aware of the Protestant character of the Institute. And yet, of the infant pupils upwards of three-fourths belong to Roman Catholic families.

Beyond the Upper School is the 'Atelier d'Apprentissage' or Training Establishment, for girls only, who are trained up in it, from the age of thirteen to that of eighteen, either as servants or as workwomen; their intellectual and religious education keeping pace with their apprenticeship to labour. Speaking of female apprentices under ordinary circumstances, Mr. Vermeil observes that 'one of the greatest moral dangers for young workwomen in Paris, is to be found in apprenticeship establishments, where so many evil examples attend them, so many temptations, so many pernicious influences; and this particularly at the period when religious education is usually imparted.' The same evils are deeply felt in London.

A link between the School and the Hospital is afforded by the Infirmary for Scrofulous children. The effects produced in this department by pure air, wholesome and abundant food, and kind attention, are perfectly marvellous.

Next comes a small Hospital, occupying the street-frontage. It contains separate wards for men, women, and children—115 patients were admitted to it in 1846-7, besides the dispensing of gratuitous advice to out-door patients, and the vaccination of children, all, of course, by competent medical officers. So long as Protestant Sisters are excluded from hospitals which Protestant money contributes to support, so long will this branch of the establishment (which is not, however, proposed to be much extended) be absolutely necessary for the training of the Deaconesses, as hospital and family nurses, to those duties, by which the Roman Catholic 'Sœurs de Charité' have been rendered famous. The Hospital is not entirely gratuitous: but the poor are admitted at reduced prices, descending as low as 1fr. a day, or a third of the average cost of each patient. An ingenious system has, however, been established, that of the patronage of beds; by which fifteen or twenty subscribers agree to contribute, if called upon, 2fr. each a month; this, with the slight acknowledgement almost invariably made by the patient himself or by his special protector, is sufficient to make up the total expenditure.

Passing through a pleasant little chapel, where divine service is performed every Sunday and a Sunday School is held, you enter the Penitentiary, if we may so call it, which is divided into three entirely distinct parts—the Refuge, the Retreat (Retenue), and the School of Discipline (Disciplinaire). The former, containing twenty-five cells, is destined to penitent females of the Protestant persuasion on their dismissal from prison, or who, desirous of themselves to abandon the path of prostitution, are admitted on payment of a yearly sum of 300fr. (12l.) The last 'Report' contains some interesting details on the general results of this branch of reformation. About one-third of those who have left the establishment have fallen away again into vice; about another third have kept aloof from outward shame; while the remaining third may be confidently considered as reclaimed. However, to give more effect to this part of their experiment, the committee have decided upon admitting penitents, not as heretofore for two years certain, but for an indefinite period. And as they are to be formed not for solitude, but for society, it has been thought proper to employ some of them, when practicable, in the laundry of the establishment; a hazardous, but necessary test of their sincerity.

The second branch is that of the 'Retenue,' destined originally for girls under age, convicted by a judicial sentence, or (according to a peculiar provision of the French law) confined judicially on their parents' demand. But an asylum for the former class of minors having been opened at Ste. Foye (a reformatory institution for Protestants, on the model of that of Mettray), it is intended from henceforth to confine the efforts of the Deaconesses to the latter class of girls, who were hitherto sent to the Roman Catholic establishment of St. Michel.

The 'Disciplinaire,' again, is intended to receive 25 girls of from 7 to 15 years of age, of vicious or stubborn dispositions. This is found to be the most toilsome and unattractive department in the Institute. The poor children, who are admitted into it, are mostly narrow-minded as well as evil-hearted; and the Sisters observe that the 'germs of sin are marvellously fostered by a certain want of intellectual development.' There can be no question at any period of life of the truth of the observation, though especially true of youth—'Narrow-mindedness tends to wickedness.'

It is the nature of rational and systematic charity, not only to be always making for itself more work, indoors or out, but to form and encourage others to similar exertions. Already other Protestant establishments, charitable or otherwise, are springing up around them: as, a higher Protestant girls' school, a primary school for Protestant boys, a cheap lodging house for the poor, a home for Protestant servants out of place. All these are unconnected, except by sympathy, with the Institute; but within its bosom there have already risen up both a class of pupils, who, without seeking to become Deaconesses, come to study in the different fields of charitable activity which it opens to them, and also a class of nurses for the sick, of a lower order than the actual Deaconesses.

It is almost incredible—but the whole of these various functions are performed by a personnel of eighteen Sisters, of whom six are only candidates, or 'aspirantes.' And, what with a staff so limited, seems still more wonderful, the Institute has already sent forth Deaconesses from time to time, to superintend charitable institutions in the provinces; for example, to a Hospital at Montpellier. Though of course, with a central development so great, there can be scarcely ever any Sisters to spare to the distant applications which are constantly coming in.

The Sisters belong to all ranks of society; there are farm-servants and teachers, shepherd girls and ladies. They come from various parts of France, though mostly from the south. Provence furnishes the admirable Directing Sister, one of the two master-minds of the establishment. One Sister is an English-woman.

We have said that the Institution is supported by the two established Protestant churches of France, every minister of which at Paris (one only excepted)—in some instances, after several years of opposition or estrangement—has at last acknowledged the usefulness of its aim, and the sincere piety of its direction. Beyond the pale of French Protestantism, the clergymen of both the Anglican congregations at Paris, as well as a worthy Wesleyan minister, have expressed themselves, by subscription or otherwise, in its favor.

From the municipal body of Paris it has obtained the highest testimony. In a Report of the Prefect to the Municipal Council, in 1846, he states: 'I have inspected the Establishment of Deaconesses in all its details, and observed everywhere that an intelligent directing spirit had presided over its organization—over the separation of its different works—over the excellent

At the eastern extremity of Paris, close to the Barriere de Charenton, which leads to the French 'Bethlehem'—on the outskirts of the Faubourg St. Antoine, one of the great workshops of Parisian industry—in a quarter which, though poorly peopled, is elevated, wide, and airy, and in one of the widest and airiest streets of that quarter, the Rue de Reuilly—is situated a remarkable institution. It is one which has attracted no small share of attention among the more earnest and philanthropic portion of French society, together with not a little envy and calumny, and which, as a necessary consequence, has awakened enthusiastic sympathy and support:—it is called the Institute of Deaconesses, or Protestant Sisters of Charity. 'The Institute of Deaconesses' (says the 1st Article of its Statutes) 'is a free association, having for its object the instructing and directing, in the practice of active charity, such Protestant women as shall devote themselves within its bosom to the relief of bodily and spiritual misery, and particularly to the care of the sick, the young, and the poor.'

Its existence dates from the year 1841. It owes its foundation to one of the most distinguished ministers of the Reformed (Calvinistic) French Church—a child of the quick-minded, warm-hearted south—the Rev. Antoine Vermeil: who, after fulfilling for many years the arduous and conspicuous functions of the Protestant ministry at Bordeaux, accepted, some years back, a still more arduous and conspicuous post at Paris. Here it was, that he was enabled to realize a long-cherished idea, and to do so in conjunction with a worthy minister of the Lutheran Church (one borrowed indeed, as it were, by her from her Calvinist sister), the Rev. M. Vallette. The institution has since grown up, under the joint and harmonious patronage of the two established Protestant churches of France (represented in its Council, the one by a President, M. Vermeil; the other by a Vice-president, M. Vallette); swelling from a mere house to a distribution of the various functions. I saw that everything had been ordered after a thoughtful study of those improvements which have been introduced into other establishments, so as to facilitate the surveillance of every part of the institution; to spare time and trouble to servants, and to procure all possible economy, although nothing has been omitted for the material comfort of the different persons who have occasion to profit by the advantage of this important asylum. . . . The Institute of Deaconesses is so well ordered as to be worthy of serving as a model to other establishments of a similar nature, which might be founded upon a larger scale.' In concluding his report, the Prefect solicited from the body over which he presided, a first grant of 1000 fr. (40*l.*) Some months afterwards, a committee, named by the Municipal Council, came unexpectedly to visit the Institute, and after a three hours' investigation, in their Report recommended a grant of 1500 fr. With the rarest of liberalities the Municipal Council outbid its own committee, and by an unanimous vote, doubled the sum which had been before proposed.

The general administration of the Institute is vested in a Directing Council, composed of two ministers of either church, of the Directing Sister, and of from four to six ladies: and it is itself superintended by a Comité de surveillance, composed of from three to five lay members. Subordinate to this central government, the three great branches of the Institution form, as it were, so many federate states, each directed by a separate committee of ladies.

The Directing Sister constitutes, so to speak, the Executive power: to this extent she represents the association, and obedience is due to her from the other Sisters. The Sisters are admitted between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-five (subject to extraordinary exceptions), and only with the consent of their families; unless they should be orphans, or widows who have either passed the annum luctus, or more than thirty years of age; and they must, in all cases, be free from special family duties. On their admission they are first received as Candidates (aspirantes), then as Assistants (adjuvantes), the period of probation lasting eighteen months. Every Sister must in turn go through all the various functions of the establishment, from the kitchen upwards; but after her final reception as Deaconess, she devotes herself to the branch for which she feels the most decided vocation.

During the eighteen months of their novitiate the Sisters pay a yearly sum of 400 fr., besides bringing with them a 'trousseau'; but in exceptional cases, gratuitous or semi-gratuitous admissions may be granted (funds permitting) by the Directing Council. After her admission as Deaconess, every Sister is maintained, in health and in sickness, during her years of service, and afterwards in her old age, by the association, at a cost of about 300 fr. a year. All that she may make in the way of profit by her labour belongs to the association—whatever fortune she may possess remains with herself. There are provisions for indemnifying Deaconesses who are dismissed by the Council, or who may withdraw from the association for reasons to be approved of by them (marriage being one of these), after four years' service at the least. All are free to leave at any time, although a moral obligation of service for a definite period, or of otherwise indemnifying the association, is considered to attach to those who have received gratuitous or semi-gratuitous admission.

The total expenditure of the Institution amounts to 87,000fr., being somewhat more than its receipts; yet this is a small sum, surely, when we consider the magnitude of the establishment, with its three great divisions, its seven distinct yards or gardens, its 127 rooms, 148 beds, of which upwards of 100 are nightly occupied, and the 300 persons who are daily received beneath its roof for the purposes of instruction or relief; besides the occupation of another house—its own of large dimensions for any ordinary purpose—the original birth-place of the Institute, and still the private home, as it were, of the Sisters themselves.

We have been thus particular in describing the nature and arrangements of the Paris Institute of Deaconesses, in consequence of its offering the most accessible example, and being, at the same time, the most complete and systematically organized institution of the kind, anywhere to be seen. We will suppose that we are now asked—why pursue so many objects at once? why join in one so many different branches of charity? there surely must be confusion, conflict of wants and interests, charitable bickerings and jealousies. In answer to this apprehension, we might submit that, in point of fact, it is sufficient to reply that nothing of the sort has yet appeared, after six years' trial, every year almost bringing with it a new foundation. But the very raising of the objection implies a misconception of the purposes for which the Institute exists. It is not a Hospital, nor a School, nor a Penitentiary; it is, we repeat it, a great Normal School of Female Charity. Neither the good education afforded within its bosom to the young, nor the care to the sick, nor the wise discipline to the vicious, can ever constitute its real end, its essential perfection; but the full development and wise training of all the impulses of the female mind, which may best serve to promote and fulfil those several aims. Considered in this light, variety of field is an indispensable condition to its due existence. Some minds recoil from the often loathsome duties of attendance on the sick, yet delight in the teaching of children; other women, again, patient watchers beside a sick bed, are incapable of sympathizing with the noisy exuberance of animal spirits in childhood.—The duties of superintendence over the penitent female, over the perverted child, are different from either of the former ones, and indeed different in themselves; whilst the details of household administration frequently belong to another character altogether. Yet, what ought to be the moral of this diversity, supposing the same spirit of faith and love to inspire them all alike, and bind them together by the golden link of heartfelt sisterhood? Surely, that the variety of human character can only be brought to bear its most efficient results, by supplying it with a variety of objects. How far the great axiom of Fourierist socialism, 'Les attractions sont proportionnelles aux destinations,' can ever be realized on a large scale in Society, half a dozen revolutions or more may be required to show. On a small scale, certainly, there is no surer index to success. 'A man's inclination to a calling,' says one of our most effective trainers, addressing a favourite pupil, 'is a great presumption that he is or will be fit for it. . . . My advice to you would be to follow that line for which you seem to have the most evident calling; and surely the sign of God's calling, in such a case, is to be found in our own reasonable inclination, for the tastes and faculties which he gives us, are the marks of our fitness for one thing rather than another.'

As regards the spiritual character of the Institute, the consideration of which would need far more space than we can here afford it, suffice it to say, that it is thoroughly Protestant. No vows, no poverty, no monastic obedience, no celibacy, no engagements—even temporary—no claustral seclusion, no vain practices, no domination over conscience, no tyranny over the will—such are the 'fundamental principles,' which, with appropriate developments, stand at the head of its Statutes.

The establishment of Deaconesses, founded by M. Vermeil, is not the only one in France. At Strasburg, that old focus of Protestantism, the Rev. M. Harter has presided over a similar Institute, since October, 1842. The germ of the Strasburg Institute arose among some young persons who had received their religious instruction from its founder; already in 1837 had formed themselves into an association—which seems to have been but a stricter kind of Visiting Society—its members without in anywise renouncing the ties of family or social life, devoting themselves to the poor. We have not the latest details of this establishment, but we see that in 1845 it already numbered twenty-four Sisters: one Superior Sister, three directing Sisters at the head of the different departments, Acting Sisters (sœurs servantes), two Affiliated Sisters (sœurs agréées), and ten novices. It confines itself, as yet, to the branches of education and physical relief, and devotes its premises to each. Its Hospital received in 1844-5 six patients, while its Schools, divided into an infant school for sex, and a lower and superior girls' school, numbering in different divisions, 80, 60, and 30 scholars respectively, sides the Sisters in active employ at Strasburg itself, within and without the Institute, there were five in charge of the Hospital at Mulhouse (which can accommodate as many as 200 sick), and two at Guebwiller; of these last, one teacher in a parish girls' school, numbering 40 scholars, and another administrator of a charitable foundation.

The constitution of the Strasburg Institute is somewhat ecclesiastical than that of Paris; the founder, M. Harter, vesting the cure of souls merely, whilst the whole administration is vested in a committee of ladies, aided by a consulting committee of gentlemen. It is not to be considered as having attained its full development, since by Art. 2 of its Statutes has for its object 'to offer to those Christian women who devote themselves to the Lord's service the means of perfecting themselves, either to become teachers in infant and lower girls' school, or nurses for the sick in the sanatoria, and private houses, or again to exercise the office of superintendents in prisons, asylums, houses of refuge, or other charitable establishments where their services are required.'

Let us now proceed to Switzerland: where there are already Deaconesses' Institutes—for example, one at Echallens, Pays de Vaud, founded by the Rev. M. Germond; Boudry, in Neuchâtel, founded by the Rev. M. Bovy. We believe others. We have details only of the first. Its opening followed close upon that of Strasburg: it is the smallest of the establishments which we are now considering; and is confined strictly to the training of nurses for the sick. But we must say, that of the various Reports before us, there are none that breathe a more simple, earnest, unaffected faith, a gentler and a larger-minded charity, than those of M. Germond. The third Report, in particular, contains a pains-taking and interesting account of the Deaconesses of the early church; pointing out at the same time, the difference between the original institution, as specially annexed to individual congregations, and its revival in the shape of distinct communities at the present day.

The field of labour assigned to the Deaconesses of Echallens, is thus set forth by its founder. First, the care of the sick at their own homes—the importance of which department is specially felt in times of epidemic. For services of this kind the demand constantly exceeds the supply; and although the Director of the establishment naturally prefers affording in-door relief, where practicable, out of the six Deaconesses who are usually attached to the parent Institute, one is set apart for outdoor nursing. Secondly, the care of the sick in, or at the expense of private charitable foundations, of which many appear to have been created in Switzerland of late years; five of these, besides one at Lyons for the Protestant sick, employ seven Sisters. 'May we not hope,' says M. Germond, 'that as Christianity shall receive a more practical direction, similar establishments will become multiplied, till there shall be no more a single town in our land without its small infirmary, served by a Deaconess, and ready to receive those sick persons who could not without danger be transported to a greater distance?'—Thirdly, the care of the sick in public hospitals employs the remaining Sisters—making in all fifteen Deaconesses received, beside one who had completed her novitiate, and was already in active service, without having been definitely admitted. Two Deaconesses of Echallens have, since November, 1844, replaced at the asylum of Abendberg, in Berne, for the care and education of 'crétin' children, some Roman Catholic 'sœurs grises' from Fribourg, of whose services Dr. Guggenbuhl had been obliged to avail himself before, for want of qualified Protestant nurses. 'If the number of Deaconesses were doubled, or even trebled, employment could immediately be found for all.'—(Second Report, Echallens.)

Situated in a mixed commune, the Institute of Echallens rents of the Municipality a wing of the former Chateau. The number of sick whom it received in 1844-5, was 159, of whom 134 were admitted gratuitously. Though placed in the midst of an agricultural population, far from any large town, and notwithstanding the vicinity, at no more than three leagues distance, of a Cantonal Hospital, it is impossible for its Directors to comply with all the demands for admission that are addressed to them. Its receipts in 1844-5, were under 12,000 fr. (480*l.*), its expenditure under 7000 fr.—the difference being owing to the endeavour to raise funds for purchasing a suitable house.

The Statutes of the Institute are similar to those of Paris and Strasburg. 'The Deaconesses of Echallens are a free corporation, which devotes itself for the Saviour's love, to the service of the unfortunate, and especially of the sick.' There is, as yet, no internal hierarchy among the Sisters who are placed under the authority of the worthy minister and his wife, as Directors. A superintending committee has been named to examine the accounts, and to provide for the maintenance of the establishment in the event of the founder's death.

M. Germond's second Report will enable all, who prefer doing it on paper, to pass a day with the Deaconesses at Echallens, without much trouble. They rise at five in summer, six in winter; pray in private; pay their first attentions to the sick; arrange their own rooms; breakfast upon a 'soupe,' or now are to the countries that surround them. A small lake not more than twelve miles in length and six in breadth, it was yet to those who dwelt near it, at once their fishing ground, the highway on which they travelled, and the means of facilitating their exchanges in trade. We need not wonder then that its shores were studded with populous villages; nor that the Saviour when he would gather about him a multitude to hear the words of eternal life, went often and again to teach—as the evangelist has it—by the sea side. In the station which he occupies—sitting on the vessel as it rests on the calm waters of the lake, and preaching to the thronged multitude on the shore—he seems to prefigure the part which the great ocean was to bear in carrying the gospel over the world; while the frequency* with which he thus resorts to the sea side, may well suggest to us the duty we owe to the great commercial marts of the earth. With her compass and needle, commerce has now pushed far beyond what were once regarded as her utmost limits, and she finds her home to-night around the shores and on the bosom of what were then only pathless and unknown seas. Her great cities now rise round their margin. And it is in these cities that multitudes not only dwell, but dwell in the midst of the most wakeful activity—of the most stirring and thoughtful enterprise. These then are the places where the gospel is most needed, where its truths can be propagated most rapidly, and from whence they can go forth, with most effect to bless the world.

Observe, however, that Christ had compassion not on those only who came to him from the adjoining cities and villages. He often passed to and fro on the lake itself, and held communion with those who toiled on its waters. Of his twelve Apostles, four, as we have seen in the lesson of this evening, (St. Mark, chap. i.) were called in one day from their nets and ships, to enjoy and to proclaim his grace. What then do not the followers of Christ now owe to them who go down to the sea in ships and do business on the great waters? Every thing in their condition is fitted to move the sympathies of a christian heart. Their peculiar privations—their many and great dangers—their sore trials and temptations—their migratory life carrying them to all parts of the earth and giving them access to so many different minds—does not all this, with their warmth of heart and almost childlike simplicity, entitle them to a peculiar place in our remembrance, while it makes it unspeakably important to the world that they should be called with an effectual calling to Christ's service.

Yet what until lately has been their state?—Agents of immense good to the world—agents of good above all to Christendom, and especially to Protestant Christendom, still sailors have not been remembered; or they have been remembered, often only to be corrupted and wronged. Of those who thirty years since profited by the toils and perils of the seaman, how many reflected that he had a soul—how many even that he was a man, with the sensibilities, the capacities, the rights of man—His very name, was it not synonymous with recklessness and vagrancy? Nay more,—was it not synonymous with drunkenness, debauchery and God-defying impiety? Without fear of Heaven, it is not strange that he had cast off regard for man. Often he knew no home but the ruthless sea; he had no friends but some chance ship mate; he owned no power above him, but that which paced the quarter deck; and he thought not beyond the brief term of his voyage. Picked up at the beginning of it as a machine, that could climb the mast and trim the sail and keep the look out; thrust aside at its end as a machine no longer needed, and therefore no longer cared for, he rushed from the despotism of the ship to the licentious freedom of the shore—that shore where men smiled only to betray, where woman courted only to pollute, and doors were opened only to decoy and plunder him. When the crew of a vessel was discharged, as it came into port, what was expected from them? If in their own country, was it expected that they would save their earnings, visit their friends, respect the proprieties of life, reverence the law of the land? If they were strangers in a strange land, was it expected that they would be objects of hospitality and kindness? No, not even those who employed them, who extracted riches from their toil, and luxuries from their privations, not even they were usually kind. How much less those who dwelt far off. Every man's hand seemed to be against the sailor, and we need not wonder if the sailor's hand was against every man. They were indeed the Ishmaelites of the sea. No Saviour came down to the shore to say to them "Repent" and "be at peace with God." No John the Baptist lifted up his voice to them, as they were tossed to and fro on the wilderness of waters. At sea there was no man to care for their souls, and on land men lay in wait to make them a prey.

Thus it was—and thus it too often is, even now. Let us thank God, however, that a brighter day for sailors begins, as we trust, to dawn. Much was done for them, when some twenty-five years ago, Christians in England and in America first awoke to the truth that those who live on the waters are entitled to the gospel, no less than they who live on the land, and that as men they must have hearts to feel its power. Yet more was done when the conviction of that truth ripened into action; when missions among seamen were established; when afterwards the intoxicating cup was banished from a large portion of our merchant vessels, and when in some of them the rough discipline of the deck and the comfortless cheer of the fore-castle were improved. And the results—how cheering!—They have demonstrated not merely that these men can be reached—not merely here, as everywhere, God's blessing will follow faithful efforts to proclaim his truth and save souls; they show that this is the effort on which God seems to vouchsafe his peculiar smiles. In proportion to the means employed and the difficulties to be vanquished, no missions were ever more successful than those among seamen. Twenty years ago, a pious sailor, whether in the navies of England and America, or in their merchant service, was almost unknown;—officers and men alike seemed to agree with the world at large, in thinking, that religion was not made for sailors. Now it is computed, that among the seamen of these two countries, there are not less than ten thousand, who are communicants of some Christian denomination. It is said too, that there are eight hundred captains of vessels, who glory in the service of a heavenly Master, and whose crews are almost invariably distinguished by their orderly and contented spirit. In the American navy, it is not known that there were, fifteen years since, among all its officers, more than one or two communicants. There are now more than one hundred, and many of them occupy high positions. On board our cruisers at distant stations, where hardly any human agency was employed, a deep solicitude respecting religion has arisen in more than one instance, and groups of sailors have been found in the darkness of the night, offering us their united prayers for God's grace to make them Christians. In some instances means apparently the most inadequate have become a blessing to a whole ship's company; and it is said that throughout the American navy, where religious zeal was once either ridiculed or persecuted, it is now not only tolerated, but respected and even honoured.

And what do these results say to us? Do they not say, "go forward." God gives such success, not to supersede effort, but to reward and animate it. So much as will quicken prayer and redouble zeal, he vouchsafes; but it is only that he may leave it to his people to say whether that success shall continue and be progressive. There is still much land to be possessed. The little one is still to become a thousand, and the small one a strong nation. When you compare what has been done, with what remains undone, you must feel that there is urgent need of more exertion. In this country and England alone, there are two millions of men who labour on the water as seamen or watermen—men who are mostly in the prime of life, with passions that need all the restraints of religion, and temptations that might endanger the virtue of established Christians. They are men, too, who need specific religious instruction. Sailors, especially those on the high seas, are gregarious. They shun promiscuous assemblies. As they will live only in sailor boarding-houses, and associate only with sailor companions, so, for the present at least, they will frequent only sailor churches. And how far have these been provided? In our own land, I speak without exaggeration when I say, that they are insufficient for the accommodation of one-third of those who are temporarily on shore. In Philadelphia, where I believe the first effort in behalf of American seamen was made, and where, in proportion to the wealth and population, there is but little commerce and much philanthropic zeal, there may be accommodation now for one thousand sailors; whereas it is supposed that there are more than two thousand constantly in port, besides those who belong to the navy, and besides those, too, who are engaged in the navigation of rivers and canals. What must it be then along our coasts, in smaller towns, with a larger proportional trade? Consider, too, that nearly all sailors on shore might attend church—sickness being their only obstacle. Consider, moreover, how our commerce is extending. Year by year it stretches out its arms, till now our whalers are in every sea,—our traders in every harbour, and even along every barbarous shore. From a recent report made by the Navy Department, it would seem that the tonnage of the United States employed in trade, is at this moment but one fifth less than her's who has so long written herself undisputed mistress of the seas. What then must it be ten years hence?

They are facts like these which have recently led to the formation of the Churchman's Missionary Association for Seamen of the Port of Philadelphia. Its members and managers propose, with God's blessing and the aid of the benevolent, to construct a floating church, which shall lie at your wharves, and which shall open its doors, each Lord's day, to those who live on the water. I desire to bespeak for this effort your prayers and your active co-operation. Such a church is needed. It is needed because existing means for the religious improvement of seamen are inadequate. It is needed, too, because as a floating edifice, throwing out its flag among the masts and spars of your shipping, it will be more likely to attract the sailor's attention, and will commend itself more warmly to his professional sympathies. It can be erected at a cost much less than would be needed for a building and the necessary land on shore; it will be less exposed to danger from fire; and it can be readily moved from one point to another, should changes in the commerce of the city or other causes render removal expedient. And further, such an edifice is needed, that there may be at least one place, where the sailor can worship according to the order of our own church. Not a few of our seamen, natives and foreigners, are the children of Episcopalians. Others have been brought into contact with our services in the navy, or in distant lands. Others again are attracted to them by their social and responsive character; and others by their chastened fervour and orderly administration. But that which, beyond all else, wins the sailor's preference towards us is our Prayer Book. In one small volume, which he can carry always about him, he has exhaustless sources of instruction and comfort;—choice and copious extracts for Scripture for every day; prayers and thanksgiving suited to the manifold changes of his eventful life; deep confessions of sin; ardent ascriptions of praise and thanksgiving—the vows that he made or that were made for him at baptism—solemn appeals addressed both to those who neglect and to those who celebrate the Lord's supper—devout hymns, in which his whole heart can pour itself out in melody before the Lord, with creeds and more extended expositions of a Christian's faith. These—must they not be to him a perpetual well-spring of blessing and delight, if he be only led, when on shore by uniting in our public worship, to use, to appreciate, and to enjoy them?

And yet, what, thus far, has the church of American Episcopalians—the church blessed by this book of Common Prayer, done for Sailors? In whatever proportion she has peculiar means for promoting their welfare, is she not bound in the same proportion to use them? As a church, too, planted especially in large cities, and embracing, within her pale, multitudes who are engaged in commerce, are not her resulting obligations the more imperative? We ask, then, what has this church done as yet, for sailors? But three or four chapels, where they can worship according to the order of our service, have been opened along the whole extent of our sea-board and these have been opened only within the last six or seven years to those bearing other Christian names, we have left the toil and the glory of conducting the sailor's worship and breaking to them the bread of life. Well, then, may we blush for the past, while we bless God that our supineness is at length disturbed—that while we commend the noble zeal of others, we have come at last to feel the awakening influence of their example—that we are now bent on sharing in the burden of this work, and are resolved that if sailors be not won to the faith and obedience of Christ and him crucified, the fault shall not be ours.

Non-Episcopal Puseyism—Impartial Testimony.

We notice that our article under the above caption, has been copied entire on the first page of the last number of the Presbyterian Herald, just received. We turned to the editorial columns to ascertain what would be offered in opposition to our statements; as we supposed, of course, that some of our non-Episcopal brethren would be startled at the bare thought of their being chargeable with Puseyism, quite as justly, as Episcopalians. We were agreeably surprised to find that not only was the insertion of our article not accompanied by any editorial strictures, but that the following editorial testimony was borne to the truthfulness of its views. Without any allusion to our article, the editor, writing on the subject of exclusiveness, and complaining of his Baptist brethren that they "cannot authorize their members to unite with a Presbyterian Church by giving them a letter to do so," assigns as one reason for this, that so to do would be to "admit that an unbaptized community of religious persons were a Gospel Church, as primitively constituted;" which means in plain English, that a community of religious persons who have not been immersed, though they have faith, and love, and holiness of heart and life; though they have a ministry and sacraments, and the manifest presence of God among them, are no Church of Christ at all. Immersion is baptism and nothing else is.—The non-immersed are unbaptized, therefore they cannot constitute a Church of Christ. We have not before us the Baptist standards to refer to; but we presume this view of immersion is in them. Such Puseyism as this, can be found in no line or page, or volume of the Standards of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The Editor of the Presbyterian Herald further testifies, "They make what they conceive to be the improper observance of an external rite, as to the mere mode of its reception, the ground upon which they unchurch those whom they admit that Christ has received into his spiritual family or invisible Church." And again: "They are more exclusive than the highest of the high-church Episcopalians in refusing to admit Pedobaptists to the communion table; for we have never known Episcopalians to refuse the privilege of communion to other Churches, though many of them refuse to receive the ordinance from our ministry. The very highest of the high-church Episcopalians will suffer a Presbyterian to commune with them, but the Baptists will not." And again: "We have, in one instance, gone so far as to preach the sermon explaining the nature of the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, and then at the close of it, sat as a spectator of its reception by the Church, without being invited to partake of it."

Now we by no means rejoice in the exposure of such frailties of our nature among the different denominations of Christians; nor do we think the Baptist brethren, many of whom we honor and love as members of Christ, and heirs of his kingdom, are any more chargeable with such frailties than their neighbors around. We think we see Puseyism, alas! too much of it, in the sense of attaching undue importance to certain peculiarities of form and doctrine, clearly non-essential in themselves, in every denomination. The difference between them and us seems to be, that we confess its existence among us, and contend openly against it; but they cherish theirs, and with their own eye by no means clear of visual obstructions, are very observant of notes in their brother's eye, and seem far more anxious to root out Episcopal, than they are to root out Presbyterian, or Baptist or Methodist, or any other sort of Puseyism. It is a homely saying, but there is great significance in it, and we think we all might profit by its occasional recollection,—

"O would kind heaven the gift give us,
To see ourselves as others see us."

Western Episcopalian.

George and his little Sister.

A little boy asked his mother to let him lead his little sister out on the green grass. She had just begun to run alone, and could not step over anything that lay in the way. His mother told him he might lead out the little girl, but charged him not to let her fall. I found them at play, very happy, in the field. I said, 'You seem very happy, George. Is this your sister?'

'Yes, sir.'

'Can she walk alone?'

'Yes, sir, on smooth ground.'

'And how did she get over these stones, which lie between us and the house?'

'O, sir, mother charged me to be careful that she did not fall, and so I put my hands under her arms, and lifted her up when she came to a stone, so that she need not hit her little foot against it.'

'That is right, George; and I want to tell you one thing. You see now how to understand that beautiful text, 'He shall give his angels charge concerning thee, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.' God charges his angels to lead and lift good people over difficulties, just as you have lifted little Anne over these stones. Do you understand it now?'

'O, yes, sir, and I shall never forget it while I live.'

Can one child thus take care of another, and cannot God take care of those who put their trust in him? Surely he can; and there is not a child, who may read this story, over whom he is not ready to give his holy angels charge.—L. Standard.

Give! Give!

Disinterestness! If we only knew the greatness of this virtue or only dreamed of the pure happiness it brings, we would toil for it day in and day out as Earth's crowning glory. Have you means? The possession of this virtue would make them a blessing to you and to all.—Are you without them? Disinterestness would make you rich, wealthy in just and generous acts. Do you possess influence, talent? Thus blest you would impress society with a manly cast. There is no goodness without disinterestness, and no disinterestness without true moral greatness.

Give! Give! not of your hard coppers merely! But of your heart's best sympathy—of your head's best thoughts: give them freely, boldly: give them heartily to whatever may advance, elevate, dignify the race! What is life when chained down by one ever-mastering passion!—What is earth, creation, God, when we are consumed by lust of gain, ambition, heartless show? How earth, creation and God rebuke, in all things, selfishness, whether grovelling or refined, debased by course habits, or gilded over by artificial polish! The poet felt this when he said or sung:—

The sun gives ever; so the earth—
What it can give, so much 'tis worth.
The ocean gives in many ways—
Gives paths, gives fishes, rivers, buoys;
So, too, the air it gives us breath,
When it stops giving, comes in death.
Give, give, be always giving,
Who gives not, is not living,
The more you give,
The more you live.

God's love hath in us wealth unheaped,
Only by giving it as reaped;
The body withers, and the mind,
If pent in by a selfish mind.
Give strength, give thought, give deeds, give self,
Give love, give tears, and give thyself.
Give, give, be always giving,
Who gives not, is not living;
The more you give,
The more you live.

It is the manner of God to cast down that he may raise, to abase that he may exalt. Contrarily, Satan raises up that he may throw down, and intends nothing but our dejection in our advancement.—Bp. Hall.

To Agents and Subscribers.

AGENTS OF THE BANNER, who may have made collections, are respectfully requested to remit the amount to us by mail. Notes of any specie-paying Banks will be received.

SUBSCRIBERS, who have received bills, will especially oblige us by remitting to us the amounts respectively due. We solicit early attention to them.

The terms of the Paper are Two Dollars and Fifty Cents a year, payable in advance; or Three Dollars if not paid before the end of the year. The advance price will be charged when we are obliged to collect the bills through a travelling agent.

Any person remitting Ten Dollars, will be entitled to receive five copies for one year.

Communications for the Editor may be addressed to the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, and for the publisher to James S. Newbold, both, No. 89 south Seventh street, Philadelphia.

Office of the "Banner of the Cross."

The office of this paper has been removed from No. 89 South Fifth street, to the Book store of Mr. R. S. H. George, No. 16 South Seventh street, between Market and Chestnut streets.

Mr. George will act as Agent for the receipt of subscriptions, etc.

NEW AGENTS.—The following named gentlemen have very kindly consented to act as Agents for the "Banner."

Rev. F. W. Boyd, Grand Gulf and Port Gibson, Mississippi;
W. C. Smedes, Esq., Vicksburg, Mississippi;
Charles A. Bradford, Esq., Jackson, Mississippi.

PRACTICAL CHARITY.—Among our selections will be found an interesting account of "Protestant sisterhoods." The most remarkable feature, in these excellent institutions, is the fact that they are established by those christian bodies whose Protestantism cannot be called in question. That they have excited no fears, and invited no attacks, is a further illustration of the homely truth that one man may steal a horse while another must not venture to look over the fence! "The Edinburgh Review" in which the account is published is well known as a violent enemy of all that tends to that most indefinite and uncertain thing called "Puseyism."

We are rejoiced, since none else were found to begin the good work, that these Protestant denominations have taken the lead. Will the Church refuse to follow? Will she be content to leave these practical charities to the extremes of Romanism and Protestantism, or hand over her poor members to the care of the state, or to the care of societies which acknowledge no connection with our Holy Faith?

We are ready enough to form societies for the dissemination of Evangelical knowledge. Why are we so slow in associating together for the extension of Evangelical practice? If we wish "the gospel in the church" to extend, we must not only by precepts teach men to know, the truth, but by example lead them to "practice what they know."

Some among us have great fear of the extension of Romanism. Do we not afford the Romanists all the opportunity they desire by leaving the great field of practical charity almost unoccupied? Look at their Orphan Asylums, and their other similar institutions in this very city, and then consider if, in the use of such means, they are not likely to increase and multiply. Where are our Asylums for Widows, for Orphans, for the stranger, the sick and the destitute? We know of only one such institution, and that a very limited one, connected with the Church in this city!

Complaints are made of the Society of Odd-Fellows for securing more the affections and the interests of some of our people than they give to the Church of the living God. And why? Is it not because they faithfully perform those works of mercy which the Church leaves undone? We have heard of a member of this Society who was taken sick at Charleston, and being in want, not only supplied by his brethren with means, but a person sent with him to take care of him as far as Baltimore, and by his brethren there brought in the same way to this city, where he died, attended by kind and fraternal ministrations, and at last his body was sent on with every care to his friends in Maine. Would the Church have done this for one of her sick members? We freely own that if the Church does not perform her appropriate offices of mercy, and if these societies take her place in such things, they will secure, and they so far deserve, the sympathy and interest of men.

We have much to do in practical charity before we will present the Church to men in her true aspect. What is the most we now do? Why, only to erect edifices in which men may worship God if they can pay their pew rents. A few sittings in the out of the way corners are, perhaps, given free to the poor and the stranger. A small collection is made every Communion Sunday to be distributed among the destitute. A few ladies perhaps, are engaged in the good work of supplying garments for the poor. Add to these, Sunday schools, and in some cases, parochial schools, and you have the whole extent of our practical charities. The wonder is that, with such a naked and imperfect system, the Church has ever extended at all!

If we desire to make the Church, which we believe to be "Apostolic," the instrument of good to men, and the means of extending God's glory upon earth, we must give more completeness to her system of practical charity. We must so develop, not her faith, that we are not to do, but her practice that She may meet the demands of suffering humanity and the wants of men, as Christ appointed her to do, and then like the rod of Moses She will swallow up all counterfeits, whether they be religious sects or human societies, and be looked to by men as their present and eternal refuge, the ARK in which they "may so pass the waves of this troublesome world, that finally they may come to the land of everlasting life."

CHURCH BOOK STORE AND AGENCY FOR THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL S. S. UNION.—It will be seen that the Banner office has been removed to the Book Store of Mr. R. S. H. George, who has taken Mr. Hooker's late store, No. 16 SOUTH SEVENTH STREET, a few doors above Chestnut.

Mr. George is well known as a long established Church bookseller in this city, and deserves the patronage of the members of the Church. He will have constantly on hand a good supply of Sunday School Books. The unjust efforts which have been made to injure "the Sunday School Union," will, we trust, have the effect of making its friends more anxious to sustain it, and when they wish books of this description or other Church publications, we hope they will not forget to call upon Mr. George.

SIXTY-FIFTH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE DIOCESE OF NEW JERSEY.—The Convention met at 10 A. M., on Wednesday last, the 31st ult., in Grace Church, Newark. After morning prayer, the Bishop delivered his triennial charge to the clergy. Its subject was the Cross of CHRIST, the hope, the theme, and the model of the Clergy. It is needless to say, that it was thoroughly practical, earnest, and stirring. Should any who heard it, fail to profit by it, the fault must be theirs alone. The Convention ordered 1000 copies of it to be printed. After the delivery of the Charge, the Bishop administered the Holy Communion, aided by the Rev. Dr. Barry.

At the close of the service the Convention was called to order. The Rev. A. B. Patterson was then unanimously re-elected Secretary. A part of the Committee on Rules of Order reported in favor of certain alterations in the old rules, which, however, after considerable discussion, were rejected, and the old rules adopted without change.

In the evening a sermon was preached by the Rev. H. B. Sherman, and a collection made in behalf of the Diocesan Society for the promotion of Christian Knowledge and Piety.

Thursday being Ascension Day, the Holy Communion was administered, after morning prayer, by the Bishop, aided by the Rev. Mr. Croes. The business of the day commenced with the admission of three new parishes, (St. Thomas's, Vernon, St. Philip's, Newark, and St. Matthew's, Newark,) into union with the Convention. It is somewhat remarkable, that at the same time, and by the same resolution, three such parishes should have been thus received.

St. Thomas's is a new organization in the upper portion of the state, where churchmen are few in number. It owes its church and its organization chiefly to the liberality of a wealthy family, who have a large estate in the neighborhood, and who have the grace to acknowledge practically that property has its duties as well as its rights.

St. Philip's congregation is composed of persons of African descent, who have been collected and ministered to by the disinterested zeal of the Rev. J. H. Tyng. The committee on new parishes took no notice of the peculiarity of this case in their report, but confined themselves to the documents before them, upon which they founded the usual resolution for admission. Not a word was said in reference to that peculiarity by any member of the Convention, although the fact was generally if not universally known.

St. Matthew's, Newark, the third of the churches admitted to Convention, is composed of Germans, who a few months since were Lutherans. Their minister having conformed to the church, is now preparing for ordination. Meanwhile, with the aid of the clergy in Newark, especially of Rev. Messrs.

Henderson and Lowell, he has succeeded in making a considerable part of his flock appreciate and adopt his views. These are the members of St. Matthew's Church. Not the least interesting of the services of Ascension Day, was that held in Trinity Church, in the evening, in behalf of this new parish. The sermon was preached in German by the Rev. Mr. Cook, missionary to the Germans in New York, after which the Bishop confirmed a number of youthful Germans, whose devout and reverential demeanor imparted to the administration of the sacred rite a peculiar solemnity. Seldom does one see, (I have never seen,) the real catholicity of the Church, so strikingly illustrated as it was on Ascension Day in the case of St. Philip's and St. Matthew's churches.

After the admission of the new parishes, the Bishop delivered his Annual Address. It gave an encouraging account of the state of the Diocese; while it failed not to admonish as opportunity served, both clergy and laity, of the duty of going on, to multiply and edify the churches. As it will be published, details are needless here.

The usual elections were held, and the result was as follows.

STANDING COMMITTEE.

Of the Clergy.	Of the Laity.

TREASURER.—Rev. R. J. Germain.

The Committee, to whom had been referred, by the former Convention, a proposed amendment to the 1st and 2d Canons, being divided in opinion, presented two adverse reports. These were finally referred back to the committee, with instructions to report to the next Convention. In the evening, in Trinity church, the parochial reports were read, and other ordinary business transacted. The Convention then adjourned sine die, after chanting the Gloria in Excelsis, and receiving the Bishop's benediction.

The notices of the Maryland and Missouri Conventions were not received until our paper was going to press.

We thank the kind correspondent who has furnished the following account of THE CONVENTION OF DELAWARE.

The Fifty-eighth Annual Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the Diocese of Delaware, met in Immanuel Church, Newcastle, on Wednesday morning, May 31, at 9 o'clock. There were present, six of the Clerical, (besides the Bishop,) and sixteen of the Lay Delegates. The Rt. Rev. Alfred Lee, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, took the Chair, and the Convention after being organized took a recess at 10 o'clock, for Divine service.

Morning prayer as far as the creed, was said by the Rev. Jacob B. Smith, the remainder by the Rev. Saml. C. Brinckle. The Ante-communion service was performed by the Bishop—the Rev. Thomas F. Billopp, the Rector of the Parish, reading the Epistle.

The Convention Sermon was preached by the Bishop, after which he proceeded to administer the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Thos. F. Billopp.

The Convention re-assembled immediately after Divine service, and after a short session adjourned until 3 o'clock, P. M.

Immediately after the opening of the Convention at 3 o'clock, the Bishop delivered his Annual Address.

At 8 o'clock, P. M., the Church was again opened for Divine service. Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Walter E. Franklin, and the Sermon preached by the Rev. Andrew F. Freeman. After the Sermon, the Bishop administered the rite of Confirmation to four persons—the Rector of the parish reading the "Preface."

Thursday, June 1.—Ascension Day. The Convention met at 9 o'clock, and Morning Prayer as far as the Second Lesson was said by the Rev. Andrew F. Freeman—the remainder by the Rev. J. B. Smith.

The Ante-communion service was performed by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. J. B. Smith, who read the Epistle. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Edwin M. Van Deusen.—Immediately after the Second Lesson, the Bishop baptized the infant daughter of the Rector of the Parish.

The Rev. Thos. Farmar Billopp was unanimously re-elected secretary, and Edmund Canby, Esq., was elected Treasurer, and Evan H. Thomas, Esq., resigned.

The following gentlemen were elected the Standing Committee for the ensuing year.

Rev. Thos. F. Billopp,	Wm. T. Read, Esq.,
" W. E. Franklin,	Hon. Geo. B. Rodney,
" E. M. Van Deusen,	of the Laity.

TRUSTEES OF THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

Rev. E. M. Van Deusen, and Rev. W. E. Franklin.

The New Parish of "Christ Church, Delaware City," was admitted into full union with the Convention.

The next Annual Convention will be held in Christ Church, Milford, on the last Wednesday in May, 1849.

New Castle, Festival of the Ascension, 1848.

Foreign Items.

Dr. Graham, the new Bishop of Chester, was confirmed at St. James' Church, Piccadilly, on Saturday, and consecrated the following day at Whitehall Chapel, by the Archbishop of York.

The Rev. E. B. Ramsay, Dean of Edinburgh, has been appointed Bishop of Glasgow and Galloway, in the room of the late R. Russell. A large church is to be erected for the new bishop in the western suburbs of Glasgow.

Friday night's Gazette contains an order in council, substituting a money payment of 600*l.* a-year to the Dean of Exeter for certain property belonging to him in right of his office, and hereafter to be vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

The Globe states that subscriptions have been set on foot to enable the Rev. G. C. Gorham to prosecute his suit in the courts of law against his Grace of Exeter. The same authority states that the Attorney-General will very shortly issue a quære impedit against the Bishop of Exeter in the case of the Rev. Mr. Gorham; and that the Court of Queen's Bench will be moved for an order of costs against the Bishop in the case of the Queen v. Latimer.

The Bishop of Manchester has announced that he is averse to granting letters dimissory under any circumstances, and that he will require candidates for orders in his diocese to be ordained by himself.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS.—The Editor of the Banner thanks the unknown friend who sent through him:

"Ten dollars, a friendly offering to the Church of the Redemption."
June 6th, 1848.

The donation has been appropriated as desired.

We have great pleasure in publishing the following.

Key West, May 22d, 1848.

To the Editor of the Banner of the Cross.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

Will you be pleased to acknowledge for me the receipt of a case of books, mostly valuable theological, for the use of St. Paul's Church, and the Missionary at this station, from the Librarian of the Bishop White Parish Library Association.

An appropriate place will be provided for them in the vestry room of the new church now building, where they will be placed as a lasting monument of the beneficence of the Association.

This acknowledgment would have been made long ago; but, by some mistake, after they had been landed upon the wharf here, they were taken on board another vessel and carried to Mobile.

The one hundred 12mo. Prayer Books and Tracts, sent by the Female Prayer Book Society, have been nearly all distributed. They are afloat on board of wrecking vessels and merchant ships, bound in various directions, as so many silent teachers and messengers of mercy; and the fruits of their usefulness will never be known until that great day when "the land and the sea shall give up their dead."

THE MISSIONARY.

The Rector, Church wardens, and Vestrymen of St. Mark's Church, Mauch Chunk, tender their warm acknowledgements to the "Young Churchman's Missionary Association," for their valuable present of a very neat and chaste service of communion plate; to the

"Bishop White Parish Library Association of Philadelphia," for eleven volumes as an addition to the Parish library; and to John Welsh, Esq., for his donation, through Mr. J. E. Barnes, of fifty dollars, to assist in finishing their church edifice.

W. H. SAYRE, Church warden.

To the Editor of the Banner of the Cross, Philadelphia.

REV. SIR:—The Parish of Zion Church, having received last week a donation of books from the Bishop White Parish Library Association, of Philadelphia, with a request for the acknowledgement of their receipt in the "Banner of the Cross;" you will oblige us by inserting in your paper, the following extract from the records of the Vestry.

Vestry meeting of Zion Church, Mendon, Adams, Co. Ills., May 22, 1848, "Resolved, That the thanks of this Parish are due, and are hereby tendered to the ladies of the Bishop White Parish Library Association, for their very generous and acceptable donation of a library, consisting of thirty volumes, for the use of the Parish; and the Vestry would not let this opportunity pass, without expressing their earnest prayer, that the blessing of the Great Author of all our mercies, may rest upon the donors; and that the managers of the society may often have it in their power to send a similar valuable library to some remote missionary station, and thus give the missionary an opportunity of access to some standard Theological works for study; from which, in consequence of the smallness of his salary, with a heavy heart, he has been debarred."

LEVI STILLMAN, } Vestrymen.
M. B. HARRISON, }
JAMES B. W. SELLWOOD, }

We present to our readers the following pressing call for help, trusting that it may obtain that attention which the urgency of the case demands. It is an extract from a letter from the Missionary at Beloit, Wisconsin, to a gentleman in this city, and not written for publication. We prefer letting the Missionary tell his own story, prefacing it however with the following recommendation.

I earnestly commend the effort of Mr. H. T. Wells to obtain aid towards building a Church at Beloit, in Wisconsin. There are peculiar circumstances which make the enterprise of great importance, and sanction most strenuous exertions. The congregation is small but zealous, and have subscribed to the extent of their ability. The Missionary, the Rev. S. C. Millett, is devoted to the sacred cause of our Divine Master, but will be greatly impeded in his exertions, so long as he is limited to a very small place for the celebration of the solemn services of the sanctuary. JACKSON KEMPER, Bishop.
Beloit, Wis., April 21, 1848.

"The little band of Churchmen I think are every day growing more zealous and united; and we have determined to make the attempt to erect an edifice on the west side of the river, on a lot given us by Mr. Hackett, (on the condition that we complete such building in two years from the coming Sept.) Now it is a case of life or death with us. If we remain as we are, we must give up. The other denominations, Baptists and Methodists, having received aid from the East have commodious houses of worship, well situated. We have a very small edifice, inconvenient in every respect; under these circumstances, while the others use every endeavor to draw in those, not particularly attached to any one denomination, we can have no chance of drawing them to the church, for we have in the first place no room for them, and in the second place we are situated in such a manner, that if we had the room, we are entirely on one side. The subscription paper has been and is now circulating, and I can assure you all is being done by Episcopalians, that is possible. The subscriptions on their part are far more liberal than I have been accustomed to see at the East. You very well know that there are no persons of wealth here. All have to contend, more or less, with the difficulties incident to small means; but there is a generous heart with some, far more so than perhaps our Eastern friends imagine. It has been gratifying to me, that many who attend no place of worship, have manifested a willingness, far beyond my expectations, to assist us, and have promised that they will not only give, but will attend the Church when erected. Carpenters and Masons have pledged themselves in labor to the amount of from $25 to $50 each. There can be no doubt, if we had a church of convenient dimensions, situated upon the lot given us by Mr. H., we should in a few years hold a very respectable rank among the denominations who surround us. On the 19th the Bishop was here and laid the corner stone, and is much interested in the enterprise. I have enclosed in this, his sanction to our efforts to obtain through your kindness, any assistance our Eastern friends may see fit to give us. What we need, and find it difficult to obtain here, is money, to furnish materials. We can to a great extent secure labor. You are aware that at the present time, there is no house of worship on the west side of the river. Since you were here, the water power has changed owners, and men of capital are engaged in the enterprise of making a good and permanent dam. Mr. Walker, of Chicago, expends $2000 upon it this summer, and already a new life is imparted to the west side, and many good substantial buildings are already in progress of erection on that side. In all probability in a very few years, mills and factories of various kinds will be erected, and it is the belief of the business men, that the west side of the river will have as many inhabitants as the east side. Now we have the first chance; a location which will be accessible from the east side as well as the west. If we fail, I have every reason to believe, our last remaining hope, will be taken from us, and for many years, we must struggle on, as we are, if we do not become entirely extinct. Under these circumstances, any aid we can receive, will be most grateful, and will tell upon the interests of the Church, not only in B., but for miles around. If the Church can be permanently planted on a good foundation in some of these more important points, we shall have no difficulty in extending her borders over this beautiful country; and that Beloit is one of the most important points for Churchmen to aid, I believe must be evident from the fact, that we have now nearly 2000 inhabitants, a thriving village, beautifully located on one of the best water powers in the west, 60 miles from Racine and Southport, 65 from Milwaukee, and 90 from Chicago—with a charming and fertile country in every direction—and with the almost certain prospect of a branch railroad from the main track, running from Chicago to Galena. Now is the time for the Church to secure for herself a respectable and firm footing—but the few here, zealous as they are, cannot erect a building without aid. We therefore earnestly present our claims upon the kind feelings of our Eastern friends."

Contributions for the above object may be sent to the office of the Banner of the Cross.

New Publications.

The following notice is from a Presbyterian of this city who has carefully examined the work, and is well qualified to judge of its merits.

THE AMERICAN MANUAL, containing a brief outline of the origin and progress of political power, and the law of nations; a commentary of the Constitution of the United States of North America, and a lucid exposition of the duties and responsibilities of voters, jurors and civil magistrates; with questions, definitions and marginal exercises, designed to develop and strengthen the moral and intellectual power of youth, and impart an accurate knowledge of the nature and necessity of political wisdom. Adapted to the use of schools, academies, and the public. By Joseph Bartlett Burleigh, A. M., President of Newton University, &c., Philada., Grigg, Elliott & Co., No. 14 north Fourth street, 1848. [12 mo. cloth, pp. 318; Appendix, pp. 54.]

This book is one which must have cost its author very great labour, and which is, we think, well fitted to promote the important object which he had in view when preparing it. To communicate the elements of political knowledge in such a manner as at once to interest and instruct the young is a useful and honorable task, and should secure for him by whom it is faithfully performed, the gratitude and applause of all. This task Mr. Burleigh has fulfilled. A volume of three hundred and eighteen pages, conveying a large amount of information, furnished with numerous questions at the foot of each page, and having synonymous words printed throughout in the margin, as an aid to composition, and an incentive to thought, exhibits at once his acquaintance with the subject, his unwearied industry, and his skill as a practical teacher. The work is well printed, and an Appendix of 54 pages supplies the pupil with numerous statistical tables, and with much besides which he cannot but find beneficial.

THE KING'S MESSENGERS, an allegorical tale by the REV. W. ADAMS, M. A. Fellow of Merton College, Oxford, Author of the Shadow of the Cross. From the London edition, with engravings executed by W. S. Howland. From original designs by Weir, New York; General Protestant Episcopal S. S. Union, Daniel Dana Jr. Agent, 20 John st., for sale by R. S. H. George, 16 South Seventh st. Philadelphia.

This is in appearance a most attractive book, so far as chaste and beautiful binding, excellent printing, and appropriate and finely executed illustrations can make it so.

Of its contents we need hardly speak to those who are acquainted with the character of its author's other writings. Its object is to bring forward prominently and distinctly, a single Christian duty. In consequence of this it involves very little of doctrinal teaching. This we esteem in such a work a peculiar excellence. The duty enforced is suggested by that divine precept, "lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven." We commend it as a sound, practical work adapted to the understanding of children, and conveying most important lessons in a manner likely to secure attention, and to make deep and lasting impressions on the young heart.

AN EXAMINATION of a book entitled Discourses on the Apostolical Succession, by W. D. Snodgrass, D. D., pastor of the Second street Presbyterian Church, Troy. By REV. WILLIAM JOHNSON, Rector of St. Stephen's Church, Milledgeville, Georgia. New York, Stanford & Swords, 139 Broadway.

This is a well printed pamphlet of about fifty pages. Our limited space will not permit us to give a particular account of this learned and able defence of "the Apostolical Succession." We consider it a complete refutation of the work examined. And it deserves to be especially noted, that the author is not content with giving true argument, but he has endeavored to exhibit the right spirit. This we conceive gives especial strength to any course of just reasoning. We regard this little work as deserving of particular regard as an honest, straight forward and Christian defence of the truth against the assaults of error.

It has been wisely said, "A cheerful look and pardon are the best revenge for any injury;" and again, "If thou art vexed, thou wilt have two troubles."

Obituary.

Died, at Jamaica, L. I., on Friday, May 19th, aged 43 years and 4 months, MARY ELIZABETH, wife of the Rev. William Lupton Johnson, D.D., Rector of Grace Church in that place.

Mrs. Johnson was the eldest child of the Rev. Henry Whitlock, a clergyman distinguished for his virtues and talents, who was for several years Rector of Trinity Church, New Haven, Ct., having previously been assistant minister to the former Rector, the Rev. Bela Hubbard, D.D., and for several years Rector of St. Paul's Church, Norwalk. He died with consumption in 1814, at the age of 37, in Fayetteville, N. C., on his way to the farther South for his health, leaving behind him a most cherished memory and a reputation for distinguished excellence as a man, a pastor, a preacher, and a theologian. He had married Eulalia Bartram, who was left with five children, of whom Mrs. Johnson was the eldest. She was brought up in New Haven, under the pastoral care of the Rev. Harry Crosswell, D.D., who succeeded her father in the Rectorship; and she was educated partly in excellent schools in that city, and in a female Institute of high character in Litchfield, Ct. She was baptized in Norwalk, and confirmed in N. Haven, by Bishop Brownell in 1821. At the early age of 17 she was married, and then resided for seven years in Trenton, N. Jersey, and for nineteen years in Jamaica. Her sickness was of a year's continuance, and towards the close attended with great suffering, which she bore with the meekness and submission of one who was sustained by the all-sufficient grace of the Redeemer. Trusting in His merits with most full and cordial reliance, committing herself to His care, with most devout expressions of submission and faith, of hope and love, she exchanged a life of studious and contemplative faith for the higher employment and duties of the better life "within the veil"—leaving a large circle of attached and lamenting friends, to whom she had become singularly endeared, by her many virtues, her gentle and affectionate disposition, her charity of heart and life, and the childlike simplicity and transparent sincerity of her nature. Endeared to them by these enduring qualities, she was as well admired for her intellectual endowments. Appropriate discourses were preached in her parish church on the Sunday by the Rev. Roosevelt Johnson, the only brother of the bereaved husband, and on Monday her body was committed to the grave in the parish church-yard, by the side of her gifted daughter and two others of her children who had preceded her, the funeral service being read by the Rev. O. Harriman, Rector of St. George's, Hampstead; and a funeral discourse being delivered before a large assembly of mourning and sympathizing attendants by the Rev. Dr. Seabury, her own and her husband's friend.

Died, at Red bank, N. J., on Tuesday, 23d May, ELIZA HARTSHORNE, daughter of the late Richard Hartshorne, Esq., of Portland, N. J.

We record with sorrow the death of the Rev. ALEXANDER FRASER, Rector of St. Philip's Church, in this city, and for several years a Missionary of the New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society. He was an excellent man, and a faithful minister of Christ. He was borne to the grave on Monday last. The first part of the Burial Service was said in St. John's Chapel by Rev. Dr. Berrian, and an appropriate discourse pronounced by Rev. Thomas Clark, who also said the latter portion of the service at the tomb, in Greenwood Cemetery. We are promised an Obituary Notice for our text.

Marginal Readings, &c.

MR. EDITOR:—

Several years have elapsed since the publication of Mr. Hervey Wilbur's edition of the Bible. I know not how widely it has been circulated; but as it was "stereotyped," as it comprehended a "key sheet of questions" "to facilitate the acquisition of scriptural knowledge in Bible Classes, Sunday Schools, Common Schools and private families;" and as agents were employed to send copies through the country, the presumption is that the name of Mr. H. Wilbur is familiar to "not a few." The title page of this edition of the "Holy Bible" contains some peculiarities. The following is a part of it: "translated out of the original tongues, and with the former translations diligently compared and revised." With Canne's marginal references, together with the Apocrypha and Index." "The text corrected according to the standard of the American Bible Society."

* It is customary to insert in the title page these words about the comparison and revision. They may be found in the American Bible Society's edition. But who made the comparison and revision? Do the publishers of all new editions make them? Has the Bible Society ever appointed a committee of comparison and revision? If not, King James the first ought surely, as in Dr. Coit's edition, to have the credit which is due to him. To show the importance of having a correct title page, the following anecdote is extracted from Dr. Coit's preface. "Somewhere in New England, in a parish to which the regular use of the Bible in public worship was unknown, (a circumstance once too frequent, if not still so, in our Protestant land,) it became a query, whether the minister should commence the reading of it in his Lord's day services. A respectable and thoughtful committee were assembled to discuss the moot point, and edify their fellow-parishioners with the result of their careful investigations. After experiencing their due share of difference and perplexity, and when they were brought quite to a stand with wearying doubt, one of their number, prompted by sudden thought, rose, and taking up a Bible which lay on their table, began to pore over the title page. 'Why,' said he, with a most self-satisfactory exclamation, 'here is enough to settle our debate at once. Do you not see it written in the Bible itself—APPOINTED TO BE READ IN CHURCHES?!' These words are generally, if not always, printed in Bibles in England.

Why is it stated that the text has been corrected according to the standard of a particular society? On what is the standard here alluded to founded? Again: Has the American Bible Society ever printed the Apocrypha? If so, where is the "text"? I doubt whether it can be found.† Further, when we read of the text of the Society in question, we are irresistibly led to the contemplation of a naked text; without references, without marginal readings, without note or comment. But the title page of Mr. Wilbur's Bible not only announces the reprint of Canne's references, but it fails to inform the reader that it has marginal readings, and these quite different from the readings published by the translators, and that here and there a short note has been inserted having the appearance of a marginal reading.

Looking beyond the title page, we come, after two pages, to something addressed "to the reader." And who addresses it? Not Mr. Wilbur; for we are told that for the dedication to the English translation the editors have there substituted a "short account" of different translations. What editors? It would have been difficult to answer, if the address "to the reader" contained in Isaac Collins's handsome edition of the Bible published in 1791, in Trenton, N. J., had not accidentally presented itself to view. But the "short account" was written and sent forth by one Editor. The inference then, which I draw is, that some editors between 1791 and 1830 extracted their "short account" from Collins's edition, and that Mr. H. Wilbur extracted it from them. But quere still: Who was the Editor in 1791?

As to the short notes which have the appearance of marginal readings, I have examined only eight. None of these, however, seem to me to have been introduced in accordance with the maxim, Let all things be done unto edification. I will refer to five.

1. Neh. xii. 22. Darius the Persian is said to be "the last king of that monarchy." Commentators are by no means agreed on that point.

2. Rev. ix. 15. The four angels were loosed, "that is, (says Mr. W.) the Turks against the Christians." How does he know that?

3. Titus iii. 8. "That they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works," 14, "Let ours also learn to maintain good works." The marginal reading of the 14th verse in our received translation is, profess honest trades. Mr. Wilbur omits this, and tells us at the 8th verse, that the Greek is, go before. According to his views, they who believe in God ought to go before good works? What does this mean? Is he afraid that their works will not "follow them"? The translation profess honest trades is a correct one, as may be seen from an examination of Heinrich's in loco. The translators might have inserted the same marginal reading at the 8th verse.

4. Rev. xvii. 12. "The ten horns which thou sawest, are ten kings." Kings, (says Mr. W.) are kingdoms. That is, to continue the sentence, these ten kingdoms "have received no kingdom as yet!"

5. Deut. xxiii. 1. The phrase "shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord," means (says Mr. W.) "not to have any vote in public meetings, nor bear any office in Church or State, and not otherwise." How nearly allied the meetings of the Hebrews were to New England congregational meetings in the point of voting, the present writer is not prepared to decide. He thinks, however, that the phrase "shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord," is very similar to that in the New Testament, "let him be unto thee as a heathen."

In searching Dr. Coit's edition of the Bible for marginal readings, I lately, Mr. Editor, found myself, "after a sort," in the condition of the lady, who having for years lost sight of her spectacles, at length upon opening her Bible, laid violent hands on them. For years have I been desirous of seeing a reprint of the admirable treatise, entitled "The Translators to the Reader." What was my surprise, and what my pleasure, then, to learn that Dr. Coit had done good service to the Church in the United States, by its republication? In all probability a large proportion of your readers have never seen the address to which I refer.—Let me, then, recommend to them the purchase of Dr. Coit's edition; and for the benefit of those who are partial to large print, let me also recommend the separate publication of the Address in a type which may be "read of all."

WESTERN.

For the Banner of the Cross.

"And he stretched forth his hand towards his disciples, and said, Behold my mother and my brethren. For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in Heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother."—St. Matt. xii. 49, 50.

What a deeply interesting view we have in these words of Jesus, of the relationship which subsists between him and his true disciples.

How intimate! As the dew-drop that glistens in the morning light, retains its relation to the great ocean, so the human spirit, wherever it may be, retains unimpaired, its relation to that blessed Being who is "the Life and Light of men." But there is over and beyond this, a more intimate relation. "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in Heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother!"

How grateful! The relationships of earth are always brief, and in most of them there is a strong infusion of bitterness.

"The Saviour cannot pass away,
And with Him lives our joy."

To Him the good man may always come, and enjoy the most grateful communion. When all the little streams of human comfort are dry or imbibed, to those who desire it, Jesus will give that water of life which will forever assuage their thirst.

† In one passage at least the text of the A. B. Society is not followed, viz: 1 Tim. iv. 16, Mr. Wilbur's Bible has it "thy doctrine," instead of "the doctrine." The Bible Society, D'Oyly and Mant, and Coit, are doubtless correct in this passage. Tyndale's translation is good far indolent students; "Take hede vnto thy sylfe and unto learnynge."

How lasting! When the ties of this life are sundered by death, then the relation between Jesus and his disciples will be perfected, and as we may see in the eighth of Romans, be put beyond the possibility of harm.

How advantageous! The advantages and benefits of the various connections of human life are manifold, and known. But no relationship of men can confer such benefits as that between Jesus Christ and those who do his Father's will. They are not only great and precious in the present life; but they pass over into the life to come, and are there most rich and lasting, 1 Cor. ii. 2, 9.

Reader, dost thou sustain this relation to that most blessed Being? Thy hour is at hand, wherein no earthly being can aid and comfort thee! Wouldst thou have one who will do for thee the tender offices of mother, sister, brother, when the hand of brother, sister, mother, cannot reach thee? Then remember and do thy baptismal vows, and walk humbly in the ways of the church. Blessed is that man whom his Lord when he cometh shall find so doing! N. N. R.

From Bishop Potter's Address to the sixty-fourth Convention of the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

MY BRETHREN OF THE CLERGY AND LAITY,

I desire to congratulate you that we are permitted to assemble once more in Annual Convention, and under circumstances so auspicious. During the last year, the land in which we dwell has been visited most richly with the favours of a bountiful and protecting Providence. While famine and pestilence have been scourging some parts of the world, and while in others the very foundations of civil society have been convulsed, our country has been exempted from these sore trials; and we may well bless God that privileges towards which multitudes in other lands are struggling—perhaps in some instances with rash and suicidal haste,—were long since made ours, through the smiles of Heaven on the wisdom and virtue of our fathers.

Never can we be too thankful that we are able to offer a share in such a heritage as we possess, to the toiling and suffering poor of distant nations; and fervently should our prayers ascend, that we may not be found unworthy at such an eventful crisis in the world's history, of the signal blessings we enjoy; that we may be enabled to set before the nations a bright example of justice, moderation, and piety; and that the mighty revolutions now abroad on the earth, may not, in their progress, be stained by blood and violence, nor in their issue, be other than friendly to the interests of Christianity, and to the greatest happiness of the greatest number of mankind.

As members of the Church of Christ in this Diocese, we have deep reason to be grateful for most of the events of the past year. But one of the clergy of the Diocese has been during that period taken from us by death; and he (the Rev. T. C. Breintnall) was not at the time of his decease a resident of this state, nor had he been for any long period a laborer within its bounds. As a native, however, of this city, and a missionary for a short time in the interior of the state, he was generally known and beloved among us; and his departure in the meridian of his days, may well admonish us of the extreme uncertainty of life, and of the solemn obligation which rests upon us of being ever ready to answer for our stewardship.

And the same Being whose kind providence he has thus shielded the lives of the clergy, has not withheld, we trust, the gracious influences of His Spirit from the people of their charge. In some parts of the Diocese, there has been an evident increase of zeal and activity. A generous interest in the extension of the Gospel, has led to the erection of several new churches, with special reference to the wants of our more destitute population; and funds for this purpose have been supplied with a promptitude and liberality worthy of all praise. A corresponding spirit has been manifested in providing the stated administration of the means of grace within these parishes, as well as in contributing to the necessities of many, which though older, are still feeble.

Among these gratifying tokens of zeal for Christ, and of love for souls with which we have been favored during the last year, I would mention especially the sum of four hundred dollars contributed by an unknown hand—one that would be seen by Him only, who is the searcher of hearts,—with directions that it be applied to the relief of missionaries in this and other Dioceses, who are laboring under circumstances of peculiar trial and privation. The appropriation has been made in conformity with the directions given: and I desire to record my grateful sense of this instance of unostentatious liberality, not only in duty to the pious donor, but in the fond hope that an example so worthy of imitation may be followed.

The Churches consecrated are as follows:

At Kittanning, Armstrong Co., on Friday the 27th of August the new edifice erected by the congregation of St. Paul's Church, in place of one which was destroyed by a tornado two years previous;—In Moyamensing, on Thursday, January 27th, All Saints Church; In Port Richmond, on Easter Monday, (April 26th,) the Church of the Messiah; and in Tuscarora, on Sunday, April 30th, Zion Church. The consecration of these churches has been attended by circumstances of unusual interest and of the happiest promise. In the first place they have been free from debt. No tax has been left to be discharged by posterity. No sanction has been given to the criminal practice of incurring pecuniary responsibilities, without a clear prospect of being able to meet and discharge them; and no hazard has been incurred, that places one set apart for the performance of religious offices shall be wrested from their sacred purpose by the violent though righteous hand of the law. And it is due to five other parishes which have completed church edifices within the last year, to state that not having discharged as yet all their liabilities, they have not asked that these edifices should be devoted to the exclusive possession and service of the Most High.

Thanks to this manly and Christian spirit. It is shared also by several of our older parishes which have long been pressed down by the incubus of debts, and which are now employed in strenuous efforts to disengage themselves. The diocese is thus gaged in the two-fold work of erecting new churches, and of discharging the pecuniary obligations resting on old ones. The work though arduous is advancing with much spirit, and I look forward with confidence to a day not far distant when we can point to all the consecrated edifices of the Church in this Diocese—as free from the reproach of indebtedness.

Another characteristic of the churches built within the last year, and one to which I would refer with much satisfaction, is the simple and appropriate style of their architecture, and the moderate degree of expense at which they have been raised and finished.

In a country where population increases at such a fearful rate, where the capital which gives it employment is so limited, and where it is unspeakably important that the means of grace should multiply much more rapidly, I should deprecate as unfriendly to the extension and the simplicity of our faith, the growth of a taste which demanded gorgeous and magnificent structures for worship. More of graceful forms and convenient arrangements we may well desire; but they are by no means incompatible with simplicity and frugality. The church at Port Richmond for example, which has nearly 650 sittings, and was built at a cost of some $6000—deserves to be studied as a model of simple elegance; and the achievement of such a building at an expense so limited, reflects the highest credit as well on those who planned and superintended it, as on those whose generous contributions supplied the means. Long may this Diocese be known for her zeal and munificence in planting churches among the destitute, rather than for her prodigality in rearing splendid edifices, where art shall undertake to supersede the appropriate office of the pulpit and the desk,—and where piety shall be measured by the expensiveness of its solitary offerings rather than a diffusiveness of its unostentatious charities. At the same time I desire to do merited honor to the better taste in church architecture which is gaining ground among us, and which is raising some new and beautiful monuments of its fruitfulness, as well of its refinement.

A third characteristic of most of the churches which I have consecrated, and of several others now in progress, is that they are offerings to the cause of missions. The church at Tuscarora stands in the midst of the mining district in Schuylkill county, distant several miles from any other place of worship, and it has been built at the sole expense of a benevolent churchman in this county, for the benefit of the surrounding and increasing population. All Saints' Church, Moyamensing, is the fruit of an ardent desire, conceived years ago by a few of the members of our older churches, to establish a parish in that neglected District, and it has been erected almost exclusively by the contributions of the benevolent. The same is true of the Church of the Messiah at Port Richmond—of the Church of the Redemption at Fairmount, which is not yet finished, and to a considerable though less degree of the churches at Minersville and Coylestown, which though finished, are not yet consecrated. The new and noble building which has been raised by the parish at Pottsville, is likewise, under God, the result of a purpose long cherished and devotedly followed up, of opening accommodations for the foreign labourers, who are crowding into that town and its vicinity. In addition to liberal subscriptions among the members of the congregation, considerable sums have been given from abroad, and these have been devoted to the purchase of pews, which are always to remain free. It deserves to be noticed as an arrangement peculiarly worthy of imitation, that these pews instead of being located together in the remotest and least attractive part of the building, where their occupants would feel more sensibly their dependence on charity, and be in the same proportion more exposed to the invidious remarks of others, are distributed through every part of the building. This arrangement must contribute as well to the orderly and edifying administration of the services, as to the promotion of a healthy feeling of Christian brotherhood.

In concluding my notice of church building in the diocese, I ought not to omit the enlargement of the Churches at Reading and Erie, as enterprises which reflect great credit on the liberality of the respective congregations.

The interior of the church at Reading is worthy of all commendation, as a specimen of chaste and beautiful workmanship.

FIVE CORNER-STONES of churches have been laid within the year, with appropriate solemnities, viz: by myself, at Port Richmond on Monday, June 28th; at Pottsville, on Sunday afternoon, July 11th; at Salem, Wayne county, on Wednesday afternoon, July 14th; in Philadelphia, for the new parish of St. Mark's, on Easter Tuesday, April 25th; and, also, one by the Rev. Mr. Natt, at Northumberland, in October last, during a meeting of the Convocation of Northern and Central Pennsylvania. Each of these buildings, with the exception of that at Pottsville, is to be in districts where we have had, as yet, no church edifice.

In addition to these evidences of church extension, I would add, that several new fields for missionary labor have been occupied within the year. The Rev. Mr. Smith, who has been enabled for two years past from discharging clerical duty, finding his health partially restored during the last summer, established himself by my advice and consent at Greenville, Mercer county, and has been officiating for the last nine months between that place and Newcastle, in Butler county. Both these are mining villages, situated on the Erie Extension Canal, and in the midst of a thriving and beautiful country.

The Rev. Wm. Clotworthy, from the diocese of Ohio, has been acting as missionary in Clearfield county, and its vicinity, holding stated services at the village of Clearfield, at Phillipsburg, at Morrisdale, and at Curwensville. The Rev. S. T. Carter has become a missionary in the eastern part of Lancaster county, and is to derive his support from the liberality of a benevolent lady in that vicinity. The Rev. Dr. Vaughan has been temporary charge of a mission, established, some time since, in the south-western part of this city, which seems to promise much good. The Rev. E. C. Jones is officiating in Southwark, with a view to the revival of the Church of the Messiah, in that district. The Rev. Daniel S. Miller has held services during the winter in a hall in Spring Garden, and has organized a parish, which is now engaged in the erection of a church; and, lastly, the Churchmen's Missionary Society for Seamen, of the port of Philadelphia, an association recently formed by a band of devoted young men, are fast gathering means for the erection of a floating chapel, for the use of mariners.

I point to these facts as cheering proof that there is abroad among us a noble spirit of zeal for the advancement of the Saviour's kingdom. Would that I could point to corresponding evidences of increase in the ranks and efficiency of our laboring clergy. But on this point the facts are less encouraging.

The number of clergymen dismissed from the Diocese, during the last year, has been considerably greater than in former years; the number received has not increased in the same proportion; while the number of young men admitted as candidates for orders, remains stationary.

The present number of CANDIDATES FOR ORDERS, in this diocese, is twenty-five, of whom eight have been received within the last year.

It will thus be seen that the ranks of the laboring clergy, in this diocese, do not increase even in proportion to the increase of our churches, much less in proportion to the new calls which are made for our services; while the disproportion between the growth in the number of our clergy, and the advance of population in our commonwealth, is truly distressing. Let not our faithful and fervent prayers be wanting, brethren, nor our corresponding judicious efforts, that the list of our candidates, now much reduced, may be soon swelled by the addition of young men of talent, piety and devoted zeal. What we greatly need are laboring clergymen, who are patient, self-denying, and indomitable—men who can endure hardness, even though it take the form of apparent neglect or indifference—who, in meekness, and with all industry and prudence, will adapt themselves to the peculiar emergencies of the various posts at which they may be called to labor, and whose faith in the ultimate triumph of their mission can outlive even a long period of privation and apparent uselessness. Such men never labor in vain; and unfriendly as the soil of interior Pennsylvania may seem to the establishment or extension of our principles, there are fields in every part of it already white unto the harvest. But they who would reap these harvests must needs count the cost. For a time, some of them must consent to forego the comforts of a married life; they must be satisfied to live as the mass of those to whom they minister live; and, sowing in hope, they must never distrust the pledge, that God's word, when it goes forth in its integrity and simplicity, cannot return unto Him void, but must prosper in the thing whereunto He sends it. Its triumphs may be reserved till his eyes who proclaimed are sealed in death; but none the less glorious and memorable shall be his reward. In due time we shall reap if we faint not.

When I observe with what skill and ardor, at what hazards often to health and life, and with what deliberate and even prodigal sacrifice of present ease and enjoyment, the children of the world devote themselves to the pursuit of that which must perish in the using, I cannot but fear that they are wiser in their generation than many of us who profess to be children of light. A like zeal, a like vigilant wisdom and forecast, with the same irrepressible, self-sacrificing energy, would soon enable us to carry our faith in triumph over many obstacles, before which we are now too apt to stand appalled, or from which we turn away in dismay.

But whilst I insist upon the necessity of increased devotion on the part of the clergy, I would not forget that they who preach the gospel have a right to live of the gospel. It is a melancholy fact, that some of the most useful clergymen who have left us during the past year, have been constrained to do so by the entire inadequacy of their means of subsistence. I have much fear that we are destined to suffer still severer losses from the same causes. With these facts forced upon me as I travel over the Diocese, and having myself tried in vain for months, and even in one or two instances for more than two years, to supply some vacant parishes with ministerial services, because I have been unable to hold out to men with families, the prospect of adequate support,—I conceive that I should be wanting in my duty if I did not entreat the renewed attention of the laity to this subject. Where the standard of compensation is highest, there we must expect that talent and efficiency will be carried; and we cannot allow other dioceses to excel us in this respect without being in danger of suffering a constant drain upon our best and most cherished resources. I well know that in some of our parishes, even with every effort which liberality could make, the salary would be meagre unless increased from without; but how rarely has liberality done its utmost. In how many cases are the claims of the gospel, the interests of the soul, postponed, till all the demands of taste and even caprice are gratified, and then a fraction of the poor remains bestowed, perhaps with a grudging hand, on a stinted pastor. Can we wonder if the dews of the Divine Spirit are withheld from such hearts and such congregations? Zacheus could give half his goods to feed the poor. Under the Mosaic dispensation the divine law could wring with inexorable hand from every Jew, more than two-tenths of all his income for pious and charitable uses. God has been pleased to lay on Christians no law for giving but the law of love and a cheerful heart; but what a reproach must rest upon them, if they abuse this indulgence to the injury of the poor, or to the withholding from the ministers of the sanctuary, of their rightful portion.

"I never complained of my condition," says the Presian poet Sandi, "but once when my feet were bare, and I had no money to buy shoes; but I met a man without feet, and became contented with my lot."

Diocesan Intelligence.

Pennsylvania.—The following summary of his Episcopal acts during the year is taken from Bishop Potter's Address to the late Convention of the Diocese.

Since the last Convention I have been obliged to be absent from my duties within the Diocese for the space of three months. Nearly one month was spent in attending the deliberations of the General Convention which met in the city of New York, in October last: more than a month was employed at the request of the Standing Committee of New York, in performing Episcopal duties within their jurisdiction; and another month has been passed at Boston, in fulfilling an engagement to which I referred in my last address. The remainder of the year has been devoted to active labors in different parts of this Diocese; of which I shall give on this occasion but a summary.

Of the whole number of parishes in the Diocese, being about one hundred and twenty, I have officiated in about one hundred. I have also held services in the following places, at which there were no parishes in union with this Convention, viz., Morgan's Corners, (Delaware co.;) Waterstreet, (Huntingdon co.;) Brown's Mills and Lock's Mills, (Mifflin co.;) Tunkhannock, (Wyoming co.;) Great Bend, (Susquehanna co.;) Tioga Village, (Tioga co.;) Coudersport, (Potter co.;) Smethport, (McKean co.;) Warren, (Warren co.;) Greenville, (Mercer co.;) Columbia, (Lancaster co.;) Summit, (Carbon co.;) and Tuscarora, (Schuylkill co.;) making in all one hundred and fourteen points at which I have officiated. In some cases these visits were made without the requisite canonical notice, and confirmations, of course, were not to be expected. During this period I have preached on one hundred and sixty-five different occasions, addressed the candidates whenever confirmation was administered, catechised and addressed the children in many of the parishes, baptized thirteen infants, solemnised seven marriages, attended several funerals, and administered the communion to one sick person in private. I have administered confirmation on five different occasions in private to persons who were sick, and have held confirmations in public on seventy-two occasions, embracing in all SIX HUNDRED AND SIX PERSONS.

I have also ordained eighteen clergymen, consecrated four churches, laid the corner stones of four churches, officiated at the re-opening of two churches which have been materially enlarged and improved, admitted eight candidates for orders, received from other Dioceses twelve clergymen, and dismissed fourteen.

Massachusetts.—EPISCOPAL ACTS BY THE BISHOP OF THE DIOCESE.—April 27, confirmed 5 in St. Paul's, Newburyport.

April 28, confirmed 3 in St. James's, Amesbury.

April 30, instituted the Rev. W. R. Babcock, into the rectorship of St. Peter's, Salem, and confirmed 2 persons.

May 4, confirmed 8 in St. Thomas's, Taunton.

May 10, confirmed 3 in St. Andrew's, Hanover.

May 14, confirmed a sick parishioner of Christ Church, Plymouth.

May 17, ordained Priest, the Rev. Henry W. Adams, Deacon, rector of Christ Church, Springfield; and in the evening confirmed 7 in that Church.

May 18, instituted the Rev. H. W. Adams into the rectorship of Christ Church, Springfield.

May 19, confirmed 1 in St. John's, Ashfield.

May 21, confirmed 11 in St. John's, Northampton.

May 23, confirmed 3 in St. James's, Greenfield.

May 24, consecrated Grace Church, Cabotville; and confirmed 8 in the evening.

May 28, confirmed 3 in St. Luke's, Chelsea.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—Rev. James W. Bradin, A. M., Head Master of Burlington College, has been received into the Diocese of New Jersey on letters dimissory from the Diocese of New York.

The Rev. John H. Drummond, having, by the urgent advice of physicians, removed to the south in order to restore, if possible, the health of his family, requests that all letters and papers for him, may be directed to him at Bayou Goula Parish, Iberville, La.

The Rev. G. S. Porter, having taken charge of the parishes of West Granby and Fulton, in this Diocese, requests all letters and papers to be directed to him, West Granby, near Fulton, Oswego co., N. Y.

The Rev. Edward C. Bull has resigned the Rectorship of Christ Church, Westport, Conn., and accepted that of Christ Church, Rye, N. Y.

The Rev. Beardsley Northrup has recently removed from Jordan, Onondago co., and taken up his residence in Utica, and requests his letters and papers addressed accordingly.

The Rev. Joshua L. Harrison, minister of Christ Church, Madison, Indiana, has resigned the charge of the parish, and also the charge of the mission station, as a missionary in the employ of the Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The Rev. Wm. M. Weber, M. D., has removed from Peterboro to Friendship, Alleghany county, Western New York, and desires his papers and letters addressed accordingly.

Episcopal Female Institute.

This Institution is to be opened for the reception of pupils, as day scholars, Sept. 1, in Oak street, West of Square, three doors north of Market street. It will be under the management of a Board of Trustees (the Bishop being Chairman), and is designed to offer to parents the opportunity of a thorough education for their daughters, under the religious training and influence of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The terms will be moderate. Parents intending to place their daughters under its fostering care are referred for further information to the Bishop, or to the Rev. J. A. Vaughan, D. D., Rector of the Institute, Oak street, or to either of the following gentlemen, Trustees, viz: J. C. Booth, Joseph Cabot, Samuel V. Merrick, Caspar Morris, M. D., William Wells.

It is important that, prior to Aug. 1, notice should be given to the Rector of those pupils who expect to enter at the opening of the Institute.

From the Missionary.

The Raising of Lazarus.

There was a voice of waiting
In Bethany, that day;
And darkly on that mournful home,
The cloud of sorrow lay:
And deeply was the fount of grief
In woman's bosom stirred;
And thickly fell its bitter drops,
In each low murmured word.

For never, from that blessed source,
Of perfectness above,
Was shed on earth, a purer joy,
Than in a sister's love;
And never pours the bursting heart,
A deeper, darker flow,
Than, o'er a brother's wasted form,
A sister's sacred woe.

There was a voice of joyfulness,
In Bethany that day,
And brightly, on that happy home,
The sun of gladness lay;
And deeply, was the fount of joy
In woman's bosom stirred,
And fervent rose its grateful praise,
In each exulting word.

For purer, fuller, holier stream,
Than, in a sister's love,
Flowed never from that blessed fount,
Of perfectness above;
And deeper, warmer, gushing tears,
On earth were never shed,
Than fell, that day, upon his neck,
The rescued from the dead.

Oh, ever thus on those who love,
And humbly serve the Lord,
His blessings, and his chastisements,
In mingled stream, are poured:
His chastisements, to bring to earth,
Each thought and purpose high;
His blessings, to lift up our hearts,
To Him, above the sky;

Then who, whate'er betide, will doubt,
That all-disposing arm,
Which guides our feet to every good,
And guards from every harm?
Since sorrow, like that darkest hour,
That just precedes the day,
Is only sent, to fit our hearts,
For joy's unclouded ray.

Protestant Sisterhoods.

We now come to the oldest and most considerable of existing Deaconesses' Institutes, that of Kaiserswerth, on the Rhine, founded by the Rev. Th. Fliedner: its ninth yearly Report, that of 1846, is unfortunately the only one now before us. Like the Paris Institute, it commenced by a Refuge for females comprising, apparently, those only who, on conviction, have undergone judicial sentence, and have been admitted on leaving prison. Although the Refuge is now connected with the general foundation, yet separate accounts are kept of its receipts and expenditure, and separate Reports published. In 1846, it was in the thirteenth year of its existence, and had received during the first twelve years 130 female criminals. Its results are so far satisfactory, that out of that number fifteen had married, two had become teachers, and many more had regained at least outer respectability.

The Institute of Kaiserswerth numbers no less than 101 sisters, of whom sixty-seven are consecrated Deaconesses and thirty-four Candidate Sisters. Their labours are distributed among public institutions, the service of particular communes, the care of the sick in private houses, and the various departments of the main establishment of Kaiserswerth. The first mentioned class comprises forty-five Sisters, employed in various Hospitals, Lunatic Asylums, Poor-houses, and Orphan-houses at Berlin, Marsberg, Kirchheim, Elberfeld, Barmen, Kreuznach, Saarbrück, Worms, Wetzlar, Frankfurt-on-the-Mayn, Cologne, and Soest, at the Deaconesses' Institute of Dresden, and the Pastoral Aid Institute at Duisburg—a very analogous institution for the male sex. The second class, that of Commune-Deaconesses (Gemeinde-diakonissen), numbered in 1846, only five sisters who were employed at Cleves, Neuwied, and Unterbarmen; but more were shortly to be sent out to Cologne, to Duisburg, &c. From fifteen to twenty Sisters were engaged out of doors as private nurses; while the remainder, or about one third of the whole number, find ample employment in the Asylum, the Orphan-house, and Normal Schools, and in the other branches of the parent institution, or 'Mother-house' (Mutterhaus). A new hospital on a large scale, has been lately founded at Berlin, to be placed under (we believe) the exclusive care of Deaconesses. The lady who has been designated to take charge of this establishment, herself the bearer of a name and title well known in history, and the early friend of the present Duchess of Orleans, was last year in London and Paris; where she carefully visited the charitable foundations of both cities, spending a day with her foreign sisters at the Paris Institution.

One of the most interesting features of the labours of the German Deaconesses is the recently developed one of parochial service (Gemeindefleße). It is the exact reproduction of the functions of the early Christian Deaconesses, or Servants of the Church of whom Phoebe of Cenchrea is, by name at least, the apostolical type. The Parish, or rather Commune, Deaconess, has to visit the poor and the sick at their homes, to procure for them, as far as possible, work and clothing to work for them at her needle, instruct poor children in sewing and knitting, either singly or in classes where practicable, giving a regular account of her labours to the Clergyman, the diaconate, and the Ladies' Charitable Society, where such exists. But, even without being regularly attached to a particular parish or congregation, Deaconesses are able, from their experience in the care of the sick, and in household management, to render the most important public services in times of epidemic. Look for instance at the following picture:—

An epidemic nervous fever was raging in two communes of the circle of Duisburgh, Gartrop and Gahlen. Its first and most virulent outbreak took place at Gartrop, a small, poor secluded village of scarcely 130 souls, without a doctor, without an apothecary in the neighbourhood, while the clergyman was upon the point of leaving for another parish, and his successor had not yet been appointed. Four Deaconesses, including the Superior (vorsteherin), Pastor Fliedner's wife, and a maid, hastened to the scene of wretchedness, and found from twenty to twenty-five fever patients in the most alarming condition,—a mother and four children in one hovel, four other patients in another, and so on,—all lying on foul straw or on bedclothes that had not been washed for weeks, almost without food, utterly without help. Many had died already; the healthy had fled; the parish doctor lived four German leagues off, and could not come every day. The first care of the Sisters, who would have found no lodging but for the then vacancy of the parsonage, was to introduce cleanliness and ventilation in the narrow cabins of the peasants: they washed and cooked for the sick, they watched every night by turns at their bedside, and tended them with such success, that only four persons died after their arrival, and the rest were left convalescent after four weeks stay. The same epidemic having broken out in the neighbouring commune of Gahlen, in two families, of whom eight members lay ill at once, a single Deaconess had the happiness, in three weeks, of leaving every patient restored to health, and of having prevented the further spread of the disease. What would not Dr. Southwood Smith or Mr. Chadwick give, for a few dozen of such hard-working, zealous, intelligent ministers in the field of sanitary reform?

The Hospital at Kaiserswerth is on an extensive scale, and received in 1845-6 568 patients, being an increase of 147 on the preceding year. They were for the most part men, and of all religious persuasions, Protestants, Roman Catholics,—the last are attended by a Roman Catholic chaplain,—and Jews; nearly 200 of these were treated gratuitously. The mortality seems very small as compared with the whole number of patients,—only sixteen. The effects of care and a wholesome diet upon scrofulous children are observed, as in the Paris institution, to be most remarkable, both as to bodily health and moral improvement. The number of children patients is about 100 a year; a school is open for their instruction, and they resort to it with the greatest delight: those who are able to attend being most zealous to communicate the learning they acquire to as many of their companions as their ailments keep away. In addition to their intellectual training, the children are employed as much as possible in industrial labours. The elder boys are taught to make baskets, lace, nets, rugs, slippers, various articles of pasteboard, &c. Each boy has also, where his health allows of it, some small department of household work to attend to, such as helping to keep the children's wards and school-rooms in order. The very young children make lint, paper cuttings for pillows, &c., while the girls, again, sew and knit. Even older patients are provided as much as possible with employment, the effect of which, we need hardly add, is found most cheering. Nay, moreover, when the renewal of the year draws nigh, a great Christmas tree, with bright glittering wax tapers, lights up the refectory for the sick, who crowd around it, young and old, 'some borne aloft on others' arms, some leaning on crutches,' and sing hymns to the child 'Immanuel.'

The Christmas tree seems, indeed to be almost an article of faith with the good Deaconesses of Kaiserswerth, both within and without the 'Mother-house.' 'It was a subject of peculiar joy to us,' says Pastor Fliedner, 'to find that the prevailing endeavour of the Sisters in most of the Institutions where they are employed was to confer pleasure on the sick and other objects of their care, and greater pleasure than they had ever yet enjoyed. Thus (quite without our suggestion) they have almost everywhere, of their own impulse, procured Christmas presents to be given for their charges, even where this had not been the case formerly; they have themselves collected in the town the money, clothes, and other gifts, set up the "trees of Christ," gladdened the sick, the poor, and the wretched with the bright glittering light, such as they had never seen before, with pretty songs, with presents of food, and drink, and clothes, so that they would often weep tears of joy in their surprise, and cry, "No, never, in all our lives, did such a thing happen to us! Never yet had we such a pleasure! You are making us too happy! You are doing too much for us!"' *

Exquisitely German this perhaps and childish. Yet some may be so un-English as to ask, whether it might not turn out as well, were the Christmas of an English hospital or English workhouse occasionally to present as gay a scene?

After the Hospital comes the Normal School for female teachers, of whom upwards of fifty are sent out every year. Different in this from the other Institutions which we have as yet examined, the Institute of Kaiserswerth has scarcely so wide a home field for practical teaching, as might at first sight be expected from its general dimensions. Thus its Infant-school only numbers forty children; its Hospital-school, we presume, contains but a comparatively small proportion of the hundred juvenile patients, and its Orphan-house, to which we shall presently advert, reckons about twenty inmates. The anomaly is explained, if we do not mistake some passages in the Report, by the circumstance that the Sisters and pupils are admitted to the parochial schools of the town. Their theoretical education appears to take a wider scope than in other kindred establishments—the course of instruction lasting however, only four months for Infant-school teachers (can this be enough?), and one year for teachers in Elementary Schools. Most of the pupils also attend the children's wards in the Hospital for a few weeks, to familiarize themselves with the management of children when sick.

The demand for teachers from the Institution, as from every other Deaconesses' Institute, much exceeds its capabilities of supply, and it is intended to give a great extension to the Normal Schools by a sort of joint-stock company, or, rather, joint-stock loan (actienplan). May we venture to observe, however, that, in assuming the character of an ordinary normal school, the Institute impairs, to our mind, the completeness of the idea of a female Diaconate, by confining the functions of the latter to the care of the sick and the household management of charitable institutions? In the list of Deaconesses, we do not find one who is devoted to the work of education. It is true that the deficiency, if any such exist, will be partially supplied by the last branch of the Kaiserswerth Institute, that of the Orphan-house. This department is intended for the orphan daughters of clergymen, teachers, and others of the educated classes, and for the daughters of missionaries absent in foreign countries. Their education is to fit them for the middle ranks of life, with a thorough training to all household duties. About twenty children are here brought up, according to their dispositions, either to housekeeping, teaching, the care of the sick, or that of the poor; so that the Orphan-house may be considered as a school for the development of the various modes of female activity, and especially as a seminary for the supply and maintenance of the Deaconesses' Institute itself. We fear, however, that even this will not wholly supply the want of regular Deaconess teachers. Should Deaconess teachers only be admitted from among the pupils of the Orphan-house, too great a sameness would be imparted to its educational system; it would lose the advantage of a constant infusion of new blood, by the introduction from without of grown up members, earnest and zealous; and might become stereotyped in spirit, like many a Roman Catholic educational convent, which is recruited but from among its own pupils.

The material magnitude of the Kaiserswerth establishment is of course considerable. It has several gardens, an ice-cellar, a bake-house, a laboratory, baths on the Rhine, two large bleaching-grounds, a dairy with four cows, &c. It has to provide daily food for 300 persons. Its income in 1845-6 was 17,303 ths. (under 2524*l.*), less by upwards of 2000 ths. than its expenditure; with a debt of upwards of 6000 ths. (875*l.*)

*Within the last few months, our London newspapers have duly recorded the Christmas tree of 1847, set up at the German Hospital of Dalston—an offshoot, as will presently be shown, of the Kaiserswerth Institute—in the presence of H. R. H. the duke of Cambridge. We were glad to see Sir Robert Inglis and Mr. Bunsen taking an active part in its recent annual meeting.

Its influence has been most extensive. Not only have similar Institutions, either offsets from it, or framed upon its pattern, sprung up in divers parts of Germany—at Dresden, at Berlin, and elsewhere—but it has sent Deaconesses to German Switzerland, to St. Petersburg, to London; and in the course of next spring, its Director intends crossing the Atlantic, with several Sisters, to found a new Kaiserswerth among the German colonists of Pennsylvania. Several Sisters are already in London, in charge of the German Hospital at Dalston, which a late unfortunate broil between its physician and council has probably brought more prominently into notice than two previous years of silent usefulness. This Institution, founded in 1845, occupies the former premises of the Infant Orphan Asylum, since removed to Wanstead; it is large and airy, with a very extensive garden, and is situate in the immediate neighbourhood of the class which furnishes it with the greatest number of patients—the sugar-bakers of Bethnal Green. There may be seen, in their especial sphere of activity, the Deaconesses of Kaiserswerth; cleanly, quiet, healthy-looking Germans, going about their work in the most orderly and noiseless manner; never haggling for higher wages, since they have none to receive; trained to obedience, and yet fully conversant with their duties; in fact, at all points, the very antipodes of a Mrs. Gamp, that odious, and we fear often but too true type of the common nurse. The number of Deaconesses in the German Hospital of London was three at first, it is now five; of whom one has been appointed matron, and has the superintendence of the others.

And now comes the question—Is an Institute of Deaconesses required; is it practicable in England, on any truly effective and extensive scale? There will be indifference to overcome in some, the dislike to novelties in others. But we know, that we have the charity: we hope, that we have the religious feeling. We do not fear reason nor inquiry. But what we do fear—we confess it—is a cry; a cry against which neither reason nor charity nor religion are of the slightest service. Protestantism may be in danger! The Papists are coming! Because a certain number of single women have agreed to live in one house, put on one dress, and join their earnings and efforts into one common stock for the relief of certain acknowledged social evils, the whole Apocalypse is likely enough to be ransacked for the millionth time, to prove that the mark of the beast is upon them! Grant, that it were a new thing in Protestantism to form a female community; is that a reason for condemning it? Neither Bible societies, nor Tract societies, nor Missionary societies, can trace their pedigree to the Apostles, nor yet to the early Reformers. And what are they in themselves, but the lower manifestations of that spirit of union, of which religious communities are a higher manifestation; that growing spirit of socialism (to use a justly suspected word), which may become the most mighty worker of evil, unless we shall succeed in turning it into a mighty instrument of good. If it be lawful for half-a-dozen people to meet together year after year, and week after week, on the committee of a hospital, why should it be unlawful for the same number of persons to spend their lives together as nurses in that hospital, for the same purpose of glory to God and good will towards men? Does uniformity of dress offend you? Who does not know that wherever economy is sought after, such uniformity is a necessary means towards realizing that end? Is it not still more necessary, where the question is—how to associate 'in one and the same work, under the same direction, for the same purposes, with the same rights, persons of different classes?' 'We have to receive Sisters of all ranks,' continues M. Vermeil (6th Report, p. 18), 'from the humble farm servant in sabots, to the young lady clad in silk and velvet.' And least of all surely can such an argument be urged in a country like our own, where uniformity of costume is enforced more than in any other; where the workhouse has its livery like the prison, and the college or school like the footman's hall; where bishops are perennially cumbered with the apron, and barristers with the wig; where the cleaning of the hideous cauliflower of a marquis's coachman can be the subject of a judicial action, and charity (whose left hand should not know what her right hand doeth) takes pleasure in dressing out her scholars as merry-andrews throughout every parish in the kingdom.

Objections to apparel can only become serious, when they represent some deeper jealousy. 'We would not mind,'—some people will say, and more will think—'we would not mind the community of life, nor the costume, nor the charitable purpose, if Romanism had not given the example of such Sisterhoods. It is an imitation of Romanism.' Let M. Germond of Echallens answer. 'An imitation of Roman Catholicism? God forbid! but of a work which should have borne fair fruit in the bosom of Catholicism? why not? where would be the sin? Does not the Holy Scripture command us to "prove all things," to "hold fast that is good?" You will say, perhaps, that the church of Rome holds no more anything worth holding fast. Ah! we repel with all our strength those blind prejudices of party spirit, which estrange hearts from one another, chain down all progress; we are persuaded that there is, on the contrary, no section of Christianity which is utterly deprived of God's graces; we should feel happy to hasten by our example, as we do by our wishes, that blessed time when the various churches, divesting themselves at last of their mutual jealousies, shall come to exchange freely with one another all that each has of really good, and Christian!'

It is incorrect however, to say that an order of Deaconesses is but a copy of Romanism; it is not so even in outward form. It would be easy to show that in that particular branch which it has shot forth as yet in Germany alone, the Parish-deaconess, it exactly reproduces, as we have already stated, the Deaconess, or 'servant of the church,' Διακόνισσα, ή Διάκονος, diaconissa, diacona, of the earliest times, an institution which seems to have subsisted in the Eastern Church at least till the eleventh century. Whereas, in its more general form, of an association of females for all purposes of charity, it is not only not Roman Catholic, but historically Protestant in its origin: Since eighty years before the institution of the 'Filles,' or 'Sœurs de Charité,' by St. Vincent de Paule, a protestant prince, Henry Robert de le Marck, sovereign prince of Sedan, in 1560, had instituted in his dominions a society of 'Demoiselles de Charité,' for assisting at their own homes the poor, the aged, and infirm, and had supplied it with the needful funds for rendering it permanently efficient. The mission or these new servants of the church was one wholly of free-will; they pronounced no vows, and were chosen from among persons who were free from the marriage-tie, and from the duties which it entails. The only engagement which they took was that of devoting themselves to works of mercy. In our own country, indeed, it may be truly said that the innovation would be little more than what consists in giving greater system and effect to our present principles and imperfect practice: For an institute of Deaconesses may be represented as the crystallized precipitate of our numberless Ladies' Charitable Societies, among which all its elements float already, only shapeless and dissolved.

But let us not however, haggle about these miserable questions of outward form or historical precedence. Look to the spirit of the continental Deaconesses. No vows, no poverty, no monastic obedience, says the founder of the Paris Institute. 'We took as the ground of our efforts, not the pretence of salvation by works, but the duty of witnessing by works our love to Him, who came down from heaven to save us.' And such is the testimony of every one of his fellow-labourers. If you want further proofs, look to a melancholy one—the hatred of Romanism for the institution, wherever it has sprung up. What calumnies have not been lavished on the Deaconesses of Paris by the Romanist papers of that capital! Ask M. Germond of Echallens, whose establishment receives so many Roman Catholic patients, how many donations he has received from the Roman Catholics of Switzerland! Ask the founders of the German Hospital in London how the idea of introducing Sisters from Kaiserswerth was at first received by the German Roman Catholics of our own metropolis!

To prove their utter want of connexion with Romanism and Romanizing feelings, the friends of Protestant Deaconesses' Institutes have sometimes assumed too militant a position. For instance, we regret to see that the most complete and original of existing Institutes, and certainly not the least liberal and charitable in its spirit, has paid us the sorry compliment, when addressing the English public, of narrowing its great province to these most unworthy grounds. Its appeal is entitled—'An appeal on behalf of the Institution of the Deaconesses, established in Paris, for the purpose of supporting and extending French Protestantism against the efforts of the Papists.' Alas for and away with this spirit of reaction, however grievously it may have been provoked! Protestantism has other means of conversion,—were it only its yearly millions of Bibles,—than through its present or future Deaconesses; nor have we the slightest wish to see our Protestant Sisters, like their Roman Catholic namesakes, become an engine of religious propagandism, instead of practically setting forth the attractiveness of the faith which is 'shown by works,' and 'worketh by love.' Let them convert by example, that is enough.

God forbid that we should forsake the fundamental principles of Protestantism, the fallibility of human reason, and seek for a moment to deny to others that freedom of action which we claim for ourselves. Convinced as we are that the greatness of England is the greatness of Protestantism, we ask, in good English phrase, only for 'a fair field and no favour.' But so long as through prejudice, through indolence masked in the garb of religious conservatism, through cunning indifference joining in chorus with passion and intolerance, we allow Romanism to usurp one Christian virtue, to monopolize one useful institution, to do one good work which we leave unattempted so long is the field unfair, and the weapons unequal. Rome wields no more powerful weapon than that of her religious Sisterhoods. Can we not—we do not say wrest it from her, but—share it with her? When Lutheran Germany and Calvinist France agree in saying Yes, shall England say No,—or say nothing?

One word more. Years have elapsed since one, whose memory is surrounded at present with more of personal respect and love,—even from those who knew him not, or who read him, while living, backwards,—than perhaps any other contemporary name,—wrote as follows in the introduction to his 'Christian Life, its Cause, its Hindrances, and its Helps': 'The true church of Christ would offer to every faculty of our nature its proper exercise, and would entirely meet all our wants. No wise man doubts that the Reformation was imperfect, or that in the Romish system there were many good institutions, and practices, and feelings, which it would be most desirable to restore among ourselves. Daily church services, frequent communions, memorials of our Christian calling continually presented to our notice in crosses and wayside oratories; commemorations of holy men of all times and countries; the doctrine of the communion of saints practically taught, religious orders, especially of women, of different kinds, and under different rules, delivered only from the snare and sin of perpetual vows;—all these, most of which are of some efficacy for good even in a corrupt church, belong no less to the true church, and would there be purely beneficial.'

Such were the words of him, who put forth all his strength in warring with Romanizing tendencies, and who, in his zeal for realizing his idea of the church of Christ, would have liked nothing better than 'fighting out the Judaizers, as it were in a saw-pit!' While we have our doubts whether the greater part of the 'institutions, practices, and feelings,' the revival of which Arnold thought would be 'purely beneficial to the true church,' are applicable to our times, we are satisfied that in laying before the public a few of the continental instances of religious orders of Protestant women, delivered 'from the snare and sin of perpetual vows,' and in urging their introduction into this country, we are suggesting nothing, which can be misunderstood or misapplied*—nothing, which is not highly favourable to the cause

* We say in the text, that there is nothing in these Protestant Sisterhoods which can be misunderstood or misapplied. We think it right to mention, however, that we have heard of an establishment, called 'The Home,' in Albany Street, Regent's Park, described to us as being under the care of Drs. Pusey and Dodsworth. If its management should be found to be in contradiction with our assertion, its patrons will have much to answer for.

both of humanity and religion—nothing, which is not appropriate to our present state of society, and of which we are not in urgent, and indeed, disgraceful want.

The sheets of the foregoing article had already passed through the press, when the prospectus was placed in our hands of a 'Training Establishment for Nurses for Hospitals, Families, and the Poor.' It is to be founded on an analogous principle to the Kaiserswerth Institute. Mrs. Fry had attempted something of the sort before. But the establishment now proposed is to be in connexion with the Church of England, and is stated to have been sanctioned by the Archbishop of York and by several Bishops. It will receive three classes of inmates,—1st, probationers; 2d, those admitted as nurses after their period of probation, on condition of their remaining five years under the control of the Institution, which clothes and maintains them, and allows them a fixed stipend; after which period, they are to receive a certificate of qualification, and become free to pursue their calling either in connexion with the Institution or not. 3dly, Sisters, a class which 'is intended to comprise persons of whatever station in life, who are willing to devote themselves to the work of attending the sick and poor, or of educating others for it under an organized system, like that which will be here provided for them.'

This is very good by way of a beginning; and there is a circumstance belonging to it which must carry weight in this essentially practical country. The proposed institution originates with the medical profession. That such should be its origin, shows at once that it is no product of fantastic enthusiasm. While at the same time it is one more testimony to the great fact that man's work is found to be best done when the work is looked upon as a religious one, and undertaken with the habits, principles, and feelings which that consciousness involves. The sense or charity of limiting such a society to members of the Church of England, is a very different question. The restriction cannot have come from the medical profession.—Edin. Review.

MY BRETHREN OF THE CLERGY AND LAITY,

Connected with the support of the clergy, I would mention two or three measures which may have, if adopted, a most happy effect. The first is the erection of parsonages. In cities and large towns they are less necessary; but in the country they are all but indispensable. The difficulty of renting houses in convenient situations, the uncertainty whether they can be retained, their want of fitness to a clergyman's peculiar wants and resources, the additional expense which they entail, are evils which can hardly be appreciated, except by experience; and they prove in many cases, I am sure, the immediate reason why parishes are relinquished. If congregations would have their ministers acquire a home feeling among them, they should see to it that they have a home,—a permanent and comfortable one, at a convenient distance from the parish church, and that this home is kept in good repair. Let me add that a Rector's library ought, and I trust in time will come, to be considered as a necessary appendage to every parsonage and every parish. We need an enlightened and well furnished ministry; but we cannot hope to have it, unless the clergy have access to good libraries, and this access can never be enjoyed by many of them if these libraries are to be furnished exclusively at their own expense. For a parish to gather such a library, requires but a beginning, a little steady and persevering attention, and the contribution through a course of years, of sums which though very small when divided among the members of a congregation, would be wholly beyond the reach of most individual pastors.

Another measure would, if adopted, do much I think to lighten the burdens of the clergy. I allude to some provision by the Church for the education of their children. We have now several admirable schools, both male and female, connected with the church in this diocese; and their advantages ought to be especially accessible to the children of those clergymen whose means are straitened, who live remote from schools of a superior character, and whose children must soon enter on life, with no resources but their talents and their worth. I would mention that partial provision for the sons of the clergy, are already made at the Protestant Episcopal Academy in this city, and also through the generosity of its Principal, Mr. Bolmar, at the Diocesan School in West Chester. These provisions need to be enlarged and made permanent; but what we need now still more, is a corresponding provision for educating the daughters of the clergy. Arrangements have been made at the Retreat near Germantown, and also at the schools at Aston Ridge and West Chester, for admitting at reduced rates those whose fathers receive inadequate salaries, or who are orphans. Through the generosity of a few individuals whose pleasure is to do good as they have opportunity, I have already received means sufficient to place five or six young ladies at these schools, and I pray God to put it in the hearts of those who have the ability, to enable me to enlarge the number.

The Schools connected with the Church in this Diocese are all doing well. The Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, has had a career, thus far, of great and uninterrupted prosperity; and it is exerting an influence on the principles and character of our children which will be felt for good long after our own earthly course has terminated. It now numbers nearly one hundred pupils. The chaplaincy in the school for boys at West Chester has become vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Mr. Claxton, but will soon be filled; in the mean time the duties of that office are diligently discharged by the Rev. Mr. Clemson. The female school, known as the Retreat in School House Lane, near Germantown, has been signally favored not only by the smiles of Divine Providence, but also with the influence of the Divine Spirit. Considerably more than a third of all the resident or boarding pupils have within the last two months been confirmed, and have also become communicants under circumstances which have inspired me with the most lively hopes in respect to their future character and influence as Christian women. The order and spirit prevailing throughout the school have been excellent: the discipline is quiet, effective, and eminently domestic: the position of the buildings and grounds is alike beautiful and healthy, and the patronage bestowed upon it most encouraging. The school at Aston Ridge, under the superintendence of the Rev. Mr. Huntington, has also been much favored, and as the number of pupils received is limited, the situation attractive, and the instruction superior, this seminary has advantages peculiar to itself. The same is true of the school of Miss Evans, at West Chester, which has recently been removed to a large and commodious mansion, and which bestows upon its pupils the blessings of thorough intellectual, moral and religious culture, with the comforts of a happy home, at rates so moderate as to bring its advantages within the reach of many who cannot patronize our more expensive schools.

I have for some time been impressed with the conviction that a Female Academy in this city, sustaining to the Church the same relation, and constituted on the same principles as the Protestant Episcopal Academy for boys, would be a great blessing. The time for establishing such a seminary seems to have arrived, and having conferred with my Council of Advice on the subject, I have, with their approval and sanction, taken the preliminary steps for the purpose. Trustees have been appointed, and the Rev. Dr. Vaughan has been selected as Principal. A pleasant and convenient house has been taken on the west side of Penn Square, and the institution will be opened for the admission of pupils on the 1st of September next. It is proposed to organize and conduct the school so that its moral and religious influence shall be active and benign, and its means of intellectual culture unsurpassed. Special attention will also be paid to the health of the pupils. Having long known the Rev. Principal, and having had, in common with several members of this Convention, an opportunity of observing the powerful and salutary influence which he exerted in winning the affections and moulding the character of his pupils, (while he acted as Principal) at the Institution for the Blind in this city, I have every confidence that his labors in this new field will be appreciated and sustained.

It is proposed to make the charges of a tuition such, that the influence and instruction of this seminary can be shared by a large proportion of our people.

I desire to record, again, my grateful sense of the important aid which is rendered to the Church in this Diocese by the Society for the Advancement of Christianity in Pennsylvania, by the Bishop White Prayer Book Society, by the Female Prayer Book Society, the Episcopal Tract Society, and the Parish Library Association.

I mentioned in my last address, that convocations of the clergy had been assembled at two or three points in the diocese, at the time of my visitation; that they were likely to become a permanent element in our system of operations, and that, in my opinion, they would prove, if properly conducted, powerful instruments of improvement to the clergy, and of blessing to their people, while they might be made subservient in a high degree, to the extension of the church. I would now state that I have met with four convocations during the year: one at Bellefont, in July; one at Erie, in August; one at Uniontown, about the 1st of September; and one at Morgantown, about the middle of the same month. My convictions in regard to their value and efficiency, are strengthened. At the meeting, in July, of the convocation of Northern and Central Pennsylvania, a permanent organization was adopted, on principles which will be found in a note to this address, and the members comprising it have continued to meet quarterly, ever since, with encouraging results.

I have thus noticed the most important events which have transpired during the past year within this diocese; as well as various considerations of a general nature which bear upon its present condition and future welfare. We have a vast work on hand, and God alone can bestow upon us the ability to meet its demands, with the requisite wisdom, liberality, devotion, and zeal. We have to sustain, enlarge, and improve our older parishes, making them more fruitful of good to their respective pastors and people, and more instrumental in extending blessings to mankind. We have to render many of our newer parishes self-supporting, transforming their dependence on aid from without into the ability and disposition to give effective assistance to others.

We have to plant our church in twenty-five counties of Pennsylvania, where as yet it has neither minister nor sacred edifice. We have to meet the difficulties which result from the fact, that in most of the remaining counties of this commonwealth, our ministrations have been introduced but of late years, and are surrounded by a population that receives little augmentation from without, and that is disinclined, alike by habit and by education, from seeking or accepting our services.

We have, moreover, to fulfil a great and solemn duty, created by the rapidity with which large numbers of people, many of them from our father-land, and children of our mother church, settle in districts where mines are opening, where hitherto all has been wilderness, and where, unless aided by us, they may remain for years without the means of grace. In a large proportion of the territory embraced within this diocese, our order and institutions are scarcely more known than in the new states of the west, and the obstacles with which they are called to contend are even greater and more intractable.

Let not our charities be bounded, however, by the limits of our own territory. Throughout the length and breadth of this vast and rising republic, which is receiving each year its hundreds of thousands of immigrants, from all parts of the world; to which elder nations are looking with inconceivable solicitude; which seems to have been raised up by Providence expressly to show whether Christianity can be sustained by the free-will offerings, the spontaneous patronage of God's people; in this land there are calls for help which ought not to remain unheeded; while the new and multiplied relations which are fast binding Pagan and Mahomedan countries to those which profess the faith of Christ, summon us at this time to renewed interest and effort in behalf of those foreign missions which contemplate the ultimate triumph of our religion over every form of idolatry and error. I ought not to omit the fact that of five candidates for orders belonging to this diocese, who will be ordained within the next three months, two, if not three, have determined to devote themselves to the service of the mission on the western coast of Africa. While I have yielded with deep reluctance, to the withdrawal of these excellent young men from our more immediate field of labor, I feel grateful to God that He has thus enabled this Diocese, to make so noble an offering to this enterprise; an enterprise which may possibly need revision and alteration in its policy, but which, in its aims, is one of the most beneficent, and, in its obligations, one of the most imperative, ever undertaken by our church. I cannot but express my sincere hope, that with this important addition to the moral and ministerial force of the mission, there may be a corresponding increase in its pecuniary resources.

And now, to meet these claims upon our zeal and liberality—what means do we possess? Not much more than half—certainly not so many as two-thirds of the congregations in this Diocese, are self-supporting. Of the remainder many are feeble. But still we have enough. God delights to employ instruments which in proportion as they are insufficient on natural principles, are the most disposed to seek His aid, and thus to clothe themselves with a power which is resistless, because Divine. There is no obstacle which in His good time, will not yield before the prayers and pains of his faithful people. Let the simple and comfortable Gospel of Christ be truly preached. Let the discipline of our churches in respect to immoral and dissipated communicants be administered with judicious but inflexible integrity.* Let the high and solemn obligations which rest on those who profess to follow Christ, be clearly set forth by their Pastors—both by word and good example. Let the duty and privilege of consecrating property, time and talent to the spread of the Gospel, and the relief of human suffering be earnestly and diligently inculcated. And above all, let prayer be made of the whole Church without ceasing, that God will be pleased to pour into all our hearts that most excellent gift—the gift of charity—that at the same time He will be pleased to open the hearts of those who hear us, and of all for whose benefit we labor, that they may receive the truth as it is in Jesus, taking from them all ignorance, hardness of heart, and contempt of His word, and so bringing them home to His flock, that they may be saved with the remnant of the true Israelites, and be made one-fold under one Shepherd, Jesus Christ our Lord. If such be our course we need not fear, but God will go with us as he went with his people of old—a pillar of cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night. Trials we may have—they shall prove our helpers. Disappointments may sadden us—they shall urge us to more humility, and therefore to more prayer. But our young men shall offer themselves willingly to the help of the Lord. Our people of every age shall recommend the faith they profess by the sanctity of their lives, while they carry it abroad by the diligence and zeal of their self-denying labors. To the honor of Christ and the extension of His Church, our widows shall cheerfully give their mites, our men of substance their silver and their fine gold; all shall bestow their prayers and efforts, and God shall bless us. Let the people praise Thee, O God. Yea, let all the people praise Thee. Then shalt thou be merciful unto us, and cause thy face to shine upon us. Thy way shall be known upon the earth, God, even our own God, shall give us His blessing, and all the ends of the world shall fear Him.

ALONZO POTTER.

From the Missionary.

To Parents, who are anxious for their Sons.

I have several times, visited the Church Institutions at Burlington, N. J., and have as often, wished to bear my testimony in favor of their excellence. I have recently revisited them, and having found St. Mary's Hall, extending her holy influence, over more and more of the daughters of the Church—the Junior Class of the College, in a state of advancement, and the School, preparatory thereto, in full operation—I can no longer forbear to speak, at least, of the College. St. Mary's Hall is so well known to, and in so full confidence of, the Church, as to need no further notice of this kind.

In consequence of close and earnest devotion to the physical, intellectual and religious training of boys and young men, for more than twenty years, I suppose I may be excused for feeling a deeper interest in Burlington College, than in St. Mary's Hall. He who strives to save a boy, does a greater work than he who strives to save a girl; not because one is more valuable than the other, but because the former is in greater danger of

* HOUSE OF BISHOPS, May 27, 1817.

Resolved, That the following be entered on the Journal of this House, and be sent to the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies, to be read therein:

"The House of Bishops, solicitous for the preservation of the purity of the Church and the piety of its members, are induced to impress upon the Clergy the important duty, with a discreet but earnest zeal of warning the people of their worldly cares, of the danger of an indulgence in those worldly pleasures, which may tend to withdraw the affections from spiritual things. And especially on the subject of gaming, of amusements, involving cruelty to the brute creation, and of theatrical representation, to which some peculiar circumstances have called their attention. They do not hesitate to express their unanimous opinion that these amusements, as well from their licentious tendency, as from the strong temptations to vice which they afford, ought not to be frequented. And the Bishops cannot refrain from expressing their deep regret at the information, that in some of our large cities, so little respect is paid to the feelings of the members of the Church, that theatrical representations are fixed for the evenings of her most solemn festivals."

being lost. The boy, as he struggles up to manhood, is in constant contact with these three great enemies: the world, the flesh, the devil. From morning till night, and sometimes from night till morning, he is thrown into the hot arena of strife with these, his unequal opponents. Poor fellow! And alas! unless well disciplined, as well as taught, he is in danger of embracing them as friends, rather than opposing them as fiends. Girls are much less exposed to their danger. It is for this cause, that I have so often regretted that our Colleges are so illy calculated for moral and religious training. Nay, worse. That generally, their influence tends rather to promote the defeat than the victory of our sons over their trio of adversaries. Their ambition has been stimulated to furiousness. Their intellects have been cultivated to excess. The passions have been allowed not only to grow wild, but to experience "artificial forcing." They have been allowed "to sow their wild oats," as the only way to get rid of them; instead of sowing good seed in their hearts, and teaching them to cultivate its growth. Their troublesome sins have been punished by the lex talionis, instead of being cured by the law of love. What of religion has been attended to, has been given them in theory, and not taught them to practice.

When, then, I stood in the desk of St. Mary's Church, and saw eighty young men and boys, the members of Burlington College, and perceived how well they were taught to keep the foot when going to the House of God; when I saw their chastened and reverential manners and devout kneeling, (real kneeling), and heard their full, earnest, but subdued responses; and when I knew the excellent system of intellectual and religious training which they were for years to experience, and felt sure that this was not a mere experiment, could I be blamed for my eye glistening with the moisture of joy and gratitude? My joy and gratitude was that not only so many were hence to be saved, (because trained up in the way they should go,) but that they should go forth, after some years, as a phalanx of the Church Militant, to form a reform community, according to the pattern of the Church.

This feeling was yet more heightened, when I went to the College to perform the Evening Service. There was no by-play, no affectation of, nor real indifference. No school boy habits, nor collegiate lounging; but, as a family of goodly sons, they seemed with one heart, one voice, one knee, to engage in prayers, responses, chanting and singing. Here, I thought, the sons of the Church can come, without leaving behind them the love, the care, the sympathy, the training, of a family of God. Here, they may cultivate the intellect, without corrupting the heart. Here, they may fit for this life, without endangering their eternal life. Nay more; here they may come to be saved.

My confidence in this religious training being efficacious, is not based on what Burlington College has already done and is—although so much has been done—(as one instance of which twenty-seven of the students, at the late Confirmation, devoutly received that Apostolic rite; and a large number at every celebration of the Holy Communion receive those Holy Mysteries.) My opinion, I say is not based on these results, merely, but chiefly on the results of the same course of religious training at St. Mary's Hall. At that Institution the experiment has been fairly tried. The daughters have gone forth from this fountain of sanctifying influence, carrying with them and keeping with them the same devotion in, and devotedness to, the Christian life. I have never been at a place where so large a community—the two Institutions and the Bishop's family—were so decidedly, so consistently, and so constantly religiously disposed. One seems to breathe a cheerful, invigorating, Christian atmosphere. It seems not to be there, as in most places: the world keeping its supremacy, though occasionally submitting to stop—restive and chafing though it be, the while—for the performance of some religious duty; and then right on again. But there religion—its services, its duties, its business—are the first, the principal thing, and the world only ministers to the Church.

Like thousands of others, I am surprised at the vast effects already produced, by the founder of these institutions. When he commenced St. Mary's Hall, I looked on doubtfully, as to the result. I did not see, why he should be more successful in such an undertaking than others. I now think, that God has set His seal to the work, to shew it His. And now, I do not give the credit of this work to Bishop Doane. It is a work, greater than man could have wrought. The immense amount of physical, intellectual, and spiritual labor, which he has given to this work, could not have produced these results. The hand of an infinitely higher power, seems to rest upon, and guide this work. He seems, (and I speak from the observation, which a very intimate acquaintance, has enabled me to make,) to have had no object, no plan of his own, but to have been mainly anxious, to "make all things, according to the pattern" which Christ has left in His Church, for building up the new man. Not to have leaned to his own understanding, but in all his ways, to have acknowledged God, that He might direct his path. All the credit, therefore, which we can give the Bishop, is—and that is more than enough for any of our sinful race—that God has honoured him, as the instrument, under His will, to do this great and holy work.

And now, I know it will be very natural for persons to say—All this is very well, but we want our sons to be made scholars of, as well as Christians; and where so much attention is paid to religion, there cannot be much given to learning. Take His word for it, Who has made the mind, and given it its powers, and faculties. He hath said "seek first the Kingdom of God, and His righteousness, and all these (temporal) things shall be added;" and "The fear of the Lord, is the beginning of wisdom." But not to tax a feeble faith, too heavily. I reply to the doubt, that every scholar, who has read the programme of the studies of Burlington College, will, I doubt not, say it is a sufficiently thorough and extensive course. Every one, too, who knows Bishop Doane, must, I think, know that he lacks not in thoroughness, nor in the most indefatigable industry. Those also, who have, as I have, attended the examinations of St. Mary's Hall, and have witnessed the severe trial, by which the acquirements, even of those girls, are tested in languages, literature and science, and the ease with which they converse with their masters, in French, Spanish, Italian and German, cannot, I think, doubt that Burlington College, is furnishing Christian scholars. Be comforted therefore, ye parents, who are anxious for those sons, to whom, under God, you have given existence: you can, if you will, place them where they may be educated, both "for this life, and for that which is to come." PRESENT STATE OF THE CHURCH.—We have now given our readers the reports of the Annual Conventions of several of our Dioceses. We shall also present those portions of the Addresses of the Bishops to their Diocesan Conventions, which have a bearing upon the state of the Church within their jurisdiction or treat of matters possessing general interest.

It will be seen with pleasure and satisfaction, by the members of the Church, that the Diocesan Conventions which have assembled this year, have been marked by prevailing harmony and good feeling. The reports which have reached us are encouraging, and show that the Church is progressing steadily, and, we trust, surely. In this number we conclude the Address of the Bishop of this Diocese to the sixty-fourth Convention. Among the important practical topics forcibly set forth by the Bishop, we hope his earnest appeal to the Laity in behalf of the Clergy will lead to some action.

Much is said about the frequent changes of the Clergy. But what is the chief cause? They are driven from parish to parish by the scourge of necessity! If their parishioners had not the power to relieve them, if they exercised a liberality at all proportioned to their means, then undoubtedly it would be the duty of the Ministers of Christ to share the poverty of their people, and to suffer gladly the worst evils of want and privation.—But when they see those to whom they are appointed to break the bread of life, expending some $500 or $1000 each year to provide for the temporal wants of their families, and then giving "perhaps with a grudging hand" $5 a year, or half or quarter of this sum to supply themselves with the means of life eternal, can we wonder that the "stinted pastor," oppressed with care and dispirited by this indifference, is led to seek some more encouraging charge, and adds one more to the melancholy list of "Clerical changes!"

In this Diocese the stipends of many of the most devoted of the working Clergy are miserably small. The Advancement Society is unable to give sufficient to make up the deficiency. There is a call here then for greater liberality on the part of the people of God. And we trust this call, now distinctly proclaimed in the voice of their chief Pastor, may be heard and answered by the Laity of our Diocese.

The Bishop's recommendation about "the erection of Parsonages" is especially worthy of regard. There is great force in that declaration. "If congregations would have their ministers acquire a home feeling among them, they should see to it that they have a home."

Rev. BIRD WILSON, D. D.—With unfeigned regret we copy from the Calendar, the following announcement of Dr. Wilson's proposed resignation of the professorship which he has so long, so honorably and so usefully filled, in the General Theological Seminary. We most heartily respond to the just and excellent remarks of the Calendar. We feel that it would be indelicate, an unwarrantable liberty with one who little needs our praise, to say all that our heart and feelings would prompt us to utter. None can appreciate the value of Dr. Wilson's instructions so well as those who have enjoyed their benefit. And his example, of a life and temper regulated by the rules of the Gospel, was a lesson of more worth even than the precepts of his extensive knowledge and profound wisdom. The loss of such an instructor will be a great one to the Church. His resignation will create a vacancy which it will be difficult to fill.—Many hearts will join with us in the fervent prayer that a life of such faithful devotion to the Church may be crowned with the promised blessing—"Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is PEACE."

The important announcement which we are permitted to make through the following circular, has been already communicated to each of our Bishops. There can be but one sentiment throughout the whole Church, and that of profound regret that the General Theological Seminary is to lose the invaluable services of Dr. Wilson. All will unite in according him the praise of faithful diligence, of exact learning, and of wise moderation in the exercise of his important functions. The waves of party spirit have broken harmless at his feet, without being able to reach the serene height from which he has looked abroad upon the interests of the Church. And the affection and gratitude of the Church, will follow him to his retirement invoking blessings on the evening of his life.

The choice of a successor to Dr. Wilson, will be a matter of deep interest to the whole Church. It is an office which should secure the ripest scholarship, and the soundest discretion.—Many prayers will, we trust, arise for divine guidance in this important matter.

HARTFORD, June 2d, 1848.

RT. REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

I transmit for your information, the subjoined copy of a letter which I have received from the Rev. Dr. Wilson, signifying his intention of retiring from our General Theological Seminary; where he has so long discharged the duties of a Professor with signal faithfulness, ability and discretion.

Your affectionate friend and brother,

T. C. BROWNELL,

RIGHT REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

I have for some time contemplated the purpose of retiring from the GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, and have been making the necessary preparations for it. My advanced age, (as I shall complete my seventy-second year very soon after the commencement of the next session of this Institution,) together with the increased difficulty and responsibility of the duties of my Professorship in the present state of our Church, makes it very desirable to me to be relieved from those duties. And it is my intention to present my resignation to the Board of Trustees at their stated meeting in June, to take effect on the first day of August next. Though the statutes of the Seminary do not require any previous notice in such a case, it appears proper that it should be given, in order to prevent any delay or inconvenience in supplying a vacancy before the next Session, which might be caused by an unexpected resignation at the meeting of the Trustees.

The Presiding Bishop resides at so great a distance that a notice to him would be useless; and I have thought it more expedient to send it to you, the next Senior Bishop, and convenient to the Seminary. The same information will be given to my own Diocesan, Bishop Potter, and to the members of the Standing Committee of the Trustees.

I am, Right Revd. and Dear Sir,

Very respectfully and sincerely yours,

(Signed)

BIRD WILSON.

Right Revd. Bishop Brownell.

MARYLAND CONVENTION.—The Sixtieth Annual Session of the Convention in this Diocese, was commenced on Wednesday, May 31st, and adjourned sine die, on Friday afternoon, June 2d.

The Convention Sermon was preached by the Rev. Robert W. Goldsborough, after which the Holy Communion was administered by the Bishop, assisted by three Presbyters.

The Bishop called the Convention to order, when Dr. Hervey Colburn was unanimously re-elected Secretary. The chair appointed John Henry Alexander, Esq., Assistant Secretary.

The Bishop then announced the Standing Committees on the rights of Clergymen to seats, on the election of Lay Delegates, on Parochial Contributions, on Accounts, and on the admission of new Parishes and Congregations.

After the presentation of petitions from Parishes and Churches to be admitted into union with the Convention, the Bishop delivered his Annual Address, at the commencement of which he paid a glowing tribute to the late Rev. Walter D. Addison.—From the address I learned that there are in the Diocese at this time 120 Clergymen. It also stated that the College of St. James, St. Timothy's Hall, the Patapsco Female Institute, the Hannah More Academy, and other Diocesan institutions, were in a prosperous condition. As I heard but a portion of the address, I am not able to give you further particulars.

A resolution was offered requesting the Bishop to ordain Deacons under the provisions of the 5th Canon of the General Convention of 1847, which was referred to a committee. The committee subsequently presented reports for and against the resolution, and after an interesting discussion, the subject was postponed to the next Annual Convention.

A report from a committee appointed by the last Convention to take into consideration the best method of collecting the salaries of Clergymen, gave rise to considerable debate, and it was finally postponed to the next Convention.

A committee was appointed to petition the General Assembly to so far change the present law of the State in regard to Church property, as to prevent any being sold hereafter, without the consent of the Bishop.

Two new Parishes, and two new Churches were admitted into union, viz: Wicomico Parish, Somerset Co., St. Philip's Parish, Prince George and Anne Arundel Cos., St. Luke's Church, and St. Mark's Church, Baltimore.

Permission was also given to organize two or three other new Parishes.

The Standing Committee was elected for the coming year, and consists of the Rev. Dr. Wyatt, Rev. Thomas Atkinson, Rev. Wm. Pinkney, Rev. J. A. McKenney, Rev. John Owen, Rev. R. W. Goldsborough, and Rev. John Crosdale.

The various Committees and Boards, and Treasurers, presented their Annual Reports, all of which were disposed of as usual.

A Canon in reference to vacant Parishes and Congregations, making it obligatory upon the Vestries to notify the Bishop as soon as a vacancy occurs, in order that he may have them supplied with the services of some Clergyman, was adopted with but slight opposition. This is a very important act, and will doubtless result in much good.

The Rev. John R. Keech, Rev. Hugh T. Harrison, Rev. Henry Williams, Rev. Alexander M. Marbury, Rev. William H. Rees, Rev. Thomas J. Wyatt, and Rev. Henry Brown, were nominated by the Bishop, and approved of by the Convention, as an Ecclesiastical Court.

I have thus hastily given you a synopsis of the more important proceedings of the Convention.

Many persons will regret the defeat of the resolution requesting the Bishop to ordain Deacons under the 5th Canon of the General Convention, particularly as it is understood that the Standing Committee have adopted a stringent course in recommending Candidates for Orders, so much so that two or three have already felt constrained to apply in other Dioceses.

There is great cause for thankfulness to the Great Head of the Church, for the kind, Christian feeling exhibited during the Convention. God grant that the same fraternal spirit may be manifested in all future Conventions, whether in this, or in other Dioceses, and then the denominations who are so constantly predicting schism in the Church, will be deprived of their darling hope.

CONSISTENCY.

NORTH CAROLINA.—Not having received any account of this Convention, we copy the following from "the Church Times."

The thirty-second Annual Convention of this Diocese, assembled in Wilmington, on Wednesday, May 24. The Convention sermon was preached by Rev. C. McRae. The Bishop being absent through sickness, the Rev. Dr. Mason was appointed president. The usual business was transacted on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. Divine service was celebrated each day, morning and evening, and attended by large congregations. On Sunday evening, the Missionary sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Watson, who supplied the place of Rev. E. N. Forbes, who was absent through sickness. The collection amounted to $250. The officers of the various Diocesan Societies, &c. are the same as last year, excepting delegates to General Convention. John H. Bryan of Raleigh, was elected in the place of James W. Bryan, Esq. The utmost harmony prevailed throughout the important deliberations of the Convention. The Clergy and Laity are of one heart and one mind. The absence of the Bishop was deeply regretted. On Saturday, the following resolution was unanimously passed.

Resolved, That while the members of this Convention sympathize deeply with our beloved Diocesan in the affliction which has severed him for awhile from his duties, and us from his desired presence and services; they have also heard with great joy his gradual recovery from his late grievous illness, and trust that our gracious Lord will speedily restore him to us, and lead us by this chastisement to increased faithfulness.

The Convention adjourned on Monday morning at half past seven; to meet next year in Salisbury, on Wednesday, May 23.

CONVENTION OF THE DIOCESE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.—The forty-eighth Convention of this Diocese was held in Concord, on Wednesday, May 31. At 9 o'clock in the morning, the Convention was called to order by the Bishop. The Rev. Mr. Moore declining re-election as Secretary—the Convention chose Nathaniel B. Baker, Esq., of Concord, to that office. After the first hour had been occupied by the usual business, an adjournment was had for divine service. Morning prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Salter, of Dover, Rev. Dr. Sprague reading the lessons. The Bishop read the ante-communion service.

The Rev. Mr. Moore, who was appointed to preach the Convention sermon, not having sufficiently recovered from sickness to perform the duty, his place was filled by the Rev. Dr. Buroughs, who on a very short notice, kindly consented to supply the vacancy. The sermon (from Amos vii. 2.) was very appropriate and acceptable. In the afternoon, the Bishop read his address—which contained many important and excellent suggestions, and was, as usual, rendered highly interesting, although there are not many diocesan acts to be chronicled. The diocese has lost during the past year, by death and removals, ten of its seventeen clergy—but it cannot be said to be weakened thereby, since every parish but one is supplied, and there are no new internal or external causes of discouragement, but being united in sentiment—under a Bishop for whom but one sentiment is felt—there is every reason to believe that the diocese will advance and prosper as rapidly as is possible under the difficulties by which the church is surrounded.

CONVENTION OF INDIANA, ELECTION OF A BISHOP.—The following is an extract from a hurried letter, for which we are indebted to the Reverend Secretary of the Convention. We are sure the choice made will meet with hearty approval from all who know the Reverend gentleman, thus designated. We congratulate the Diocese of Indiana upon this result, and hope that the wisdom and harmony evinced in this important matter may be an earnest of the blessings which shall attend the important connection thus formed.

The Eleventh Annual Convention of Indiana assembled in St. John's Church, La Fayette, on Thursday, Festival of the Ascension. Bishop Kemper, 14 presbyters and 19 lay-delegates were present; religious services were held twice each day, on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, and thrice on Sunday; Holy Communion on Thursday, also on Sunday. The Rev. F. Vinton,

Rector of Emmanuel Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., was elected

Bishop. His testimonials will be signed, it is believed, by all the members of Convention, but one.

STANDING COMMITTEE.—Clergy.—Rev. Dr. McCullough, and Rev. Messrs. S. Lee Johnson and Fairchild. Laity.—

Robert Jones, Sen., John Taylor and Andrew Ingram.

DELEGATES TO GENERAL CONVENTION.—Rev. Dr. Wylie, Rev.

Dr. McCullough, and Rev. Messrs. Croes and Manney, of the Clergy—P. P. Bailey, Hon. Jas. Morrison, Henry C. Carter, and Joseph M. Moore, of the Laity.

Rev. R. B. Croes was re-elected Secretary, and Hon. George H. Dunn, Treasurer. The Convention was harmonious. Bishop Kemper baptized and confirmed a minister of the Dutch Reformed Communion, who is now a candidate for orders in the Church.

We have taken the liberty which we are sure the author will excuse, of placing the following touching lines in this connexion. Receiving them at the same time with the paper, containing a notice of the affliction which has befallen valued friends, we appropriate them as if sent, not by chance, to bring thoughts of comfort to those whom a merciful Providence has just called to him, in Christ Church, similar to that which called preached and confirmed four persons, including one sick person confirmed in private.

In the afternoon, in Zion Church, Greene, preached and confirmed twenty persons.

On the 25th, in St. Peter's Church, Bainbridge, the Bishop confirmed nine persons and delivered an address.

In the afternoon, in St. Luke's, Harpersville, the Bishop preached and confirmed one person.

On the 26th, the Bishop preached in the Old School Presbyterian House of worship, in Windsor.

In the evening of the same day, he preached and confirmed fourteen in Christ Church, Binghamton.

On Sunday morning, the 28th, the Bishop preached and confirmed two persons in St. John's, Speedsville.

In the afternoon of the same day, the Bishop preached in St. Paul's, Owego, where he confirmed fifteen persons. Crowded congregations attended the services at both of these churches.

Western New York.—BISHOP DE LANCEY'S VISITATIONS.—

On the 29th of May, the Bishop visited St. Mark's Church, Candor. The Bishop preached, and confirmed four persons, including one from St. Paul's Church, Owego.

In the afternoon, the Bishop preached in Christ Church, South Danby.

On the 30th, the Bishop preached, morning and evening, in St. John's Church, Ithaca, visited and catechised the Parochial School, confirmed ten persons, including one in private.

At Elmira, on June 1st, the Bishop, in the morning instituted the Rev. Mr. B. W. Whitcher, into the rectorship of Trinity Church, and preached on the occasion. In the afternoon, the Bishop preached, and confirmed eight persons.

The Bishop preached in Christ Church, Corning, in the afternoon of June 2d.

On Sunday, the 4th, the Bishop preached, confirmed eleven, and administered the Holy Communion, in St. John's Church, Catharine.—Gospel Messenger.

Connecticut.—BISHOP BROWNELL'S VISITATIONS.—The Bishop visited the parish of St. Peter's, Hebron, on Tuesday, the 23d ult., and confirmed five persons.

In the early part of the day, the Holy Communion had been celebrated by the Clergy of the Middlesex and Tolland Clerical Association, before whom a sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Emery of Portland.

In the evening there was a sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Jarvis, from St. Matt. xxviii. 12, 13.

On Wednesday, the 24th, at St. Paul's, Windham, the Bishop confirmed five persons.

On Thursday, the 25th, at Trinity Church, Brooklyn, two persons were confirmed.

The adjourned Convocation of the Clergy within the Archbishopric of Canterbury took place at eleven o'clock yesterday morning, May 17th, in the Chapter House, St. Paul's, the Right Rev. the Archbishop of Canterbury presiding. The members of the Lower House having been summoned into the presence of the Archbishop and attendant Bishops, the Litany and appropriate prayers were read in Latin. At the conclusion of the prayers, the Archbishop called upon Mr. Dyke, the Registrar, to read the writ summoning the Clergy of the Archbishopric to the Convocation, which having been done, Mr. Dyke exhibited a return made by the Lord Bishop of London of the Suffragan Bishops, Deans, and Clergy entitled to be present at the Convocation, and read a decree pronouncing contumacious all those who might not appear at the Convocation either by themselves or sufficient

The following graphic account of the condition of Europe is from the English Churchman of May 25th:

The States of Europe still continue disturbed, nor do we see much chance of a settlement at present. Denmark is by no means inclined to make peace with Germany; and, as the Swedes will assist the Danes with all their forces, there is the less probability of an early peace. The prime instigator of this unjust aggression upon Denmark—the Duke of Augustenburg—is not likely to gain much by his treason. He will be excluded from the succession to the throne of Denmark, and the King of Sweden will be elected in his place. Thus the old union of Calmar between Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, will be again established.

Prussia is much disturbed; and unhappy Poland can evidently do nothing for herself without foreign assistance, which cannot be given at present. Her day of deliverance has not yet come.

Spain is on the eve of great events. The present Government will soon be overthrown; and the "King," secretly supported by England and France, "will have his own again." The establishment of Don Carlos in Spain will, in all probability, lead to the restoration of Don Miguel in Portugal.

France is still unsettled, and must remain so until a regular government is formed. Lamartine has not firmness enough for the crisis. A soldier, in all probability, will soon take the lead.

From Naples and Sicily we hear nothing; and the Pope is all but a prisoner in his own capital. The Romans, instigated by the French, seem inclined to set up a Republic.

Austria is fast falling to pieces. Hungary is almost independent; and the King of Sardinia will soon form the whole of the north of Italy into a constitutional Monarchy. We shall heartily rejoice to see a barrier formed in Lombardy, against Austrian despotism on the one hand and French republicanism on the other. The King of Sardinia seems to inherit the talent of the house of Sa-did not become its Bishop although elected

voy, and, as the balance of power will not be disturbed, the new kingdom of Lombardy should be heartily welcomed by the rest of Europe. It may be the means of checking the progress of Republicanism throughout the whole of Italy.

Ireland is still in a very unsatisfactory state, and a crisis is rapidly coming on.

We hope our friend "Rusticus," whose anxious inquiries are duly reported by "Vocula," will read the following with satisfaction.* Glorious "Monuments," O rustic friend, may be reared without the base materials of earth! "Lively stones," bought "without money and without price," have been found to build a "spiritual house," and there is good promise that the material temple will not long be sought for in vain, even by the rustic visitors least acquainted with our city ways.

CONFIRMATION.—On Thursday evening, 25th of May, Rt. Rev. the Bishop of the Diocese made his annual visit to the Hall occupied as a place of worship by this mission.

The congregation was large, comprising some members of our older city parishes, and very many of the inhabitants immediately surrounding districts, whom chiefly the presence and supporters of this mission, desire to benefit. The present besides the Bishop, were Rev. B. W. Morris, Matthew's, Sunbury, Rev. J. M. Lybrand, of St. Paul's, den, between whom the evening service was divided, and Rev. J. H. Smith, the minister of the parish.

The Bishop preached. Text, Rom. vi. 4, "As Christ raised up from the dead, by the glory of the Father, even so should we walk in newness of life"—subject, the resurrection of the soul from dead works.

Christ's Resurrection was both real and manifest. As much as it was effected by the power of God—was for He left behind the habiliments of the tomb, was no part of His sacred person was suffered to see corruption. Manifest it was, for angels declared it, and the risen appeared to recognizing friends.

So should be the re-creation of the soul, real and manifest. Men should be able to discern the holiness of those who are to be alive from dead works.

The duty of publicly acknowledging the long claims of Christ's religion, was happily enforced on a ed souls, and doubtless, they who then were ready "imposition of hands" were strengthened and encouraged the views thus presented.

Of the six candidates confirmed, three were men and one a sailor, baptized in our mother Church.

These are some of this year's fruits, vouchsafed by evidence of His acceptance of this mission and its labors. Engaged into the fold of Christ, such who otherwise lead, left unnoticed and unsought, the Monumental Church. Ad be erected, a large fund has been gathered, but more required. Would that Churchmen would contribute forth promptly to aid in rearing this lasting memorial, associated worth in our first Diocesan—so that "a house of prayer" where God's name shall be recorded, and His celebrated, and where many immortal souls shall be His service on earth, and for the fruition of Heaven.

THE EPISCOPAL RECORDER of this city, which has all pro months been conducted by an anonymous "Assistant Clergymen," announces in its last number, that it will now be conducted under "the editorial management" of the Rev. Wm. Suddards and the Rev. H. H. Weld.

New Publications.

We are obliged to defer the notice of several works with which he have been favored.

We can only thank the Publisher, Mr. D. Brunner, of Baltimore, for a copy of BISHOP WHITTINGHAM's noble, and spirit-stirring sermon, entitled THE TRUE GLORYING. It is published by request of the Rector and Vestry of St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, wherein it was preached on Palm Sunday. We hope to make our readers acquainted with it, and they will own the judgment and discrimination which have secured its publication.

We also acknowledge the receipt of a FUNERAL ORATION, occasioned by the death of THOMAS COLE, delivered before the National Academy of Design, by WM. CULLEN BRYANT. It is a meet and worthy tribute of America's first Poet to the most gifted of her painters. It is published by the Messrs. Appletons.

Obituary.

Died at La Grange, Tenn., on the 13th of May, Mr. JOHN ANDERSON, aged 60 years.

The death of this good man deserves more than a passing notice—for he was a man of Christian principles, and of sterling integrity. The gentleness of his manners, the amiability of his temper, and the goodness of his heart, were seen in all his intercourse with men; whether it were in ordinary business, or in the interchange of acts of friendship. Few men in any community, are more generally beloved; none more universally or more highly esteemed for those traits of character for which a good man would desire esteem. For many years Mr. Anderson has been a consistent, faithful and zealous member of the Episcopal Church. His love for the Church was founded upon principle. He had studied her history, her laws and doctrines; and because he knew her doctrines to be true, he was ready to reach the serene height from which he has looked abroad upon the interests of the Church. And the affection and gratitude of the Church, will follow him to his retirement invoking blessings on the evening of his life.

The choice of a successor to Dr. Wilson, will be a matter of deep interest to the whole Church. It is an office which should secure the ripest scholarship, and the soundest discretion. Many prayers will, we trust, arise for divine guidance in this important matter.

HARTFORD, June 2d, 1848.

RT. REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

I transmit for your information, the subjoined copy of a letter which I have received from the Rev. Dr. Wilson, signifying his intention of retiring from our General Theological Seminary; where he has so long discharged the duties of a Professor with signal faithfulness, ability and discretion.

Your affectionate friend and brother,

T. C. BROWNELL,

Bishop of the Diocese of Connecticut.

NEW YORK, 29th May, 1848.

RIGHT REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

I have for some time contemplated the purpose of retiring from the GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, and have been making the necessary preparations for it. My advanced age, (as I shall complete my seventy-second year very soon after the commencement of the next session of this Institution,) together with the increased difficulty and responsibility of the duties of my Professorship in the present state of our Church, makes it very desirable to me to be relieved from those duties. And it is my intention to present my resignation to the Board of Trustees at their stated meeting in June, to take effect on the first day of August next. Though the statutes of the Seminary do not require any previous notice in such a case, it appears proper that it should be given, in order to prevent any delay or inconvenience in supplying a vacancy before the next Session, which might be caused by an unexpected resignation at the meeting of the Trustees.

The Presiding Bishop resides at so great a distance that a notice to him would be useless; and I have thought it more expedient to send it to you, the next Senior Bishop, and convenient to the Seminary. The same information will be given to my own Diocesan, Bishop Potter, and to the members of the Standing Committee of the Trustees.

I am, Right Rev. and Dear Sir,

Very respectfully and sincerely yours,

(Signed)

BIRD WILSON.

Right Rev. Bishop Brownell.

Paradise with the faithful departed, and a glorious resurrection unto eternal life.

The deceased most beautifully and faithfully illustrated the true and saving doctrines of the gospel, as held and taught in the Holy Catholic Church. Born on the 24th of October, 1822, in sin, and so a child of wrath; she was born anew of water and the Holy Ghost, on the 14th of November, 1822, and so became a child of grace. Thenceforward she was trained up by a pious mother, in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; and from her earliest years of discretion she exhibited evidences of the possession of that "meek and quiet spirit, which in the sight of God is of great price," for which she was very remarkable. She seemed always to act in the fear of God, and studious to be quiet, and to do faithfully her own duty in that station in life to which it had pleased God to call her. The language of kindness always flowed from her lips, and it is not known that she had an enemy among men.

She was a great admirer and a true lover of the Church, of which she was so faithful a member, and so bright an ornament; and for one so young, was well-informed in regard to its distinctive principles. When in health she was constant and devout in her attendance upon its edifying services. In sickness she was patient and submissive, worthy of all imitation. And her last end was so quiet and peaceful, that she seemed almost literally to fall asleep in the arms of her Saviour: expressing to her physician a short time previous, that "she was not alarmed at the thought of dying." "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like hers."

She has left a greatly afflicted mother and only brother, and a large circle of relatives and friends, who mourn her loss, but "not as those who have no hope."

For the Banner of the Cross.

Presbyterian Defence for the Opinion of Certain Episcopal Divines.

Presbyterian writers are very adroit in disclaiming, as they do, all authoritative teaching of the church; and yet embracing the isolated and scattered expressions of some individual writers in the church. "The learned"—"the pious"—"the judicious"—"the great and good," indeed whatever epithet a grateful heart can prompt them to bestow, is lavished on any episcopal writer, who, in an exuberance of amiableness, does not maintain, to their exclusion, the absolute necessity of Episcopal succession.

My attention has been called to this, by an article in the Southern Presbyterian, of the 19th inst. It is headed "DEFENCE OF PRESBYTERIAN POLITY." The writer opens an attack on what he calls "the dogma that a Prelatical Government is essential to the existence of a true church." He actually sets out with the boastful intention of refuting "that unwarrantable position, and in defence of" his "own church." And would one believe that this was to be done in less than three newspaper columns! As for his Scripture quotations in finding "reasons for the faith that is in him," they are so few that it will not occupy much space, nor consume much time to transcribe them. They are the following: "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord"—"Love is the fulfilling of the law"—"In every nation he that sented thth God and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him" usual. Whoever shall call upon the name of the Lord, shall be

A Can—"Repent and believe the Gospel; he that believeth is baptized shall be saved"—"To be spiritually minded is making and peace"—"The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, soon as righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost"—"For plied with Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor but slight circumcision, but a new creature."

The I, as being equally favorable to Methodism, Anabaptism, Henry Wopacy, Arrianism, Socinianism, and whatever calls itself H. Reestian. Indeed, excepting the one place that requires baptism, were no Quaker, and even the Moralist, who makes no profession of religion, is quite as well defended by them, as the Presbyterian. Nor can I see the great difference between them, even I have this one place in view, until some of them can show that tant pro have a commission that gives validity to their so-called

Many tisms. There is, however, the evident design, in appropriating these scriptures, to make it seem that Presbyterians are abundant in love, in the fear of God and works of righteousness, in repentance and faith, and spiritual-mindedness. Now, Standinle I maintain that as being defensive of any system, the places mending may not be exclusively claimed by Presbyterians, I have al affirm that if it were possible to find such a condition at all, would not benefit any who are beyond the pale of the Ther arch. Every qualification specified is predicated on a certain the Chtion, that is supposed to exist between him who requires Convert, and those who furnish them; viz, the latter having manifested into the covenant relation to God. Of course, then, the Dioces y first thing to be determined is, what is that covenant? w, in proof that such a relation is presupposed, let us look to dicting context of one of the very verses quoted, "the kingdom of hope. d is not meat and drink," &c. It is found in the fourteenth pter of Romans. And one of the introductory verses is, let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; and let Nor him that eateth not, judge him that eateth." The reason is this C n assigned, viz: "for God hath received him," (v. 3). I Times, uld merely ask, with what fitness such a reason could be en, if this reception were only an inward condition. Who The al judge whether such condition existed? And, if it could sembla be determined, how, I would ask, could any one be required vention that consideration, to abstain from a rigid judgment of being iers? When, however, the reception is an outward one, being nified by union with the visible part of the church, it is a appointer that can easily be settled. And the parties so recognized Thurs uld not judge uncharitably of their brethren in this relation, ted eacerning little and unimportant differences.

gregal But there is one more place that the Presbyterian champion otes from Scripture, which must not be left as he disposed of preact

"In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing nor uncircumcision, but a new creature," (Gal. vi. 15). I would take particular notice of this passage; because, while it is clearly one that speaks of baptism, it has been sadly misused, insomuch as to have been advanced by some in disproof of the necessity of baptism. This is evidently the sense in which it was quoted in the communication under examination. It is dexterously turned so as to make circumcision signify ceremonial in general, and baptism in particular, while the new creature points out the regenerated man. The whole scope of the place shows, however, that circumcision in the real and Jewish sense was meant, because some would enjoin it in addition to baptism. And then the Apostle's meaning is that it is not to be required; and for the very good reason that it did not avail anything, the prime ceremony now being the new, or baptized, creature. "As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ," (Gal. iii. 27.) This is being the new creature; hence the same Apostle says, "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature," 2 Cor. v. 17. The teaching is distinct, then, that to be baptized into Christ, is to put on Christ—to put on Christ, is to be in Christ—to be in Christ, is to be the new creature; hence, to be baptized into Christ, is to be the new creature. So much for the places advanced in defence of Presbyterian Polity. And this is more than I meant at first to say on this part of the article.

Of course the writer visits the Church of England to learn its distracted state. He asserts that it is "filled up with a perfect jumble of Socinians, Pelagians, Arminians, and Calvinists." "They allow all manner of dangerous heresy to gain entrance within." Well, really, if the Church of England, with its divine organization, and its apostolical descent, is not competent to withstand the heterodox influence of puritanism in reviving ancient errors and originating modern ones, it is time for human societies to tremble to their very centre.

What I wish to notice in particular, and to call attention to, is the fact that the writer attaches so much more importance to the least countenance from an Episcopal divine, than to his defence from Scripture. Now he would not be so wide of the right way, if he would only distinguish between the voice of the church, a body coeval with christianity, and the occasional expressions of some of her members, whose days are but three-score years and ten. It was unfortunate for his cause that, just before he adduced the charitable concessions of certain writers, he had taken pains to declare that the Church of England allows "all manner of dangerous heresy to gain entrance within." If that is a fact, how comes he to value so highly certain admissions made by some of her members? Because they are agreeable to his vitiated desire. Surely we may conclude, however, that where heresy exists, errors not heretical may be found.—But when he is required to make a "defence of presbyterian polity," will it suffice to say that Archbishop Whitgift, Dr. Holland, Bishops Wilson, Morton, Croft, &c., admitted the power of presbyters to ordain? If this thing is to be settled by the prevailing majority for or against the question, then let him bring out the expressions on both sides. Otherwise, who does not see that it is the last resort of a sinking cause. Alas! for those who hang their hope on what can be picked up from a few individual writers, instead of finding their authority in the Bible, and their sanction in the concurrent testimony of the whole christian era. What, I would ask, would be thought of the church's claim, if, instead of standing forth on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, it were found to rest only on the admissions of some Presbyterian writers?

If in the communication references had been given to the works of those authors quoted, no doubt many or most of them could be shown to have expressed themselves in a sense very different from that in which they are adduced. I presume the writer will admit that he quotes from no author more moderate than Archbishop Whitgift; and I doubt not that he quotes correctly to the letter. But what will he think of being told that this archbishop opposed the appointment of Walter Travers, to be master of the Temple; and assigned as the reason of his opposition, that he was "either in no degree of the ministry at all, or else ordered beyond the seas; not according to the form in this Church of England used." (Walton's Life of Hooker, addition by Strype.) And Hooker himself, in the Dedication prefixed to his fifth book of Eccles. Polity, says to his patron Whitgift, in reference to puritanical errors, "the errors which we seek to reform in this kind of men are such as both received at your own hands their first wound, and from that time to this present, have been proceeded in with that moderation, which useth by patience to suppress boldness, and to make them conquer that suffer."

I shall not take the pains necessary to find the places quoted from any of the authors. I am not writing now to deny their having said what is attributed to them. Nor am I endeavoring to overthrow any argument advanced. All I am concerned in is to show how much importance Presbyterian writers attach to any shadow of admissions on the part of writers in the church. They pretend to pass by tradition as of no consequence, and the teaching of the church as without authority.—We have seen what amount of Scripture our writer brings to the defence of presbyterian polity, and also how he appreciates some welcome admissions. But would one believe that he would so expose his ignorance of the relative standing of the living bishops in the Church of Great Britain, as to pronounce Archbishop Whateley, "the most learned Prelate"? I suppose he does not know that the work of the Archbishop which has gained him the applause of all dissenters, has been thoroughly answered and confuted by a young presbyter of the American branch of the Church. It would not be strange to find him ignorant of this fact, when he boldly affirms that Dr. Mason's Work on Episcopacy has never been answered! He says of that work, that "it was written in reply to the sweeping assertions of Bishop Hobart and others; and it settled the controversy for that generation. No attempt I believe, has ever been made to answer it—none, I presume, ever will be made. It is unanswerable." Now, considering that Mason's work was immediately replied to by the Rev. Mr. (not at that time bishop) Hobart, and that the reply has never been out of print, unless just before Messrs. Stanford & Swords' late edition of it, does it not seem at least very arrogant in one so ignorant of the state of the controversy, to set out in a newspaper communication to refute "that unwarrantable position," "that a Prelatical Government is essential to the existence of a true church"? One would think if the article had only been a school-boy's effort, that a note of correction might well have been appended by the editor. But this is not ignorance that may be confined to school-boys. Very recently, I had to correct the same assertion, and produce Hobart's reply for the satisfaction of an inquiring mind.

If such is to be the "Defence of Presbyterian Polity," its advocates would do well to hold a council, and resolve on perpetual silence.

For the Banner of the Cross.

The undersigned, Rector of St. Mary's Parish, Fayette, Mo., gratefully acknowledges the receipt of $10, from the Church of the Ascension, N. Y., through the Rector, Rev. G. T. Bedell. Also $1, from the Church at Sing Sing, N. Y., through Messrs. Stanford & Swords, towards the erection of a Church edifice in Fayette. This building is now covered in, but $500 must yet be raised in order to complete it. Our desire is to get it ready for consecration without any debt incumbering it. Cannot some friends of the Church aid us in the enterprise?

In the afternoon, in St. Luke's, Harpersville, the Bishop preached and confirmed one person.

On the 26th, the Bishop preached in the Old School Presbyterian House of worship, in Windsor.

In the evening of the same day, he preached and confirmed fourteen in Christ Church, Binghamton.

On Sunday morning, the 28th, the Bishop preached and confirmed two persons in St. John's, Speedsville.

In the afternoon of the same day, the Bishop preached in St. Paul's, Owego, where he confirmed fifteen persons. Crowded congregations attended the services at both of these churches.—Gos. Mess.

Western New York.—BISHOP DE LANCEY'S VISITATIONS.—

On the 29th of May, the Bishop visited St. Mark's Church, Candor. The Bishop preached, and confirmed four persons, including one from St. Paul's Church, Owego.

In the afternoon, the Bishop preached in Christ Church, South Danby.

On the 30th, the Bishop preached, morning and evening, in St. John's Church, Ithaca, visited and catechised the Parochial School, confirmed ten persons, including one in private.

At Elmira, on June 1st, the Bishop, in the morning instituted the Rev. Mr. B. W. Whiteher, into the rectorship of Trinity Church, and preached on the occasion. In the afternoon, the Bishop preached, and confirmed eight persons.

The Bishop preached in Christ Church, Corning, in the afternoon of June 2d.

On Sunday, the 4th, the Bishop preached, confirmed eleven, and administered the Holy Communion, in St. John's Church, Catharine.—Gospel Messenger.

Connecticut.—BISHOP BROWNELL'S VISITATIONS.—The Bishop visited the parish of St. Peter's, Hebron, on Tuesday, the 23d ult., and confirmed five persons.

In the early part of the day, the Holy Communion had been celebrated by the Clergy of the Middlesex and Tolland Clerical Association, before whom a sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Emery of Portland.

In the evening there was a sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Jarvis, from St. Matt. xxviii. 12, 13.

On Wednesday, the 24th, at St. Paul's, Windham, the Bishop confirmed five persons.

On Thursday, the 25th, at Trinity Church, Brooklyn, two persons were confirmed.

On the 26th, in the parish of Christ Church, Pomfret, the Bishop visited the school of the Rector, Mr. Park, and in the afternoon confirmed four persons, in Parish Church.

On Sunday, the 28th, at Christ Church, Norwich, twenty-three persons were confirmed in the morning; and in the afternoon, at St. John's, Poquetonock, three persons received the same apostolic rite.

On Tuesday, the 29th, at St. John's, New London, the rite of confirmation was administered to eighteen persons.

The Rev. Mr. Coxe, of Hartford, attended the Bishop on these visitations, and was the preacher on each occasion where it is not otherwise indicated.

On Tuesday afternoon, the Bishop left New London for Stonington, accompanied by several of the Clergy, to lay the corner-stone of a Church in that place. Six persons received confirmation at Stonington.—Calendar.

Maryland.—CONFIRMATIONS.—On the Sunday after Ascension, in Sherwood Church, Baltimore County, the Bishop preached, confirmed three persons, and administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rector, the Rev. F. A. McKenney.—Church Times.

Tuesday, May 23d, seven persons were confirmed in St. Luke's Church, East Greenwich. Sermon and address by the Bishop.

On the fifth Sunday after Easter, May 28, at 7½ P. M., the holy rite of confirmation was administered to nine persons in St. John's Church, Providence. The Bishop delivered a sermon and address.

A sick person belonging to this parish was also confirmed in private.

The Rev. Sanford J. Horton, having taken a dimissory letter from this Diocese, and been received by the Bishop of Massachusetts, has changed his canonical residence accordingly.—Witness.

Ohio.—ST. PAUL'S MISSIONARY PARISH, CINCINNATI, we learn from a correspondent, is in a flourishing condition. It is situated "in the western part of the city. Rev. Jos. M. Waite, late of Conn., is minister. We have fifty communicants and a small Sunday School. We are now endeavoring to secure a lot on which to erect an edifice of a large size—say 80 by 120 feet."

Kentucky.—The new church just finished for the use of the Episcopal Parish, in Lexington, Ky., at a cost, including the organ, bell and lamps, of $20,000, is one of the most chaste, beautiful and perfect specimens of the plain Gothic, which has been erected in the Western country, and reflects great credit alike upon the liberality of the congregation, the skill in art of the architect and contractor, and the exquisite taste and indefatigable attention of the building committee. For a building in brick, it is one of the most massive and substantial built in modern times. The proportions though not large, are remarkably just—the edifice, in exterior dimension, measuring 59 feet by 94. The audience room is 50 by 70, adorned at an elevation of 30 feet, with a ceiling of intersecting arches, coinciding, lengthwise, with the width of the building, and transversely, with the window-lays, which are five in number, exclusive of a sixth in the vestibule. These windows are divided by two mullions, and are 17½ feet in height by 5 in width. The chancel window is 10 by 18, of stained and painted glass, graceful and appropriate in design, of fine finish, and of Western manufacture. There is a simple beauty in the side windows rarely equalled, the three lancets into which each is divided being filled with glass of a grave, neutral tint, with a narrow border of brilliant blue and crimson, whilst the finials are of a more elaborate pattern, corresponding with the finish of the chancel window. The chaste and sombre effect of the interior is greatly heightened by the sober neutral tint of the walls and ceilings, in blocks, as if of stone. The tower is almost perfect of its kind, rising to a height of 95 feet, and surrounded by alternate finials, the loftier 8 feet, and the less 6 feet in height. The buttresses along the sides are also surmounted by ornamental finials of cast iron. Indeed all the finials, the open work parapet upon the roof, and the cappings of the buttresses, are all of cast iron of Kentucky workmanship, and of excellent design and finish. The exterior of the building is colored with a wash of water, lime and sand, which is of great durability, and at a short distance gives it the appearance of being built of stone. Except the floor, which is of ash, almost the entire wood work of the building is of white pine, all painted in imitation of oak. The chancel, which is raised two feet above the floor of the church, is covered with an appropriate Gothic carpet, and the aisles with Venetian carpeting corresponding in colors with the pew linings and windows. The pews are lined and cushioned uniformly with a beautiful pattern of crimson moreen, which serves to enliven and relieve the general exceedingly sober and chastened effect of the whole interior.

When it is added that the Church is furnished with a bell of very grave tones, and with an uncommonly large organ, from the manufactory of Mr. Henry Erben, of New York, it will be perceived how ample are the grounds for congratulating this Parish upon the very favorable auspices under which it commences a new career, favored as it is with the labor of its popular and highly esteemed Rector, the Rev. Ed. F. Berkeley. May "Excelsior" be written upon all its towers and pinnacles, and upon the hearts of all who worship in its sacred courts.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. John Kelly has removed to Manchester, N. H., having accepted a call to become the Rector of St. Michael's Church, in that city.

The Rev. Sanford J. Horton has received and accepted a call to the Rectorship of Grace Church, New Bedford. He requests that his letters and papers may be directed to him at that place.

The Rev. S. C. Brinckle has resigned the rectorship of Kingsessing, Pennsylvania, and taken letter dimissory to the Diocese of Delaware.

The Rev. Owen E. Shannon has accepted a call to the rectorship of the Church of the Crucifixion, Bedford street, Moyamensing, and entered upon his duties last Sunday.

The Rev. G. Unonius having resigned St. Olaf's Parish, Wisconsin, and accepted the Rectorship of St. James' Church, Manitowish, in the same Diocese, requests all letters and papers for him to be directed accordingly.

Employment of Evenings.

It is a question of great importance, especially to young men, how do you spend your evenings? If you have no regular employment, no fixed pursuits to engross your attention, and operate as stimulus to the mind when unemployed, you must of necessity have leisure and unoccupied hours; intervals when time will hang heavily on your hands, and suggest the necessity of some means to relieve it of his weight. The very time which is dissipated in idleness, would if devoted to study enable many a young man to obtain eminence and distinction in some useful art.

A sexton's son became an astronomer by devoting a few hours every evening to the study of the stars, after ringing the bell for nine o'clock. Gifford was, in early life, an apprentice to a shoemaker, and spent his leisure hours in study. His destitution was such that he was compelled to work out his problems on a smooth piece of leather with a blunted awl. David Rittenhouse was a plough boy, and covered his plough beam and fences with his juvenile calculations. James Ferguson was a shepherd's boy, and learned to read and write while watching his flocks in field by night and with no other light than the moon and stars.—L. Stand.

REV. FREDERICK OGILBY, EDITOR.]

[Vol. X.—No. 25.—Whole No. 495.]

The Hon. E. A. Newton introduced the following resolutions, which were seconded by the Rev. Dr. Strong, and which, at the request of the mover, who remarked that he offered them entirely on his own responsibility, were laid on the table, to be taken up to-morrow :

Resolved, as the sense of this Convention, that it will greatly tend to the increase and prosperity of the Church in this diocese, if the whole time of the Bishop could be devoted, hereafter, to the duties of the Episcopate.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to confer with the Bishop on the subject, and, with his consent, consider what measures should be taken to relieve him from all parochial engagements, and report thereon to this Convention.

The Convention then adjourned to to-morrow morning, at 9 o'clock.

Thursday.

Morning prayer was read by the Rev. Geo. H. Clark, of Worcester.

The roll was called, and the minutes of yesterday were read and approved.

The Report of the Board of Missions was read by the Rev. T. M. Clark, Secretary.

The Secretary of the Tract Committee read their Report.

On motion of Dr. Strong, of Greenfield, it was voted that the Treasurer of the Clerical Fund, be requested to make an annual report of the state of the funds of that society to the convention. The Rev. Mr. Babcock then read the Treasurer's Report.

E. S. Rand, Jr., Esq., read the annual Report of the Standing Committee.

The Convention then proceeded to the election of the Board of Missions. The Rev. Messrs. Wells and Dennison were appointed tellers.

The Rev. Dr. Strong, Rev. Mr. Ballard, and W. R. Lee, Esq., were appointed a committee to nominate a Board for Church Extension, who subsequently nominated the Rev. Dr. A. H. Vinton, the Rev. Dr. T. Edson, the Rev. P. H. Greenleaf, G. M. Dexter, Esq., Wm. Appleton, Esq., Ebenezer Rhodes, Esq., and they were elected.

The Rev. Mr. Cutler, from the Executive Committee, reported Trinity Church as the place, and the third Wednesday in May as the time, for holding the next Convention; and the Rev. J. H. Clinch as the preacher, and the Rev. A. L. Baury, substitute. The Rev. Mr. Baury declined the appointment; and the committee subsequently reported the name of Rev. Titus Strong, D.D.

The Hon. Mr. Newton called up the resolutions which he offered yesterday, and sustained them by an able argument. He was followed by the Rev. Dr. Strong.

The Rev. Mr. Babcock, of Dedham, moved the indefinite postponement of the whole subject.

THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI.

A thousand miles in a bird's flight from the Atlantic, and sixteen hundred from the Pacific Ocean—nearly four hundred from the source of the Mississippi, and more than two thousand from its many-mouthed entrance into the Gulf of Mexico, the waters of that river are precipitated over the rocks of St. Anthony.

Itasca Lake is the fons et origo of the far-flowing Mississippi; several small streams running into it, have presented their claims to the kind consideration of geographers, to be called after this great father of waters, the child's name not to be Anthony, for there is one already of that kin in the family, but Mississippi. Some eight or ten explorers have visited this lake; situated in a country where the earth is frozen during nine months of the year, uncultivated, amid savage tribes and thick forests, or extensive plains, but few inducements are offered to the visits of strangers; even the latitude of the lake has only been determined within the last few years. A winter, rugged and rude, generally abides on its borders, or whitens the boundless meadows of this region; and the cold winds sweeping over the sea-like expanse, with the waves of drifted snow, form an atmosphere whose horizon is bounded within a few yards.

Two centuries ago Hennepin, a French priest, who had floated down from the Canadian colonies on a pious mission among the Indian tribes on the banks of the river, drew his canoe out upon the beach, nearly a mile above these falls. We can imagine the inquisitive eyes with which this adventurer walked along the shore first trodden by one of his own race, whilst his dusky companions bore the frail birchen boat on their shoulders around the falls. Nature here has undergone but little change since that day. The Indian still carries his canoe around, to avoid the perils of navigation; the same expanse of prairie extends westward, and the same prolific varieties of animal life people the lakes and streams of this wild region. He who first spoke of the cross in this land, baptized these falls by the name of one of the Fathers, and that name they still bear. Proper associations must have been stirring in the mind of the pious missionary.

The Mississippi, in the beginning of its course, flows through Treatable lands, but thinly inhabited by wandering tribes of Orphanians, who have not brought an acre of soil under cultivation. The chief features are the hills, varying from 50 to 200 feet in height, which skirt the shores of the river, and wooded or covered with a rich sod to their summits; sometimes stretching forward to the edge of the water, and again retiring for some miles, giving place to the rich prairies between the river and their sloping green sides. The current is gentle, and it is navigable through the whole of this course; and the waters of the river, until made turbid by the Missouri, have nearly the transparency of the Rhone at Geneva. The river is so often dotted and thrown into diverse channels by islands, as, in many places, to give it the appearance of a lake. These islands support occasionally heavy growths of timber; or, if recently formed, a thick and almost impervious mass of underwood.

Some two hundred miles below the falls, is the old French town of Prairie du Chien, settled more than a century ago, and now probably containing 500 souls; whoever first pitched a tent here, had a keen eye for the beautiful. On a long and even prairie extending from some miles above the town, to the mouth of the Wisconsin river, from miles below, and bounded a mile or two back by bold hills, and in front by the Mississippi, is situated the town, or rather the clusters of houses here and there, called, in the common language of the country, "The Prairie."

The view from the hills on the opposite side of the river is one of great beauty; the eye takes in the whole extent of the valley; within a stone's pitch beneath you, but some two hundred feet below, is the Mississippi, of the breadth of a mile and a half, but so intersected and blocked by islands that it is difficult to find out the main channel. Over from this, and bounded by the girdle of green hills, are the straggling hamlets of Prairie du Chien; the view is made up of woodland, islands, clear running water, green meadow-like expanses, and the rural abodes of men. The Winnebago tribe of Indians still use the western banks of the river through this region as their hunting grounds, though it is rich in all the resources of nature.*

East and south of Prairie du Chien, the lead region gives occupation, and probably wealth to a large population. What there is in a mining district to impress on everything around an air of cheerless poverty, I cannot determine; but in travelling through nearly every State of the Union, I have certainly met nowhere with apparently so wretched a population as there is in many parts of this mineral country; the cultivation of the soil, a certain means of subsistence, is abandoned for the hope of more speedy gains. The chief mart of this trade is in the town of Galena, built upon a small, sluggish stream, called, most appropriately, Fever River. In travelling through the upland prairies of this neighborhood, you will see many hillocks of earth, as far as the eye can reach, as if some huge animal had been burrowing beneath, and thrown up the dirt in that manner; but you may, by chance, meet two or three men with a bucket, a rope, a pick-axe, and a portable windlass, and the difficulty is explained. This, in the language of the country, is a prospecting party; which, being interpreted, means that they are on the look-out for ore, if it is to be found within ten or fifteen feet of the ground; having come to the end of their rope at about that depth, and found nothing, they remove elsewhere, the prospect not being good. When ore is found, they either sell out their discovery or mine the vein on a small scale for themselves. Nothing can be more primitive than the mining of lead as here accomplished: there are no large shafts, no safety lamps, no steam engines, no ventilating arrangements: a hole is dug in the ground, and the ore, often from the very surface, dug out. The refining of the metal is equally simple. An iron plate is fixed at an angle of about twenty degrees, with grooves in it, tending downwards to one point; a fire of coke is kindled on this, the ore mixed therewith, and in a few minutes the metal streams down the grooves of the plate, where it is received in an iron pot; from this it is poured into moulds, and it is then ready for the market—pure lead, save its alloy of silver, which is said to be from one to four per cent. When at Galena, a few months ago, I saw some twenty casks of lead ore on the wharf, each cask probably weighing a ton, which was about being shipped to France, in order that the silver in the ore might be extracted, and thus repay transportation of so heavy an article for 5000 miles. Of late years, I am told, the mining in this district has been conducted on much more extensive and scientific principles than those I have mentioned; but when I last visited the mines the process was as described above. The town of Galena is one of the dirtiest I have ever been in; it is situated in a valley, with abrupt hills around it, seven miles from the Mississippi, and the muddy trench along which the Fever river flows, or rather stagnates, is a foul receptacle of all the malaria of the neighborhood, and of the arsenical vapors generated in the smelting furnaces; the country is, of course, unhealthy. But how delightful to come out of this congregation of vapors, and breathe again the pure air of the high hills or prairies around. From this town to St. Louis, a continued succession of villages or towns has sprung up along the river, most of them pleasantly situated, on some high land above the reach of the freshets of the river, and on a bank that offers the indispensable advantages of a sure channel on that side, and a rocky or pebbled shore.

The Falls of St. Anthony have a perpendicular height of about seventeen feet; they are highly picturesque, from the immense masses of rock that have been torn off by the water wearing its course upward. The whirl of waters around these rocks, at the base of the falls constitutes the greatest attraction. The river is here probably the third of a mile in breadth, with a narrow strip of island dividing the falls; for the distance of a mile below the current is impetuous, and flows among large rocks; the descent given to the river by these falls, throws it into a deep channel, cut between the high hills on either side, until the point is gained seven miles below, where the St. Peter's enters.

I have recorded the advent of Father Hennepin to the Falls of St. Anthony; let me, after the manner of great historians, put on record my own. It was on the day or rather the evening of the 21st of September, 1846, between the hours of four and five, that I cast my first fly into one of the turbid eddies at the foot of the falls; I will not dissemble my emotions of joy on finding that it scarcely had touched the water ere a most lusty bass seized it as his own. One glance at the falls preparatory to threading my way down the rugged descent had been enough to daguerreotype them on my brain for all time; by jumping from rock to rock I had made my way some yards out from the shore, and unconsciously had my fish hooked, before being aware that my foot-hold, far from being sufficient to play him, was not large enough to move more than a few inches on either side. Luckily he had dipped beneath a rock not more than a yard from me, and lay quiet; I deliberated how I was to act in this emergency. Without disturbing my friend beneath the water I quietly let out some twenty yards more of line, spinning it off from the reel with my hand; I then gathered some coils of it up on the rock in my place and as speedily as I could made

* Within the last few months, the Winnebagoes have been removed north of the Falls of St. Anthony.

The Rev. Mr. Snow, of Taunton, was appointed Secretary pro tem. And the Rev. Mr. Mason was appointed Assistant Secretary pro tem.

The Committee on Qualification retired, and the Convention proceeded to the choice of a Secretary. The Rev. Mr. Mason and the Rev. Mr. Snow having been nominated, declined. On the second ballot, the Rev. J. H. Clinch, rector of St. Matthew's Church, South Boston, was elected.

The Convention then adjourned to 4 o'clock, P. M.

Wednesday afternoon.

Immediately on the opening of the Convention, the Rev. Mr. Goodwin, chairman of the Committee of Qualification, made a report, which after some debate was accepted.

The Bishop then read his annual address, which our readers will find upon our first page.

R. H. Dana, Jr., Esq., gave notice that he should, to-morrow, move an amendment to the Canon of 1847, on Elections, relative to the election of delegates to the General Convention.

The Hon. E. A. Newton introduced the following resolutions, which were seconded by the Rev. Dr. Strong, and which, at the request of the mover, who remarked that he offered them entirely on his own responsibility, were laid on the table, to be taken up to-morrow:

Resolved, as the sense of this Convention, that it will greatly tend to the increase and prosperity of the Church in this diocese, if the whole time of the Bishop could be devoted, hereafter, to the duties of the Episcopate.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to confer with the Bishop on the subject, and, with his consent, consider what measures should be taken to relieve him from all parochial engagements, and report thereon to this Convention.

The Convention then adjourned to to-morrow morning, at 9 o'clock.

Thursday.

Morning prayer was read by the Rev. Geo. H. Clark, of Worcester.

The roll was called, and the minutes of yesterday were read and approved.

The Report of the Board of Missions was read by the Rev. T. M. Clark, Secretary.

The Secretary of the Tract Committee read their Report.

On motion of Dr. Strong, of Greenfield, it was voted that the Treasurer of the Clerical Fund, be requested to make an annual report of the state of the funds of that society to the convention. The Rev. Mr. Babcock then read the Treasurer's Report.

E. S. Rand, Jr., Esq., read the annual Report of the Standing Committee.

The Convention then proceeded to the election of the Board of Missions. The Rev. Messrs. Wells and Dennison were appointed tellers.

The Rev. Dr. Strong, Rev. Mr. Ballard, and W. R. Lee, Esq., were appointed a committee to nominate a Board for Church Extension, who subsequently nominated the Rev. Dr. A. H. Vinton, the Rev. Dr. T. Edson, the Rev. P. H. Greenleaf, G. M. Dexter, Esq., Wm. Appleton, Esq., Ebenezer Rhodes, Esq., and they were elected.

The Rev. Mr. Cutler, from the Executive Committee, reported Trinity Church as the place, and the third Wednesday in May as the time, for holding the next Convention; and the Rev. J. H. Clinch as the preacher, and the Rev. A. L. Baury, substitute. The Rev. Mr. Baury declined the appointment; and the committee subsequently reported the name of Rev. Titus Strong, D.D.

The Hon. Mr. Newton called up the resolutions which he offered yesterday, and sustained them by an able argument. He was followed by the Rev. Dr. Strong.

The Rev. Mr. Babcock, of Dedham, moved the indefinite postponement of the whole subject.

The Rev. Mr. Baury, of Newton Lower Falls, addressed the Convention in opposition to the motion for indefinite postponement.

Wm. R. Lee, Esq., then offered the following substitute:

Resolved, That a committee of three clergymen and three laymen, be appointed to confer with the Bishop, with the view to ascertain his opinion in relation to a separation of the Bishop of the diocese from his parish, and report to the next Convention.

E. S. Rand, Esq., supported this substitute.

The Rev. Dr. Vinton spoke in favor of Mr. Newton's resolution, and in opposition to the substitute.

The Rev. Mr. Wells spoke in favor of the first resolution.

Discussion was continued by E. S. Rand, Esq., and the Rev. Mr. Babcock.

The Rev. Dr. Edson spoke in favor of the first resolution.

Question on the substitute of Mr. Lee, was lost.

Question on indefinite postponement was taken by orders and was lost.

The discussion was renewed by the Rev. Mr. Mason, and continued by Dr. Vinton. G. W. Brown, Esq., moved that the whole subject be referred to the second day of the next Convention, which, after discussion, was carried.

The Rev. Mr. Shaw, from the committee appointed to count the votes for Standing Committee, reported that the following persons had been elected: Rev. A. H. Vinton, D.D., Rev. John Woart, Rev. G. M. Randall, G. M. Dexter, Esq., E. S. Rand, Esq., Otis Daniels, Esq.

The Rev. Mr. Wells reported that the following persons had been elected the Board of Missions:—the Rev. Messrs. C. Mason, A. L. Baury, T. M. Clark, G. M. Randall, J. H. Clinch, T. W. Snow, Rev. Dr. Wayland, Wm. R. Lee, Esq., Otis Daniels, Esq., and Amos A. Lawrence, Esq.

Grace Church, Medford, and St. Mary's Church, Dorchester, were admitted into union with this Convention, and the delegates from these parishes appeared and took their seats.

Thursday afternoon.

The Rev. Dr. Edson read the Report of the Commissioners of Church Extension.

The Rev. Mr. Woart, from the Committee on publishing the Journal of the Convention, reported in favor of publishing one thousand copies, and that they be distributed among the parishes according to the number of communicants. Which resolution was adopted.

The Rev. Dr. Edson, from the Committee on printing the journals of the early conventions of this diocese, made a report recommending their publication, and the following persons were elected to superintend the same: Rev. Dr. Edson, Rev. M. B. Chase, and Wm. Parker, Esq.

R. H. Dana, Esq., proposed the following amendment to the Canon of election of 1847:

Resolved, That the Canon of 1847, "of elections," be amended by striking out the last clause and inserting the following:

"Any vacancy occurring in the delegation, shall be filled at the next ensuing meeting of this Convention, and appointments for the interval may be made by the Standing Committee at a meeting specially appointed for this purpose."

Rev. Mr. Greenleaf read the Reports of the Secretary and Treasurer of the Society for the relief of the Widows and Orphans of deceased Clergymen.

The resolution relative to the ordination of Deacons under the 6th Canon of 1844, introduced at the last Convention, was indefinitely postponed.

On motion of Rev. Thomas M. Clark, it was voted to request the Board of Missions for Seamen; the Society for the relief of Widows and Orphans of deceased Clergymen; the Diocesan Board of Missions, and the Commissioners for Church Extension, to make preparations for public meetings in behalf of their several associations on the evenings of the week of the meeting of the next Convention, in the following order, viz:—On Monday evening, Mission for Seamen; Tuesday evening, Society for the relief of the Widows and Orphans of deceased Clergymen; Wednesday, Diocesan Missions; Thursday, Church Extension.

The Convention proceeded to the election of a delegate to the General Convention. After balloting three times, without an election, on motion of Rev. Mr. Wells, the election was indefinitely postponed.

Rev. Messrs. Ballard, Snow and Robinson, were appointed a committee to nominate a Tract Committee.

The Rev. Dr. Eaton was unanimously elected Treasurer.

Rev. Mr. Ballard, from the Committee, reported the names of the Rev. Dr. Edson, Rev. T. M. Clark, Rev. A. L. Baury, J. S. C. Greene, Esq., and Dr. W. R. Lawrence, Tract Committee—and they were appointed.

After singing the 103d hymn, and prayer by the Bishop, the Convention adjourned.—Christian Witness.

Fifty-eighth Annual Convention of the Diocese of R. I.

This Convention commenced its annual session Tuesday, 13th inst., in Grace Church, Providence. Morning prayer was read by the Rev. B. Watson of Newport, after which, the Bishop delivered a charge, the subject of which was "the Stewardship of the Christian Ministry," founded upon 2 Cor. iv. 1, 2.—"Let a man so account of us as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. Moreover, it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful." This subject the Bishop treated in his happiest manner; and those only who have listened to his clear enunciations of Christian truths, his close reasoning, and his deep and thorough examination of God's holy word, can form a correct idea of this production from any brief analysis of it. Moreover as it will, without doubt, be published, it will not be necessary to say any thing further on the subject.

The charge being ended, the Rt. Rev. Bishop admitted to the holy order of priests, the Rev. William S. Child, of this Diocese, and the Rev. John Kelly, about to be transferred to the Diocese of New Hampshire. The candidates were presented by the Rev. Mr. Brewer, of Newport, and the Rev. Mr. Randolph, of Portsmouth. The Rev. Messrs. Brewer, Randolph, Watson, Vail, Rouse, and Carpenter, assisted in the imposition of hands. The holy communion was then administered by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Brewer and Watson.

Divine service being over, the Convention was called to order. The roll being read, it was found that nearly every clergyman of the diocese, entitled to a seat, was present. After choosing a committee, to whom was referred the examination of the certificates of the lay delegates, and another for the admission of new parishes, the Convention adjourned to half-past 3 o'clock, P. M.

Afternoon session.—Convention met pursuant to adjournment. The Committee on lay delegates presenting their report, it was found there was an informality in the representation from two or three parishes, on which some debate ensued. The subject was referred back to the committee; the committee again reported, further debate followed, which ended by the Convention voting to receive the representatives of said parishes. The Convention next proceeded to the election of a secretary, and while the members were preparing their ballots, the rules of order were read, after which there followed some little discussion in relation to an amendment of said rules. The amendment was carried. The Rev. Mr. Hathaway, and Mr. Edward Walcott, having collected the ballots, it was found that the former secretary, the Rev. Mr. Watson, of Newport, was unanimously re-elected. The Bishop then proceeded to deliver his annual address, commencing by a touching allusion to the associations connected with the day,—it being his birth-day, and the anniversary of the day of his ordination as deacon, and of his admission to the priesthood. From this address, it seems that the Bishop, during the past year, has been in "labors" no less "abundant" than in the other years in which he has presided over this diocese. The parishes he represented to be in a healthy and flourishing condition, with the exception of but one or two, which are at present deprived of the ministrations of a clergyman of the Church. The usual changes in the diocese have occurred; several clergymen having been transferred to other dioceses, and some from others to this. One only has died, the Rev. S. A. Taylor, formerly missionary to Constantinople. The corner-stone of two new churches has been laid, and one church has been consecrated. Three ordinations have taken place, one in the diaconate, and two in the priesthood.

The convention next proceeded to the election of a Finance Committee, after which the Treasurer presented his report. The Standing Committee and the Board of Missions begged leave to present their reports to-morrow. The parochial reports were then handed in. On the question arising whether Convention should meet to-morrow morning, at half-past eight or nine o'clock, a pleasant discussion followed, which resulted in one majority for nine o'clock. Several committees then being appointed, the Convention adjourned.

Wednesday morning.—Convention met pursuant to adjournment. Morning prayer was read by Rev. E. F. Watson of Lonsdale, and Rev. T. L. Randolph of Portsmouth. Convention was then called to order, the roll called, and the minutes of yesterday's sessions were read. The standing committee and the Board of Missions presented their reports. Ezra W. Howard was re-elected Treasurer. On a discussion ensuing as to the best mode of choosing the standing committee for the ensuing year, after some debate it was decided to be by ballot and by orders. Rev. Dr. Crocker, the Rev. Messrs. Hathaway, Vail and Taft, and Messrs. Thomas Burgess, Resolved Waterman, George S. Wardwell and Edward Wolcott were elected standing committee.

It was resolved, that the Secretary be requested to ask the Bishop for a copy of his charge for publication, five hundred copies to be distributed with the Journals and one hundred to be at the disposal of the Bishop. The members of the Sunday School, Education and Depository boards were next chosen.

The Committee to whom was referred at the last Convention the subject of forming a society for "the relief of widows and orphans of deceased clergymen and of superannuated and infirm clergymen," presented their report, on which an animated debate ensued, which was finally ended by a resolution to have it lay over till next Convention, each church in the diocese in the meantime being requested to take up a collection for that object.

It was voted that five hundred copies of the Journal be printed. The Finance committee presented a report in relation to the insurance on the churches belonging to the Convention, and to the assessments from the different parishes for current expenses. A resolution was then offered in relation to an amendment of the constitution, which after much debate was carried. It was resolved that the unpublished records of former Conventions of this Diocese be deposited in the hands of the Bishop for safe-keeping. Resolved that when this Convention adjourn, it adjourn to meet in Grace Church, Providence, the second Tuesday in June 1849. The minutes of the Convention were then read and approved, and after singing a part of the 99th Psalm, and several appropriate collects and the benediction by the Bishop, the Convention adjourned.—Christian Wit. A. Character and Superstitions of the Kaffirs.

The Kaffirs have no idea of a future state, and many can hardly be taught to believe that there are countries beyond their own. Some have a crude idea that Europeans, particularly the English live on the waters in ships. Even to their own chiefs, and people who have been in England, they will give no credence. A Kaffir believes only what he sees. Lately, they have become more inquisitive, and ask questions—wondering "if the Queen of England is like other human beings!"

They are so exceedingly superstitious that the more cunning of their community take advantage of a weakness common to all, but possessed in a greater degree by some than by others. The system of "eating up," as it is called, arises from the prevalence of superstition, and may be thus described. A man who, from his knowledge of herbs and practice among the sick, is considered and denominated a doctor, entertains perhaps, a spite against some individual. He hears that another is sick—if a chief, so much the better for his purpose—or perhaps he employs some nefarious means to injure the health of a man by whom he intends to be employed. The chief, then, falls sick; naturally, or by some foul means; meanwhile the "doctor" has not been idle; he has carried to some hiding-place some herbs, stones, roots, bits of skin, or something of this kind, and has buried it in a nook. Soon after comes the summons for him. He goes. The patient is suffering, and the mode of questioning the sick man is singular enough. With a grave face and solemn air, the doctor begins his inquiries,— "Does his head ache?" "No." "Has he a sore throat?" "No." "Pain in the shoulders?" "No." "In the chest?" "No." "In the arms?" "No." And so on, till the part affected is touched. Then the pain is acknowledged, and there is a long pause. No one ventures to speak, save the doctor and the patient. At last the former asks the invalid who has bewitched him? All disease is looked upon as the effect of magic from their total ignorance of a Providence. The patient replies he does not know. It is not improbable, indeed, he may be leagued with the doctor; or, if he be a chief, that he may have resolved on possessing himself of some poor dependent's cattle, and therefore bribes the doctor to assist him in his scheme. All the inhabitants of the kraal are summoned. They come. Perhaps they expect a feast, unless they are aware of the chief's illness. The doctor moves through the assembly, examines the countenances of this man and that, retires, deliberates, returns, and at last points out the unfortunate man who has already been devoted to ruin. The victim protests his innocence. It is of no avail. The wise doctor can prove where he has hidden the charm which works the mischief. He goes to the nook where he himself has concealed it. The people follow. Wonderful!—he discovers it—brings it to the chief, who orders the victim to pay so many head of cattle, the tax imposed being always so heavy as to injure the unfortunate creature beyond redemption. Frequently he is condemned to death; and frightful cruelties are to this day practised on men and women accused of witchcraft, who, with their heads smeared with honey, are bound down on an ant-hill, and at their feet a blazing fire. Unable to move, they lie for days enduring this torture, till they are released or die. In the former case even they are crippled for life. A very few weeks ago, a rain-maker, a character similar to that of the doctor but whose business is curing the weather, caused a poor creature to be put to death; and strange to say, though we had not had a drop of rain for nearly four months, and were very short of water, the torrents which fell deluged the country, and filled the tanks and rivers beyond what had been seen for a considerable time.—Five Years in Kaffirland.

ALONZO POTTER, Bishop, &c.

Philadelphia, June 19th, 1848.

Thanksgiving for Peace.

O Eternal God our Heavenly Father, in Whose hand are all power and might, we praise and magnify Thy glorious name, that Thou hast been pleased to restore to our land the blessings of peace. Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us but unto Thy name be all the praise. Give us grace, we beseech Thee, to improve this great mercy to Thy glory, the advancement of Thy gospel, the honour of our country, and as much as in us lieth, to the good of all mankind. Bestow upon us, also, such a just sense of all Thy great and manifold favours to our land, that we may show forth Thy praise by an humble, holy, and obedient walking before Thee all our days, through Jesus Christ our Lord, to Whom with Thee and the Holy Spirit, as for all Thy mercies so especially for this our deliverance from the evils of war, be all honour and glory world without end. Amen.

MR. EDITOR:—

Will you be good enough to inform me whether St. Barnabas' day falls on Saturday or Sunday. The Prayer Books (that I have access to) places it on the 11th, (Saturday, while the Banner has it, and also Sword's Almanac, on the 10th. In the reported proceedings of the Convention of Delaware Diocese—your correspondent says "the Ante-Communion service was performed by the Bishop"—this is an expression, not suited to the subject in my opinion, nor warranted in any part of the Prayer Book—said or read, would be much better. Would you think it possible, that in our little parish, a gentleman absented himself from the morning service, simply because the communion was to be administered, and he did not think it necessary, as he communed the previous Sunday! And I suppose he will absent himself on Trinity Sunday.

Please insert the above with some remarks of your own, on the great benefit to be derived from frequent communions. It may perhaps lead him to reflection and a better mind, and perhaps others also.

LAYMAN.

To the first question we reply at once that if ever the Banner is found contradicting the Prayer Book it is in the wrong. Nor are the united authorities, of the Banner and Swords' Almanac, sufficient to set aside the surer testimony of the Calendar in the Prayer Book. The Festival of St. Barnabas occurs, as the Prayer Book declares, on the 11th of June.

We also agree with the criticism upon the word "performed," as applied to the Ante-Communion service.

The last point noticed by "Layman" is, in our esteem, an important one, and deserves the serious and thoughtful attention of the members of the Church. We doubt not that the strange course adopted, in this respect, by serious and well-disposed communicants, arises more from want of due consideration, than from any wrong feeling on the subject.

There can be no doubt, from the provisions of her services, that it was the intention of the Church that the Holy Communion should always crown the celebration of her more solemn and Holy Festivals. This is manifestly the case on those days for which "Proper Prefaces" are set forth.

The fact that these peculiar days occur upon successive Lord's Days, she esteems no reason for omitting such provisions. Those, therefore, who judge differently, oppose her wiser decisions. We cannot perceive how it is possible to produce one sound and just reason, which can connect the frequent and faithful reception of the Holy Communion with mere formality. No portion of our Christian service, no institution of the Gospel, no means of grace afforded us, more truly deserves the justly applied title of Evangelical than that Holy Sacrament, which is the memorial of the great leading doctrine of the Evangelical system. It speaks to us only of Christ Jesus and Him crucified! It is "the most comfortable Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ—to be received in remembrance of His meritorious Cross and Passion." When Christians can remember this too often, then will dangerous tendencies be discovered in too frequent communions.

Some urge the objection that frequent Communions make this Holy Sacrament too common. Then why should we have a "Book of Common Prayer?" It is a strange inconsistency that they, who thus object to the frequent reception of the Holy Communion, often take the lowest views of this Divine ordinance, and least "consider the dignity of that holy mystery." If the account of this Holy Sacrament, given in the Catechism, and there can be no truer one, be correct, how can we receive it too frequently? It is "a means" whereby we receive "inward and spiritual grace," and "a pledge to assure us thereof." Can we then receive it too often?

"Why was the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper ordained?" "For the continual remembrance of the sacrifice of the death of Christ, and of the benefits we receive thereby." Ought it not then to be frequently celebrated?

"What are the benefits whereof we are partakers thereby?" "The strengthening and refreshing of our souls by the Body and Blood of Christ as our bodies are by the Bread and Wine." Can such benefits be too often enjoyed? We might say much more on this important subject, but, for the present, can only give this brief answer to our correspondent.

In conclusion, whatever may be the opinions of individuals when their "Spiritual Pastor," in God's behalf, bids them to the Lord's Supper, and beseeches them, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, that they will not refuse to come thereto, being so lovingly called and bidden by God Himself, they should be inclined to listen to his voice rather than to the suggestions of their own mere opinions.

"Ye know how grievous and unkind a thing it is, when a man hath prepared a rich feast, decked his table with all kind of provision, so that there lacketh nothing but the guests to sit down; and yet they who are called (without any cause) most unthankfully refuse to come. Which of you in such a case would not be moved? Who would not think a great injury and wrong done unto him? Wherefore, most dearly beloved in Christ, take ye good heed, lest ye, withdrawing yourselves from this Holy Supper, provoke God's indignation against you."

"Those who refused the feast in the Gospel, because they had bought a farm, or would try their yokes of oxen, or because they were married, were not so excused."

Suppose that to these excuses this had been added—"I attended a feast only a week ago, I pray thee therefore have me excused!" Yet this is the excuse upon which Christian communicants now absent themselves from the Lord's Supper! Well may we say to such in the solemn language of the Church, "Consider earnestly with yourselves how little such feigned excuses will avail before God."

For the Banner of the Cross.

MR. EDITOR:—

A question of some interest has been raised in some of our country congregations as to whether the offertory money, or money collected at the Holy Communion may be with propriety appropriated to other purposes than that indicated in the rubric. It is contended on the one side that it is the 'alms' of the people specially dedicated to God and his poor, and designed for sacred purposes; on the other hand it is contended that it may be devoted to the ordinary wants of the Church. Can you throw any light on the question?

Yours,

E.

We cheerfully answer such practical inquiries, claiming however for the opinions expressed no undue authority. In the first place we think there can be no question that money collected at the Holy Communion may not with propriety be appropriated to other purposes than that indicated in the Rubric. The Rubrics are laws, and common honesty requires that money may not be appropriated contrary to the indications of law.

But in the second place, we are to settle what are the purposes indicated in the Rubric? These, we will find, are not precisely limited, the indications of the Rubric are very general. Let the Rubric declare them. "Whilst these sentences are in reading, the Deacons, Church-wardens, or other fit persons appointed for that purpose, shall receive the Alms for the poor, AND OTHER DEVOTIONS of the people, in a decent basin to be provided by the parish for that purpose; and reverently bring it to the Priest, who shall humbly present and place it upon the Holy Table."

Thus the Rubric expressly indicates that there may be "other devotions of the people" at the offertory. Indeed we can conceive no reason why the purposes, for which offerings are made by the people of God, should be restricted to one branch of Christian charity when the whole great comprehensive subject of Love, in its widest, noblest sense, is present to our minds and hearts. The offertory in the Holy Communion had its origin doubtless in the Divine command, first given to God's ancient people, (as recorded in Deut. xvi. 16, 17,) which requires of those who appeared before the Lord, at the solemn feasts, that "they shall not appear before the Lord empty: every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the Lord thy God which He hath given thee." And this pious use our blessed Saviour clearly intimates should be perpetuated in the great Christian Feast, when His disciples were to approach the Altar. This charge is contained in His sermon on the Mount which, we should remember, unfolded the principles and enjoined the practices to be observed under the Gospel. "Therefore if Thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." On which passage Wheatley observes: "And our Saviour, (with respect, no doubt to the Holy Table, as Mr. Mede excellently proves) supposes that we should never come to the altar without a gift." But there is nothing in the word of God; nor any thing in the Rubrics of the Church, the faithful witness and keeper of God's word, to limit these offerings to the mere supply of the bodily wants of the poor. We cannot imagine on what grounds our correspondent makes any distinction between "sacred purposes" and "the ordinary wants of the Church." Surely the latter are "sacred purposes." Since the indication of the Rubric is not specific, we will find our best guides to its intention, in the sentences of scripture, to be read as suitable incitements and direction for the exercise of charity. And we will discover that these include all the purposes of charity. They are only specific as to two objects, the duty of giving a due proportion of our goods for the support of the Clergy, and of giving liberally of our substance "to feed the poor," to provide "for the sick and needy."

And surely the ministers of Christ, and in fact all the institutions of the Gospel, as they are now provided for, have a large claim upon all that, in the words of our correspondent, is specially dedicated to God and His poor. The only light we seek to throw upon this subject, is that reflected from the Revelations of the Bible, and from the manifestations of this true light in the Rubrics and offices of the church. In this light we can see no reason to limit the offerings of God's people, associated with the memorials of a Saviour's love, to any single purpose of charity. They may be justly applied to any case of need, whether it be to supply the bodily or spiritual necessities of God's people, for "the ordinary wants of the church," or for any case which concerns the glory of God, and the good of man. In conclusion, we may add that the common opinion which limits the application of the offerings in the Holy Communion to supply the bodily wants of the poor, has partly arisen from the disuse of a portion of the scriptural sentences appointed to be read. From the sixth to the tenth sentence inclusive, the duty of making offerings for the support of the Christian ministry is plainly set forth. Yet how often are these sentences, declaring the duty of Christians, omitted by those who are most concerned in their application? If Christians never hear their duty in these respects, we cannot so much wonder that they are so forgetful of it, that the clergy may well advance a claim to "the offertory money," though it be only regarded as "the alms of the people specially dedicated to God and His Poor."

"THE BANNER OF THE CROSS closes a very complimentary notice of Dr. WILLIAMS' work on the Miracles with the following remark.

"The author takes entirely a distinct track from that pursued by 'Trench,' though he has inadvertently stated in the Preface that 'Trench' is not republished in this country. Appleton's beautiful republication of this admirable work was noticed in the Banner some time ago. But this makes Dr. Williams' work none the less valuable or acceptable.

The inadvertence is entirely on the part of the Banner. It is only a few weeks since we purchased at Appleton's an English copy of 'Trench,' which we should not have done if this beautiful republication had been in existence. The notice in the Banner, must have been prospective."

If our most esteemed friend of "the Calendar," from which paper we quote the above, will not take our word, and will pay the postage, we will forward by mail the copy of the republished work now before us, of which the following is a copy of the Title page.—"Notes on the Parables of our Lord. The Advertisement of the American Publishers is dated "June 18th, 1847."

The present Editor of the Banner, as a prospective Editor, gave the notice of the work at the time of its republication, but the notice itself was not "prospective."

SUBMISSION TO GOVERNMENT.—The Christian's Duty; 1st. Peter, 2: 13. A sermon for the third Sunday after Easter. By the Rev. HORATIO POTTER, D. D., Rector of St. Peter's Church, Albany. New York, Stanford & Swords, 1848.

This is, in truth, a sermon for the times. A clear, powerful, and manly exhibition of the bearing of Christian Truth, upon a relation whereon its constraining influence has too little application. If ever the peace, safety, and happiness of a nation depended upon the prevalence of Christian principle, it is the case with our own. And this great truth is most forcibly shown in this able and eloquent discourse. It is addressed "for the most part, to those who are in humble circumstances," the great mass who must decide the destinies of every free government. We have received this discourse too late to give more than this brief notice at present. The great practical importance of its subject, and the useful manner in which it is treated, will make at least a large portion of it a most interesting and instructive selection for a future Paper.

REGISTER OF THE COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES' AND THE GRAMMAR SCHOOL, Washington County, Maryland.

This interesting Catalogue shows that the College and Grammar School are not only under an excellent system of discipline and instruction, but it also proves that they are both in a most flourishing condition.

There are in the College 35 students, and in the Grammar School 55. Over these there are 12 instructors.

C. JULIUS CÆSAR'S COMMENTARIES ON THE GALLIC WAR. With English notes, critical and explanatory, a Lexicon, Indexes, &c. By Rev. J. SPENCER, A. M. New York and Philadelphia, Messrs. Appletons.

This is a most convenient and well arranged book for a school boy. Whether the helps afforded are helps meet for a recitation-book, we leave teachers to decide. We can vividly remember the joy with which we would have rejoiced in such a guide, when groping through the intricacies of the Pons Asinorum. The work is beautifully printed, and in most convenient form.

We have also received FIRST LESSONS IN NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, &c. By RICHARD GREEN PARKER, A. M. New York, A. S. Barnes & Co., 51 John Street. And THE ARITHMETICAL TABLE-BOOK, or the Method of Teaching the Combinations of Figures by sight By Charles Davies, L. L. D., by the same Publishers. We are not able to pronounce upon the merits of these works, but they are in convenient shape for School books.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE. By the STEAMER AMERICA.—We give from the English Churchman the following extract from the address agreed upon by the Convocation, to be presented to the Queen, when an audience can be obtained.

"Looking at the state of things in our own country, while we acknowledge with thankfulness that there are not wanting in some quarters indications of a tendency to improvement, we cannot be insensible to the prevalence of a widely different spirit.

We cannot conceal from ourselves the fearful extent of depravity, the contempt of religion, the indifference to the obligations of morality, and the vicious practices, which, in greater or less degree of intensity, exists in all parts of the land, and more especially in the numerous districts where the population of late years has altogether outgrown the provisions for its spiritual needs.

But never since the restoration of the Monarchy has public attention been directed with so much perseverance and energy to the correction of these evils. The provision of many additional places of worship, and the establishment of schools for the training up of the young in the principles of an Apostolic Church, are indications of a spirit which we now hope will gain strength in its progress, till at length it has fully attained the important object in view.

While such are the exertions made for the benefit of our fellow-subjects at home, a feeling of our duty to our countrymen who are scattered through the British dominions in distant parts of the world, has awakened an earnest desire to atone for past neglect. Liberality hitherto unbounded has been manifested in the furtherance of this good cause. Our Church, under the sanction of your Majesty, has thus been enabled to send out chief pastors to the principal dependencies of the empire, with authority to preside over Churches, which may not only dispense the blessings of our Holy religion to the present generation, but may hereafter become the Metropolitan Seats of populous countries professing the pure faith of Christ. In the accomplishment of these great and beneficial objects the Clergy of our united Church, and of the province of Canterbury in particular, has not, we trust, been unmindful of the peculiar obligation imposed on them by their sacred profession. We shall always esteem it our duty to forward, by every means in our power, your Majesty's pious designs for the spiritual benefit of your people, and to assist, as far as we may, by our exertions and influence, and by our counsels if desired.

If on any occasion it should be your Majesty's pleasure, as we earnestly pray it may be, to require the advice of this synod in devising means for increasing the efficiency of its Church, it will be our humble endeavor to conduct our deliberations with moderation and prudence, with a becoming zeal for the truth of our holy religion, tempered by a constant regard for peace and charity.

In conclusion, we beseech the Almighty to preserve to your Majesty the uninterrupted enjoyment of the blessings which He has generally vouchsafed to bestow, the gratitude and love of your people, the respect of the Sovereigns of Europe, the affection of a virtuous consort, and a family trained up from their infancy in the knowledge and practice of all Christian duties."

We may here mention that the Petition to the Queen for the revival of Convocation, signed by about three hundred of the Clergy, has been placed in the hands of Lord Lyttelton for presentation.

JERUSALEM.—On the 15th of March, 1848, an entirely new event took place at Jerusalem, of which there is no example in the annals of any history. A Turkish Pacha preached to Christians in the most august of all temples, that of the Holy Sepulchre. On the preceding day, the Pacha, Mustapha Zerif, had sent to invite the three Patriarchs, the Latin, the Greek, and the Armenian, who were residing in Jerusalem, to come to him that he might consult with them; and they accordingly went. After several exhortations, tending to the union of the three discordant nations, the Pacha invited the three Patriarchs to meet the next day in the Temple of the Holy Sepulchre, where he himself also went at the hour fixed upon, accompanied by all his suite. The Patriarchs being assembled and joined by the Father Procureur, and their suite of Brothers, Monks, and Turcomans, the Pacha made an address to them in the Turkish language, inculcating peace, concord, and harmony, in order to set a good example to the people, and concluded by saying that they ought to do this for the love of Jesus Christ, before whose Sepulchre they were. Peace was made, and the Latin Patriarch said to the Pacha, "I congratulate myself, that your Excellency being at Jerusalem, to administer justice, you have made yourself the conciliator of peace between Christians—an office of the greatest honour and highest glory."

The next day, the Greek, with the Armenian Patriarch, paid a visit to the Latin Patriarch, who received them graciously; and on the following day, the Latin, with the Armenian Patriarch, paid their visit to the Greek Patriarch. The visit to the Armenian Patriarch, was still unpaid, and, unhappily, it did not take place, for the Pacha's exhortations to peace had not reached Bethlehem on the 18th; and on that day, whilst the Frank monks were, according to their custom, walking in procession in the Holy Grotto, the Greeks attacked them with arms, and one of the monks was seriously wounded in the head. The wounded man immediately set off for Jerusalem, where he was presented to the Pacha by the Father Guardian; but the Curate of Bethlehem could not go to Jerusalem, because he had been even still more wounded than the monk had been. On the 19th, upon the representations of the Latin Patriarch, and of the Sardinian Consul, whose subject the monk was, the instigator of the attack was summoned to Jerusalem by the Pacha, and imprisoned. This is the seventh time since January, 1847, that the Greeks have molested and beaten the Latins; and it is the first time that the Latins have obtained the slightest redress. On the 20th, by the virtue of the treaty of peace, the Greek who had been arrested was set at liberty, and on the 21st the visits of the Patriarchs were resumed. Thus, then, a peaceful and harmonious intercourse among the Christians has been established by the exhortations of the Pacha.—From the "Maltese Portfolio."

To the (London) Guardian we are indebted for the following items.

With the exception of Mr. Herries' amendment on the navigation-law measure, and which produced an interesting debate; the parliamentary news of the week is summed up in one important fact, the rejection of the Jews bill. The debate which preceded this step was stirring and excellent, and was concluded in one night; no ministerialist speaker at all approaching the speeches of Lord Stanley and the Bishop of Oxford.

At a meeting of the clergy of the deanery of Bristol, held in the large room at Mr. Ridler's, High street, Bristol, on Monday last, the following resolution was unanimously passed and forwarded to his lordship by the hands of the rural dean:—

"That this meeting begs leave to tender to the Lord Bishop of the Diocese, the expression of its gratitude and respect for his free and disinterested, as well as most munificent donation of 5,793*l.* 10*s.* for the purpose of aiding in the erection of parsonage houses in the poorer parishes of his lordship's diocese; and that this meeting cannot but regard this, and former acts of liberality on the part of the Lord Bishop as well calculated to promote the best interests of the Church."

We understand that similar resolutions have been passed at a meeting of rural deans, and at several decanal meetings in the diocese.

The annual meeting of the Incorporated Church Building Society, held on Wednesday in St. Martin's place, was attended by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York; the Bishops of Llandaff, Bangor, Gloucester, Norwich, and Oxford; Earls of Harrowby, Howe, and Powis, Rev. Lord Bayning, Lord Lyttelton, Sir R. H. Inglis, the Dean of Hereford, Rev. Canons Wood, Spry, Jennings, &c. The report stated that the number of applications for grants had fallen off last year, principally in consequence of the known inability of the committee to vote assistance, except on a very reduced scale. It seems that only one hundred and four grants have been made, and only 12,500*l.* voted; an average of only 120*l.* to each case.

The Bishop of Durham, who has been paying to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners during the whole of his episcopate 11,200*l.* a year, under the Act of 1836, has communicated his intention of paying a further voluntary annual sum of 2,000*l.* for the remainder of his incumbency in the bishopric, leaving the mode of applying the money to the discretion of the commissioners.—Times.

The following paragraph is from the Inverness Courier:—

"We understand that the Rev. James Mackay, Rector of St. Michael's Church, Naugatuck, in the diocese of Connecticut, North America, has just been appointed colleague and successor to the Very Rev. Dean Fyvie, in the pastoral charge of St. John's Chapel, Inverness. Mr. Mackay is also, by birth, a townsman, and has been most cordially welcomed by his new congregation. What makes his election the more interesting is, that we believe he is the first Episcopal clergyman ordained in the United States who has been appointed to a living in Scotland, although the Church in America originally received its Episcopate from Scotland. It is now in full communion with the Established Churches of England and Ireland; but the prosperous American Church, has, by a formal concordat, expressed her feelings of sympathy and attachment more towards the ancient Episcopal communion of Scotland, which, like herself, possesses not, and seeks not, State endowment."

Letters have been received from the Church at Adelaide stating the arrival of the Bishop and Archdeacon on the shores of their new diocese, which they first beheld (when on board the Derwent) on Christmas Eve, 1847; and upon which they first landed on the 4th of January, 1848.

CONNECTICUT CONVENTION.—The annual meeting of this body commenced in St. Paul's Church, New Haven, on Tuesday, the 13th inst., at 4 o'clock, P. M. The Right Rev. Bishop Brownell was present, and presided.—A large number of both Clergy and Laity appeared promptly at the opening of the session, and no difficulty was found in getting a quorum of each Order. The Rev. Wm. Payne was re-elected Secretary, and Moses White, Esq. appointed Assistant Secretary. Immediately after the organization was thus completed, the Convention adjourned till 9 o'clock, Wednesday morning, to be opened at that time, as required by the Constitution, with Divine Service, a Sermon and the Holy Communion.

A Convocation of the Clergy was held by appointment of the Bishop on Tuesday evening. The Christian Knowledge Society, which is the Society for promoting Diocesan Missions, was the only subject of consideration.

A plan for increasing its efficiency, and for extending the Church in destitute portions of the State was proposed by the Rev. Mr. Watson, of Plymouth. After some discussion, in which the Rev. Drs. Todd and Holcomb, and the Rev. Messrs. Cornwall, Clark, Beardsley, Goodwin, Morgan and others took part, a committee of one from each county was appointed to take into consideration the plan proposed and the suggestions which it elicited, and to mature a course of procedure to be reported to the Convention for its action.

At this stage of the proceedings we were under the necessity of going to press.—Calendar.

Obituary.

Departed this life, on Wednesday the 14th of June, in the eighty-fourth year of her age, MRS. ELIZABETH STOTT, formerly of Castle Dykes, near Dumfries, Scotland.

Mrs. Stott was a native of Philadelphia, where she was born on the 22d February, 1765, and was baptized when a few days old, by the Rector of Christ Church. She was the third of eight daughters of Dr. Frederick Phyle, who before the Revolution and afterwards, was Naval Officer and Collector of the Port, and died in the yellow fever of 1793. In early life she was married by the Rector of Christ Church and St. Peter's, our revered Bishop White, to EBENEZER STOTT, a native of Galloway, in Scotland, and removed to Petersburg, Virginia, where he prosecuted the business of a shipping merchant, with established credit and great success, until he retired from active business, and returned to Scotland. For fifteen or sixteen years they resided at Castle Dykes, a country seat on the Nith, near Dumfries, where Mr. Stott died in June 1828; and in two years after that event, none of Mrs. Stott's seven children having survived their father, she returned to her native city, to pass the remainder of her days among her surviving sisters and their families; and here she has lived for the last eighteen years, with almost a public reputation for the dignity and refinement of her manners, for her rare accomplishments, and for her truly Christian virtues and works, until at length her spirit has returned to God who gave it.

Those who have had the happiness of an intimate acquaintance with this excellent Lady, will never hear her name mentioned, without associating with it such attractions of conversation and manners, such cultivated taste in the arts, and in one department even such artistical skill, as have been rarely excelled by those who make the acquisition of such graces, the principal aim of their lives; and they will remember them as continuing in unexampled freshness and beauty to the very close of her life, without the least eclipse or cloud to obscure them. The portrait of a sleeping infant in crayons, an emblem of her own purity, was begun and finished for one of her friends in the last year of her life, and is as remarkable for the truth and beauty of its colouring, and for repose and appropriate expression, as almost any of her earlier works.

But the same persons, those who knew her well, will also associate with her name the higher merit of a meek and humble spirit, which accounted these graces as nothing more than the embellishments of life, and literally as of no account in comparison with living to the honor and glory of God, by obeying His will in all things. She sacrificed to them neither her time nor her thoughts. She used them sometimes as a relief from pain, or as a refreshment and relaxation of mind, and more frequently to impart pleasure to others, but always in subordination to the cardinal occupation of her life, that of promoting the well being of all who were within the universal Christian relation which she acknowledged and cherished, and especially of such as were brought more nearly to her, by "trouble, sorrow, need, sickness, or any other adversity." Her ample fortune enabled her, and her bountiful heart disposed her, to do extensive good in almost all directions,—in some, by measures which, requiring the cooperation of others for their full effect, made her charities conspicuously known,—in many, for which her individual agency was sufficient, by wise and judicious counsel, by sympathy, by ample gifts of money, which would have been known to none but the receivers, if gratitude had not revealed them. At one time her fortune was seriously threatened by general derangements of property in the country, and with a comparative indifference to her accustomed elegance of living, she planned a severe curtailment of her domestic expenditures, that she might the better provide for others; but happily the final loss fell below the apprehension, and her will bears ample testimony to the continuing influence of her noble spirit of charity, in the last civil act of her life.

Of her final scene, the bed of last sickness, let those who attended it, to render either spiritual or medical aid, tell their parishioners and friends what it was, and whether within the experience of any of them, there has ever been exhibited a more striking example of what the close of a Christian life ought to be:—resignation to the will of God—patience under suffering—preparation for the event by the continued use of means which religious training and experience had made precious to her,—the consolations of the Holy Spirit to sustain her,—a humble trust in the mercy of God, and in the merits of her Saviour, and the final triumph of faith over bodily pain and the terrors of death. It was the proper sequel of a Christian life, and a lesson to all who desire to learn "how a Christian can die."

Southern Presbyterian.—"Infant Salvation."

Several numbers of the Southern Presbyterian, have of late, been defending the Presbyterians against the accusation of holding, and one of their ministers against that of having preached the damnation of a certain portion of our race who die in infancy. Though I have in two different communications (one in the Churchman, the other in the Banner,) noticed an editorial in the Southern Presbyterian, which was mostly of this defensive character; yet I carefully avoided any expression of opinion, as to whether the Confession of Faith does, or does not teach the limited salvation of infants. I had always supposed that they who adopted that formulary, had some way of explaining that which, without some explanation, must convey a very shocking idea. Lately, however, I have learned, especially from a communication of Dr. Hamilton's in the Southern Presbyterian, of March 15th, that the article of the Confession of Faith, which presented a difficulty to my mind, was by no means without its difficulties in the judgment of learned Presbyterians. And the misfortune is, that the Doctors have shed no light on the subjects. To whom then shall we go, when the masters of Israel fail to instruct us? We try the Editor of the Southern Presbyterian. And now, for my own part, I begin to believe that beyond a doubt, whatever living men may hold and preach, the framers of the Confession of Faith did hold, and that formulary does teach, that only a part of those who die in infancy can be saved. Neither is it so very strange that such should be the dogmas of the Confession. I do not see that it goes beyond what the "learned and pious Mr. Richard Baxter" must have held. For though, as the Southern Presbyterian of the 24th inst., says, we may not find a Presbyterian who now "entertains that belief"; it is still a matter of history that that Presbyterian divine did say of the Prayer Book, that if thirty-nine objectionable points were removed, "and only that rubric,* concerning the salvation of infants dying shortly after their baptism, were continued, yet they (Presbyterians) could not conform."—(Long's Vox Cleri, an. 1690, p. 18, quoted in Cardwell's History of Conferences on the Book of Common Prayer, p. 382, note). And here it is worthy to be noted that Mr. Baxter was one who could not have been accounted an ultra-Calvinist, for in the language of a Presbyterian writer, "his design was to reconcile Calvin and Arminius."

But I have affirmed that I begin now to believe that the Confession of Faith teaches the limited salvation of infants. And as I nowhere find in that formulary the Romish dogma of purgatory, or of a limbus infantum, my conclusion is, that such of them as are not saved must according to the Confession of Faith, be damned. But how, it may be asked, can the Southern Presbyterian be said to conduct one to such a conclusion? To which I can but answer that until I took interest enough in the subject to examine the defence of the third section of the tenth chapter of the Confession, I had supposed it capable of an explanation satisfactory to every unprejudiced mind. In this, however, I see that I made too charitable an allowance. For I perceive now that my suspicions lately excited, are well grounded. The point cannot be too quietly yielded by our Presbyterian friends, that their formulary is beyond a defence. I will briefly expose the argument of the Southern Presbyterian of the 24th inst., as conducted in the leading article—"INFANT SALVATION." And here I must first introduce at length the article of the Confession in question. "Elect infants, dying in infancy, are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who worketh when, and where, and how he pleaseth. So also are all other elect persons, who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the word."—(Chap. x. Sect. iii.)

The Southern Presbyterian requires proof, that Presbyterians ever "believe that some non-elect infants die in infancy." And a little further on, it says, "on the contrary, Presbyterians regard the fact of infants dying in infancy as evidence of their being elected to everlasting life, and forever saved through Christ." Now if nothing more had been contained in that section than what referred to infants, the ingenuity employed might have served its purpose with superficial readers. But we must take the whole; and then if it is a legitimate inference that because infants die, they are to be accounted elect, it is also a legitimate inference that because idiots (i. e. persons "incapable of being outwardly called") die as idiots, they also are to be accounted elect.

Without feeling under any obligation to express an opinion on this subject, I have the right to follow out the course of argument pursued by the Southern Presbyterian. If then, I should ask whether it is prepared for the conclusion, that all who die as idiots are elect, regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, it must either reject the conclusion, or abide by it, or decline to form one. If it rejects the conclusion as referring to idiots, it must also reject it when referred to infants, and then it can no longer be said that the death of infants is evidence of their being elect; but the inevitable construction of the language must be that only elect infants are saved; from which the just inference would be drawn that non-elect infants are damned. But may we suppose it to abide by the conclusion that the death of idiots is evidence of their election? If we could, we would cheerfully admit the consistency. But we cannot suppose this; because the only distinct expression on this head, is the following: "declining a conclusion, 'whether there are any non-elect among idiots and the other incapable persons referred to in the close of that section, we do not know, and therefore we do not speak.' Why let me ask do you not know? Why do you not speak? The language is quite as clear as that used in reference to infants. 'Elect infants, dying in infancy are regenerated and saved by Christ, through the Spirit." "So also are all other elect persons, who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the word." I should be glad to know the new rule of interpretation by which death is considered evidence of the infant's election, but not of the election of all other "incapable" persons, when too, such persons are connected with the infants by the emphatic conjunctive clause, "so also."

* The rubric reads thus, "It is certain by God's Word, that children which are baptized, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved."—(Rubric after the office for Infant Baptism. Church of England Prayer Book)

The fact is, no paraphrase fairly made, could render the section clearer than its perspicuous authors have made it. And no gloss can obscure its obvious meaning. There was, to say the least, a doubt of the universal salvation of infants; and it seems to have been thought advisable to couch the idea in the language used, because however limited or unlimited the number of the saved might be, this was certain—that such as should be saved must necessarily be the elect. This is the fairest construction that can be put on the place. And any such attempt as that of the Southern Presbyterian to construe it more charitably, is only making the matter worse.

Convocation of Northern Pennsylvania.

The Vernal Session of the Convocation of Northern Pennsylvania was held in Christ Church, Danville, on the 9th, 10th and 11th of May. On Tuesday evening, Prayers were read by Rev. Messrs. Natt and Smith, the Lessons by Rev. Messrs. Morris and Marple. The Convocation sermon was preached by Rev. W. J. Clark, from Romans i. 1.

On Wednesday morning the Convocation assembled for worship. Present, the Rev. Messrs. Natt, Morris, Marple, Lightner, Field, Heister, Clotworthy, Clark, and Smith, of Mercer Co. Rev. Messrs. Clark and Marple read Prayers. Rev. Mr. Morris read the Lessons and the Ante-Communion Service. Sermon by the Rev. Mr. Smith, from Romans xiv. 9; after which the Holy Communion was administered by the Rev. Mr. Natt, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Lightner. In the afternoon, Rev. Messrs. Field and Morris read Prayers, the Rev. Messrs. Clotworthy and Natt taking the Lessons. Sermon by Rev. Mr. Heister. At the third service, Prayers were read by Rev. Mr. Morris, and the Lesson by Rev. Mr. Field; after which addresses were delivered by Rev. Messrs. Natt, Clotworthy and Clark, on missions.

On Thursday morning Rev. Messrs. Clotworthy and Natt read Prayers, and Rev. Messrs. Clark and Heister the Lessons. The sermon by Rev. Mr. Field. At afternoon service, Rev. Messrs. Heister and Field read Prayers, Rev. Mr. Clotworthy the Lessons, and Rev. Mr. Morris preached to the young. After the sermon the Rev. Messrs. Natt, Clark and Smith delivered addresses on Christian education. At night, the Rev. Messrs. Smith and Clark read Prayers, the Rev. Mr. Field the Lessons, and the Rev. Mr. Natt preached.

During the intervals of Divine Service, the Convocation assembled for the transaction of business, the most prominent items being exercises for mutual improvement, consisting of analyses of texts and topics, the criticism of sermons, and the discussion of questions of theology, and familiar conversations on ministerial duties. It was a series of deeply interesting and instructive exercises; and the clergy separated—some for the Convention, and some for their homes, refreshed by the opportunity that had been afforded them for mutual conference and prayer. The chief drawback to our usefulness, is the immense district of country embraced within the limits of the Convocation. Time will remedy this; and we shall ultimately find, God giving us His blessing, that our Convocational sessions are leaving a deep and abiding impress upon this whole region of country. A new interest in behalf of the Church is awakened, and an impetus is given to the good work, by each succeeding session. The next session will be held in Lewistown on the third Tuesday in July. Will not some of our city brethren meet with us, and assist us by their counsels?

The Monumental Church.

Rusticus. Will you be kind enough to show me the way to Calvary Church?

Urbanus. I wish it were in my power to do so, but the Corner Stone is not yet laid.

R. Why you astonish me. The ladies of the Christ Church Missionary Association appeared very zealous in making collections, and sanguine in their expectations, when I last visited the city; and surely no one who ever had the happiness of knowing Bishop White, would refuse to assist in erecting such a monument to his memory; and I expected that voluntary contributions would have poured into their treasury from every diocese in the United States.

U. Perhaps Episcopalians thought the Philadelphians wished to build the Church themselves. The want of general co-operation must be attributed to some misunderstanding. I have been induced to believe that many ignorant persons thought the Bishop was to be canonized, and that his image was to be set up as an object of adoration, in the projected building. But the ladies never even thought of employing a sculptor to make a likeness of his majestic form, or a painter to furnish a portrait to embellish the Church. An artist might portray the lineaments of his face, but none could convey an idea of the mild radiance of that eye which exhibited "the peace of God which passeth all understanding."

R. Have the ladies endeavoured to interest all the Bishops in their cause, and requested them to use their powerful influence? Have they solicited the co-operation of every Sunday School teacher?

U. The ladies are too timid, and are afraid of appearing intrusive; but as they have subscribed themselves, and take all the trouble of collecting, why should they hesitate. The most undaunted resolution, and persevering effort to procure the requisite funds to accomplish their laudable enterprise are not at all incompatible with feminine delicacy and refinement. I wish they were all animated by the philosophic spirit of a judicious and merry old friend of mine, who said, if she wished to obtain a favour, she applied to those whom she thought could grant it, and if they refused, "she was no worse off than she was before." If any blame them for their importunity, they must be those kind of characters described by Bishop White, "from whom," he said, "praise is censure, and censure praise." As we have half an hour to converse previous to going to Church, let us examine the missionary report of the ladies.

R. Yes, but let us first read over these verses on the cover.

U. They are very appropriate and affecting.

R. The appeal I should think would be irresistible. Now let us examine this Special Prayer, set forth by our Diocesan, to be used at their meetings. How comprehensive and excellent it is. I think we cannot employ our time more profitably than in offering up the petitions contained in the fourth clause, viz: "Open more and more, O Lord, the hearts of thy people, that they may contribute of their abundance to this good work—that no needful prayers or efforts in its behalf may be wanting; and that a House may soon rise, where Thy name shall be recorded, and Thy worship celebrated, and where many immortal souls shall be trained for Thy service on earth, and for the fruition of Thy glory in Heaven."

U. Now let us examine the Report.

R. I am glad to see the names of contributors from so many of the different Churches, and the offerings from several Sunday Schools. Such a bright exemplar of all the Christian virtues and graces should be held up as a model for imitation in every school, and every scholar be taught to consider it a privilege to contribute to the erection of the Church. I never met him without feeling humbled with a sense of my vast, my immeasurable inferiority; and having a noble ambition excited to emulate his benevolence and cheerful piety, his meekness of wisdom, and that suavity and urbanity which gave such an ineffable charm to his manners.

U. Although every person is reluctant to pay a tax for the enjoyment of luxuries, I should think that every Episcopalian would gladly offer a tribute to perpetuate the remembrance of such a glorious specimen of human nature, purified and exalted by the indwelling of the Spirit of light and love, which was daily presented to their view in the benign aspect and dignified carriage of our late venerated and beloved Diocesan. I always esteemed it a peculiar privilege to behold the personification of holiness and happiness he exhibited when he took possession of the spot he loved best on earth, viz: the pulpit in Christ Church, from which he delighted to proclaim the glad tidings of salvation. The Episcopal Church in America is indebted for its prosperity to his prudent counsels and judicious guidance. He was the pride and glory of the Church to which he devoted all the energies of his sound, lucid and erudite mind. He was endowed with all the requisites for his elevated position. He possessed that integrity of purpose, that conscientious regard, and fearless proclamation of essential truths, that uncompromising principle, united to the most conciliating and deferential attention to those who differed from him, that discriminating and enlightened judgment, that independence and decision which are so indispensable in a shepherd and overseer; that entire exemption from prejudice, from self-seeking, party spirit, or the desire of popularity, which are so deteriorating to the character.

R. The preacher says, "there is a time to build." Now is that time, when every Episcopalian, man, woman and child, high and low, rich and poor, should demonstrate the love and gratitude to which the Father of the American Church was entitled, by offering their quota to erect Calvary Church. When a tabernacle was to be erected in the wilderness, the officers who superintended the work, were obliged to restrain the excessive liberality of the children of Israel, who brought free-will offerings every morning to Moses. I hope the whole Episcopal Church will now be animated with the zealous spirit of the children of captivity, when Nehemiah informed them that he had obtained the divine blessing for the work, exclaimed, "let us rise and build;" and that the ladies may be encouraged by the assurance, "the God of heaven, he will prosper us, therefore we his servants will arise and build." I observe, by the Report, that a respectable and attentive congregation have been assembled in a "hired room," and flourishing Sunday Schools are in operation. The Society must resign this room next April, and the worshippers be dispersed, if the Church be not completed to receive them! Shall the Episcopal Church be disgraced by such a disastrous event? How many who are blessed with superfluous wealth, could contribute one thousand dollars, without experiencing the slightest inconvenience for want of the funds thus expended! How many generous individuals are building Churches in England and this country at their own expense! Many a hopeless invalid, who has out-lived all his joys, might feel an interest in hearing of the daily progress of this Church, which his wealth would enable them to complete. They can no longer work for time, let them procure for themselves the satisfaction of seeing their money work for the eternal good of multitudes who may be born for glory in this holy temple. Many bequeath generous donations, but they know not whether the appropriation of their money will produce the benefit they intended; neither can they enjoy the gratification of beholding the happiness they have conferred. Let them determine that the erection of the Monumental Church in 1848, shall be inscribed in our ecclesiastical archives. The name Calvary should enlist the active and practical sympathies of every Christian heart. Can we in imagination, stand at the base of Calvary's Mount, and with the retrospective faith, gaze upon the scene once enacted there, and refuse to lead any wandering sinner, for whom that sacrifice was made, to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world.

Maryland.—CONFIRMATIONS.—On Wednesday night, June 7th, in Trinity Church, Washington, D. C., the Bishop preached, and confirmed twenty-nine persons, (one from St. John's Church.)

On Whitsunday morning in Grace Church, Ellicott's Mills, the Bishop preached, confirmed two persons, and administered the Lord's Supper.

In the afternoon, at the Patapsco Female Institute, the Bishop preached and confirmed eight young ladies, pupils of the institution.—Church Times.

Virginia.—SERVICES BY BISHOP MEADE.—After the services at York the Bishop visited Williamsburg, and spent two days there, taking some part in the services. Thence to Charles City spending a day in each of the Churches. At old Westover Church the attendance on the Sabbath was good, and four young persons between the ages of fourteen and sixteen were confirmed. The design and object of the rite are best set forth when persons of that age are the recipients, provided they come with enlightened minds and renovated hearts, as it is believed was the case in this instance. St. Paul speaks of Timothy in connexion with the piety of his grandmother Lois and his mother Eunice as having contributed to his conversion. Who can say how much the well known piety of the venerable grandmother of these young ones, operating through like-minded parents, may have contributed to their early choice of religion.

From Charles City the Bishop proceeded to his appointments in Sussex and Greenville. At the Church in Sussex one day was spent, and five persons confirmed, two of whom were colored. At Hickey's ford two days were spent and four services held. Besides the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Sprigg and the Bishop, the Rev. Messrs. Stringfellow, Gibson and Dennison were present. A new church was consecrated, by the name of "Christ Church" on the first day, and on the second four persons were confirmed, and the Lord's supper administered. It is only a few years since Episcopal services were commenced at this place, and now, a very neat and convenient church, well situated at the outskirts of the village, is an ornament and a blessing to the same. It was crowded with attentive hearers during all the services. The church is built in a part of old Meherrin parish where revival seemed so hopeless some years since, that the rich service of communion plate formerly used in it was loaned to an adjoining parish, on the condition, however, that it be returned should it ever be needed, an event but little expected. It was gratifying to many persons to see it used on the occasion just mentioned. It may not be without its interest to state to some, that the very beautiful and convenient building consecrated on the occasion was once a stable. Its great improvement and really handsome aspect is most creditable to those who have been the instruments of its transformation.—Sou. Churchman.

Western New York.—BISHOP DE LANCEY'S VISITATIONS.—On the 5th of June, the Bishop preached in the morning, in the Presbyterian house of worship, at Wayne, Steuben Co., and in the afternoon in the Baptist house of worship, at Bradford.

On the 6th, in St. Thomas' Church, Bath, in the same county, the Bishop baptized for the Rector, one adult, preached and confirmed ten persons, including one sick person in private.

On the 7th, the Bishop consecrated Trinity Church, Howard, in the same county. The request to consecrate, was handed to the Bishop by the warden, Mr. Crozier, and read by the Rev. Mr. Weber, of Friendship, and the sentence of consecration, by the Rev. Mr. Corson, of Bath, under whose ministrations the Church has been built. The Rev. Mr. Spalding read the morning prayer, and the Bishop preached and confirmed five persons, and administered the Holy Communion. This small Church, which cost but a few hundred dollars, has been erected by the Irish Protestant population of that vicinity, and is highly creditable to their zealous devotion to the Church. It is wholly paid for with the exception of the small sum of fifteen dollars, which we hope some liberal friend will send them through the Rev. Mr. Corson.

On the 8th, the Bishop preached, confirmed six persons, and administered the holy communion in St. James' Church, Hammondsport.

On Sunday, the 11th, the Bishop preached, morning and afternoon, in St. Mark's Church, Penn Yan, and confirmed at the latter service six persons, including one sick person in private.—Gospel Messenger.

Connecticut.—The corner-stone of the new Church at Meriden, was laid on Thursday last, the 8th inst. The Rev. Dr. Croswell, of New Haven, being the senior clergyman present, conducted the opening services, the corner-stone being laid by the Rev. Robert A. Hallam, formerly Rector of the parish. The Rev. Mr. Munson, performed the closing services and pronounced the benediction. An address, highly appropriate to the occasion, was delivered by the Rev. A. C. Cox, of Hartford. There were also present the Rev. Messrs. Pitkin, J. H. Nichols, Hitchcock, Abel Nichols, Bryant, Everest, Willey and Chauncey. We congratulate our friends in Meriden on this auspicious commencement of their laudable enterprise, and earnestly invoke in their behalf the blessing and direction of Almighty God.

EPISCOPAL SERVICES IN CALVARY CHURCH PARISH, STONINGTON, CT.—Mr. Editor:—The Bishop of the Diocese has just terminated his Eastern visitation by two very impressive services in this new and interesting parish. He arrived in the Borough on Tuesday evening, May 30th, accompanied by Rev. Messrs. Hallam, Morgan and Brewster, and, at the appointed hour, proceeded to the "upper room" now used for public worship. Evening Prayer was said by Rev. Mr. Brewster—the lessons by Rev. Mr. Bennett, of R. I.—the Sacrament of Baptism administered to an adult by the Rector, and a sermon preached by Rev. Mr. Morgan, of Norwich. Then followed the Holy Rite of Confirmation. Six persons being presented, and as this was the first Episcopal act ever performed in the parish, it was witnessed by a large congregation with the liveliest interest.

On Wednesday, May 31st, the corner-stone of the new Church was laid by the Bishop with the usual solemnities. A large concourse, composed of both Clergy and Laity, assembled at the present place of worship, and were assigned their respective stations in procession. Among the clergy, in addition to those above mentioned, were Rev. Isaac W. Hallam, of Lynn, Mass., Rev. Thomas H. Vail, of R. I., and Rev. Giles H. Deshon, of Glastenbury. Among the Laity were most respectable deputations from New London and Norwich, as also from the adjoining parish of Westerly. At 11 o'clock the procession moved in due order to the ground, where the foundations of the Church edifice are already at an advanced stage, and every preparation being made, the solemn office was commenced by the Bishop, and the corner-stone laid. The form used upon this occasion was that issued in the Diocese of New York, and in several portions of it the Bishop was assisted by Rev. Messrs. R. A. Hallam, I. W. Hallam, and T. H. Vail. The address of the Rector was then pronounced, and of this production we will barely say, it was earnest, sound, and conceived in the happiest spirit. At its close Churchmen from abroad, and all who felt so inclined, were invited to partake of a repast at the Wadawannock House, previous to their departure—and accordingly a large company adjourned to the place named, and enjoyed—what some of them enjoyed before—the most generous hospitality, at the hands of the proprietor, Mr. Van Rensselaer, and his excellent lady. Mutual congratulations and kind, Christianly feelings here prevailed, and we separated, thankful to the Head of the Church, that He had been so gracious to the minister and members of this flock—shedding his blessing while there were few of them, and they strangers in the land.—Calendar.

Rev. W. F. Morgan
Maine.—The Bishop visited St. Mark's Church, Augusta, on Sunday, June 4th, and in the afternoon confirmed seven persons.

The services connected with the confirmation were very solemn and impressive. Evening prayer was read by the Rector of the Church. The Bishop then preached from the text—Acts viii. 14, 17. He described 'the laying on of hands' of the Apostles' times, showed its direct succession in confirmation of the present day, and addressed four classes of persons, who might ordinarily be found in any large number presented for confirmation. His eloquent address to the newly confirmed could not fail to stir up the hearts and resolutions of those who had at any time confessed Christ, and to waken in others the desire that they may soon be partakers of this holy rite.—Wit.

The Physiognomy of Protestants.—The following is one of the most beautiful specimens of Roman Catholic romancing that we have ever seen. Letter of missionary John Nep. Neuman to the committee of the Leopold Society.

BALTIMORE, 6 December, 1843.

"The heresy of Methodism, like oil-of-vitriol, is eating up, or crumbling into a thousand fragments the older sects of protestantism in the United States.

"The false doctrines of modern American heretics come in no degree behind the ancient errors of the Gnostics and Manichæes. If the matters were not relative to the knowledge of the Holy One in heaven, and upon earth, it would be laughable to witness the vagaries and conceits of the modern American sects: The terrible judgments of a righteous God as revealed more and more clearly upon the miserable proud fools who despise the voice of the Son of God in his holy church, and separate themselves from the Unity of that spiritual Body in which alone life and holiness are attainable. Every sect which has sprung up for the last hundred years adopts the notion of the thousand years' reign, which others held before.

The ruling opinions among the various sects are revealed in their very face, voice, walk and speech, so that you need not have studied Lavater to know, after a little observation of the exterior of Americans, with tolerable certainty, what is their religion."

REMARK.—It has often been said that a Romish priest may be known by his garb and his gait, but we never heard before that the ruling opinions of the several "sects" are revealed by their face, voice and walk," so that you can tell a Baptist from a Presbyterian at first sight.—N. Y. Observer.

Travelling in Egypt.

"Egypt is not the country to go to for recreation of travel. It is too suggestive and too confounding to be met but in the spirit of study. One's powers of observation sink under the perpetual exercise of thought: and the lightest-hearted voyager, who sets forth from Cairo eager for new scenes and days of frolic, comes back an antique, a citizen of the world of six thousand years ago, kindred with the mummy. Nothing but large knowledge and sound habits of thought can save him from returning perplexed and borne down;—unless indeed it be ignorance and levity. A man who goes to shoot crocodiles, and flog Arabs, and eat ostrich's eggs, looks upon the monuments as so many strange old heaps, and comes back 'bored to death with the Nile;' as we were told we should be. He turns back from Thebes, or from the First Cataract:—perhaps without having even seen the Cataract, when within a mile of it, as in a case I know; and he pays his crew to work night and day, to get back to Cairo as fast as possible. He may return gay and unworn: and so may the true philosopher, to whom no tidings of Man in any age came amiss; who has not prejudices to be painfully weaned from, and an imagination too strong to be overwhelmed by mystery, and the rush of a host of new ideas. But for all between these two extremes of levity and wisdom, a Nile voyage is as serious a labor as the mind and spirits can be involved in; a trial even to health and temper such as is little dreamed of on leaving some. The labor and care are well bestowed, however, for the thoughtful traveller can hardly fail of returning from Egypt a wiser, and therefore a better man."—Eastern Life, Present and Past.

PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1848.

must have been. At this moment of solemnity and awe, it was proposed to call upon God in prayer, to stretch out His hand and save us. With a firm and clear voice one of the beautiful forms of our liturgy was read, to which all with deep sincerity of heart responded, Amen. In a short time afterwards the long line of breakers was seen through the mist and gloom of the tempest, and we knew that in a very few instants we should receive an answer to our prayers, either by being rescued from a watery grave, or by lifting up our eyes in Paradise. The head of the brig was turned directly on the reef, and upon the crest of a terrific billow we swept with utmost speed into the foaming surf. She struck with shattering force, her seams opening, and the whole frame quivering as if in the act of breaking up. A huge breaker poured over us with resistless violence. Again she struck! The rudder was torn from its pintles, and ground to pieces, and the strong-bolted ribs and planks must soon follow. Sharp axes, wielded by strong arms, sent the masts reeling, crashing over the sides—a few more heavy thumps succeeded, and suddenly we found ourselves in smooth water inside of the reef, and safe! Not a soul lost—not a soul hurt! The hurricane, like a wild beast disappointed of his prey, departed, leaving us with thankful hearts to meditate upon our miraculous escape.

The morning disclosed to us our position. We had run on the Florida coast about 30 miles from Key West. Gratitude for our preservation was the theme of all conversation, and many were the vows made, and expressed, that the remainder of our lives thus returned to us, after having been as it were "required at our hands," should be dedicated to the Gracious God who had spared us. The Providence displayed in our preservation, from first to last, could not be mistaken or overlooked. It was plain as the Sun at noon-day, and no one ventured to speak of chance, as the blind guide which had steered us with such skill through so many and intricate dangers. The brig had been detained in Key West, waiting for a favorable appearance of the weather—and sailed for Havana—there Commodore Sloot met her, on his way home from the distant Pacific ocean, and ordered her to convey him to the United States. Here also adverse weather delayed her for some days, but despite of it, she put to sea. If it had been possible, she would have returned to that snug harbor, but the wind did not permit it. After being knocked down on our "beam ends," she righted contrary to all the rules of science and seamanship. We scudded down to within a stone's throw of Cuba, no one being able to explain why it was that the seas did not break on board, and swamp us, and just when about to be thrown upon an iron-bound coast, the wind hauled, and took us clear. After continuing to scud for 10 or 12 hours more, threading our way through the numerous reefs and shoals, we were enabled to make a true story.

More than thirty years ago, during the war, a poor soldier's wife, named Mary Davis, took a sorrowful leave of her husband, who was to go with his regiment to fight for his country in Spain. Soldiers may not take their wives with them in war-time; and the poor women, who are left behind with their children depending on them alone, have often a sadly hard time. Mary Davis had at this time one little boy of six years old; and to maintain him and herself she engaged herself as washerwoman to a family in the neighbourhood. Her own house was in one of the streets in Westminster; and, as it was larger than she wanted, she let the two front rooms to a woman-lodger. This woman, hearing how Mary was to be engaged during the day, proposed to take charge of her little boy in her absence, an offer which was gladly accepted.

Mary went next morning to her work, glad to leave her child under good care; but, when she came home at night, the woman was gone, and had carried the child with her. At first she looked for them back every moment; but the night passed away, and they did not return. The poor mother was thrown into the greatest imaginable terror and distress. She made inquiries every where, but in vain; and weeks and months passed, bringing her no news of her lost child, or of the wicked woman who had stolen him from her. In the midst of this great trouble she became the mother of another child; and, as soon as she had recovered sufficiently, she resolved upon doing what hitherto she had not been able to do—to set out herself in search of her lost son. She had learnt that the woman was a native of Leeds, and this was her only guide in this strange, almost hopeless search; and she determined, therefore, to make her way towards the north. She set out on foot, carrying her baby in her arms, now six weeks old, and had travelled onwards till she came to a place called Folkingham, 106 miles north of London. She had never failed to make inquiries, wherever she had stopped in her tedious journey, after a woman and a little boy, such as she described them, put always in vain; and she had yet many a long mile to travel before she could reach Leeds, where only would she give up her hope of finding again her lost treasure. Weary and faint she came to the little inn, the Greyhound at Folkingham, to pass the night there, and rest herself for her next day's journey. As she sat with her baby on her lap, there

According to her cusheeded in landlady gave the boys some supper, which they meet their down to. Without thinking why, Mary Davis's at-Chapel, was fixed in these boys. One did not seem more than grateful sars old: the other was older. There was no distinguishing anything in their blackened faces, and yet her eyes sities and d on the younger boy. Perhaps her own wearied limbs himself, bled heart made her feel pity for all who seemed deserted fail for w used: anyhow her eyes remained fixed on the poor blow—Sanney-sweep. In the mean while the two hungry boys deep, and much engaged by the supper the kind landlady had their live for them, to look about them; but in a few minutes their fello boy happened to turn his head towards where Mary casts on t. For a moment his eyes were fixed upon her: then wreck, and out in frantic joy: "That's my mother!" and flew beneath arms.

This was a remarkable instance of God's providence; and it may be hoped that neither the mother nor the little boy ever forgot his kind interposition.

Mount Carmel*.

I proceeded to this interesting spot or vineyard (as the word signifies in the Hebrew tongue), by the sea, lying towards the south, by the bay of Acre, where it forms a promontory of great grandeur, or majestic head of land above the ocean, and under shelter of it vessels ride with security in good anchorage. During the period of the Hebrews, this elevation was comprehended under the dominions of Manasseh. I passed Kardah-Kah, or the ancient stream Belus. Here it may be remarked how often we find from most trivial accidents highly important discoveries and enterprises have arisen. Some travelling merchants carrying nitre happened to stop at the mouth of this river; and, not finding stones to set kettles on to cook, they piled the sand of nitre for this purpose; when, by the action of fire, a new substance named glass appeared—thus adding to the comforts of life and the progress of science; and the sand of this peculiar water continued for ages to supply manufactures, when the natives of Sidon and other parts availed themselves of making this beautiful production. In the seventeenth century vessels were employed to remove it to the glass-works of Venice and Genoa,† Perhaps the great law-giver may have alluded to such sands when he spake of Zebulun, which is at no great distance from this spot, as having "treasures hid in the sand" (Deut. xxxiii. 19). I arrived at Hypha, a small walled town close to the sea, at the foot of the mount, and was recommended to a Carmelite friar, who attends to the affairs of a present as well as future world, namely, blending the profession of timber-merchant with the duties of priest. He accompanied me to the summit, where the ascent was difficult from its ruggedness, but the prospect boundless. This mountain, which forms one of the barriers of the promised land, stands from east to west, and is 2,000 feet from the level of the sea, where the mighty waves wash its base. Altogether it forms one of the most striking promonotries of any along the shores of the Mediterranean, although its flowing top does not now perfume the sky. At the bottom of it runs Kishon (Judges v. 21), "the ancient river" alluded to in the sacred records as having proved fatal to the host of Sisera; and to the north is the bay of Acre. Few places can be more favourable to silent contemplation. Of the Church, at one time, in reference to a description of graces, it is said, "its head is like Carmel;" while at another, in its afflicted state, it is compared to a fugitive in the deep recesses of it; and we are informed that, as a punishment of Israel, the top of it shall "wither" (Amos i. 2). In the beautiful description by the wise man, of the mutual love of Christ and the church, it is added: "Thine head upon thee is like Carmel." The first devotees took up a residence here in the fourth century, and increased*; who gravely held out Elijah was their foudler, whose statue is in St. Peter's, Rome; and they inhabited the place in consequence of the orders of a pacha of Cairo, then at war with another at Acre. In a monastery, hewn in a rock, was discovered a writing, in the Arabic language, in the fourth year of the Hegira, bearing the title of the capitulation of the Christians of the east to the impostor, and deposited in the king's library, Paris. The place was often pillaged by Arabs, which may account for its being so forsaken. One of the great Jewish assemblies was held here; and no reader of the word of God can stand on this mountain of grandeur without recollecting the sublime subject of Elijah, the one prophet of the true God, boldly challenging nearly five hundred prophets of the worthless idol, Baal, and four hundred prophets of the groves, defying the false slaves of Baal to a solemn trial, as to which of them served the God of Israel, thus exposing himself to the fury of a most deluded people. Misheal or Mashal (1 Chron. vi. 74) of the Levites, in this neighbourhood, might, in all probability, have been on this mountain. An embassy took place here, when David was united in marriage to a Carmelitess, who at a future period was with others of her sex taken captive, in a war with the Amalekites (1 Sam. xxx.). On the 20th of July, Christians at a distance proceed to the mount and perform acts of devotion in memory of the prophet. The extent, altitude, and peculiar shape of the elevation furnished Solomon with a beautiful simile expressive of the loveliness and majesty of the church in the eyes of the Redeemer, who is the Head of it (Song of Solomon vii. 5; Isa. xxxv. 2); and its fertility in the words of the sacred writers is frequently considered as that of a fruitful field (1 Sam xxxv. 2). It was not only distinguished for its particular beauty and locality, but marked for its vineyards, olive-trees, and rich pastures similar to a luxuriant garden, and which point out "the excellency of Carmel."

We have also a strong proof of the high estimation in which the pastures and elevations were held among the ancient Jews; the cattle which grazed on these being peculiarly distinguished for strength. For instance, Uziah, king of Jerusalem, a distinguished agriculturist, who possessed numerous flocks in different parts of the country, had many here; and another individual had sheep and goats to the number of 4,000. A delightful odour is thrown out from wild and aromatic herbs; and the air is pure, compared to that of Acre; yet, in the language of the prophet, "the flower of Carmel languisheth" (Nah. i. 4); and, alas! a decree has gone forth that its summit should wither, and a once fruitful spot be converted into barrenness. Wild animals are here; and a curious description of stones are found, which resemble fruit—in consequence, as has been gravely assured by the monk, of some act of Elias; and, extraordinary as it may appear, these are frequently used as antidotes to diseases. Perhaps a comparison of the bride's dress to Carmel was derived from those sprigs of jewellery and branches of precious stones which adorned it. Standing on such ground, it was impossible not to feel a peculiar sacred awe; and the mind, wrapped in contemplation, especially in reflecting on the victory accomplished by Jehovah over Baal through the instrumentality and zeal of the hoary-headed Elijah, when Kishon ran red to the sea with the blood of those false priests (1 Kings xviii.).

One object which attracts the attention of a religious traveller is a cave presumed to be one in which the prophet had concealed himself from the persecution of Ahab and Jezebel (1 Kings xix. 9), after he had caused 450 of these priests to be sacrificed near the river. Caves and places of concealment must also have undoubtedly been about this height at an early period. Forests were also here, that afforded hiding-places, to which an inspired writer refers (Amos ix. 3); and prophecy may be said to be fulfilled to the very letter, in declaring the top of Carmel shall wither. The view around may be considered as unrivalled for grandure, extent, and variety, although the elevation is unequal in point of height in different parts. There is no hiding-place now on the summit, a luxuriant garden, and enveloped in trees, as a wood. It was here we find the Shunamite woman had an interview with Elisha, whose son was restored to life on those intercessions he had offered up to God in his behalf. From the highest point, which it may be observed is a land-mark for mariners, an extensive and picturesque view presents itself of the mighty ocean, and the snowy heights of Lebanon towering above the summit of other mountains, with Acre and the surrounding country, and as such may be considered as unrivalled.

The Order for Divine Service, according to the Use of the Italian Reformed Church at Malta.*

MINISTER.—“Brethren, the object for which we are here assembled is, to praise the Lord, to bless his holy name with prayers and giving of thanks, and to listen to what is written in his holy word. Let us commence, therefore, by invoking the holy name of God.”

People.—“O God, who made heaven and earth.”

Minister.—“Let us sing to the honour and glory of God a hymn [or psalm].”

¶ Singing being ended the minister shall say:

“Hearken to the word of God, written in the chapter of the book of , in the Old Testament.”

¶ When the lesson is ended, the minister shall say:

“Let us praise the Lord, by singing the , psalm.”

¶ Singing being ended the minister shall say:

“Listen to the words of the law, as it is written in the twentieth chapter of the book of Exodus” (here follow the ten commandments, according to Diodati's version of the Italian Bible. To the reading of the law is subjoined, by way of comment, an extract from the gospel according to St. Matthew, chap. xxii. ver. 35-40).

¶ The lesson being ended, the minister shall say:

“Let us praise the Lord again, and sing psalm verse .”

¶ During the singing the bishop or elder shall ascend into the pulpit, and after a short private prayer, turning to the people shall say:

“My Brethren, the blessing of God Almighty be with you. The Lord be with you.”

People.—“And with thy spirit.”

The Elder, or Bishop.—“Dearly beloved, let us humble ourselves before the Lord, and with a deep sense of our misery, implore on our knees the pardon of our sins and iniquities from him against whom we have sinned, as we know and acknowledge. And let us beseech our heavenly Father, for the merits of Jesus Christ our Saviour, that he would grant us the forgiveness of our sins, restoration to his favour, and the salvation of our souls, saying, with penitent and contrite hearts,

“O Lord God, eternal and almighty, merciful and compassionate Father, we thy miserable creatures, thy wandering children, are come before thee, not daring to lift up our eyes to thy divine majesty. We acknowledge our wretchedness. We confess that we are poor sinners, born in corruption, inclined to evil, incapable of doing good, and that by our daily and manifold transgressions of thy holy commandments, we justly deserve to be condemned to death. But O, our God, our loving and heavenly Father, we feel a lively sorrow for our offences against thee: we condemn ourselves and our sins with the deepest repentance: we humbly seek thy heavenly grace, and in our great misery beseech thee to vouchsafe us thy help. Design, then, O Lord God most good, Father most merciful, to turn towards us with compassion, and to pardon our sins for the love of thy Son our Saviour. Vouchsafe and continually increase in us, the graces of thy Holy Spirit; so that, being instructed in our own sinfulness, we may both grow day by day more thoroughly convinced, and more heartily ashamed thereof, and also our faith bring forth those fruits of righteousness and holiness, which are acceptable to thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.”

¶ The people sitting down, the elder, or bishop, shall stand, and say:

“Let us, my brethren, now read the word of the Lord, as it is written in the chapter of the book of , in the New Testament.”

¶ When the chapter is ended, the people shall stand while the elder, or bishop, also standing, beseeches God to impart such acquaintance with the truth of his holy word, that the congregation may be edified and improved thereby. After the prayer the sermon shall follow, which being ended, two or three verses of a psalm or hymn shall be sung. Afterwards the elder or bishop, shall read what follows, all standing:

“O Lord, we thank thee for this our assembling here together in thy name. We thank thee for having empowered us to sing thy praise. We thank thee for having caused us to hear the voice of thy holy word. We thank thee also for the holy desires and good counsels which thou hast engrafted in our mind. Vouchsafe, O heavenly Father, to hearken to our prayers for all the church of Christ dispersed throughout the world; for the congregations that believe in the divine scriptures; for the bishops and pastors of the Christian flock; for the people redeemed by the blood of thy only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ. Preserve among them faith and good works. Pour out thy Holy Spirit among them, the Spirit of counsel and strength, the spirit of knowledge and piety, the Spirit of fear and love, of unity and charity. We beseech thee, O Lord, for those churches which have erred so miserably from the truth and purity of thy holy word. Bring back the pastors and the flocks to thy fold. Raise up among them true believers, men after thine own heart, as of old thou didst raise up the prophets from amongst Israel; and may they be instruments of thy will, converting thy people, and minister to unhappy sinners, lying in darkness and in the shadow of death, thy mercies, which are ever new. May thy light shine, O Lord, over all the world, but particularly over our own country: scatter the darkness, break the fetters which afflict it: to our brethren at home restore the liberty of the Spirit, the liberty of thy children; and recall them all to the truth; and make us one fold, under one Shepherd, Jesus Christ our Saviour.

“We beseech thee, O Lord, to bless our gracious sovereign the queen, the heir to these realms, and all the royal family. We beseech thee also for all whom thou hast put in authority under her, and especially for the government of this island; that she may rule for thee, and they may govern justly and Christianly, according to the commands of thy holy word.

“Accept, O Lord, these our prayers; and vouchsafe to grant them, through the intercession of Jesus Christ our mediator, while we conclude them in the holy words which he himself has taught us, saying—” (here follows the Lord's prayer, with the doxology).

“Brethren, before we depart hence let us bear witness to our mutual faith, in the form drawn up by our forefathers—” (here follows the creed of the apostles).

“Go in peace. Walk before God, and be ye perfect. Remember the poor. The Lord look upon you and keep you. The Lord be gracious unto you and make his face to shine

The Lord grant all your petitions, and provide for all your needs.”

People.—“Amen.”

The Death of Moses.

BY THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

“And die in the mount whither thou goest up.”—Deuter.

Go, ascend the green-clad mountain,
Moses, go, and gently die,
Gaze upon Siloam's fountain;
View Judea's purple sky.

On the Jordan's swelling waters,
Fix but once thy fainting sight:
Then amid thy sons and daughters,
Sink to death's oblivious night.

Olive's mount shall pass before thee,
Sharon's Roses fill the air,
But thy God cannot restore thee,
To inhale the fragrance there,

For beside the Rock when standing,
With the Rod of fairy might,
In thy feeble name commanding,
Water from the flinty height;—

Then my Servant didst thou grieve me,
Then thy meekness changed to pride,
All thy goodness seemed to leave thee,
Calling forth the chrysal tide.

Fondly had I thought to place thee,
In Judea's fruitful dale,
But the earth-clod must encase thee,
And thy loss my people wail.

When thy heart hath ceased its bounding,
And thy sinewy arm is cold,
When thy voice no more is sounding,
All my mighty deeds of old:—

Then within a land of Glory,
Brighter—fairer far than this,
Shalt thou chant Redemption's story,
And thy harp be strung to bliss.

Up he went with staff ascending,
Wondrous visions cheered his eyes,
Angel bands his steps attending,
Leading him to Paradise.

Thus he stood—a Pilgrim hoary,
Waiting meekly but to die,
And dishonour changed to glory,
Time to Immortality.

Sailors and the Sea.

“They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters—these see the works of the Lord, and His wonders in the deep.”—Ps. cvii. 23, 24. How seldom it occurs to those who pass their lives in the quiet and security of the land that though ages have elapsed since these lines were penned, they describe a class of men yet in existence, and still dwelling amid such terrors. The reckless character of seamen has led to the belief that they are utterly without religious sentiment, and that God is never at all in their thoughts. Though for any practical purpose of reformation, this is alas! too true, 'tis rather owing to the fact that the poor sailor has been neglected, and outcast, without opportunity of obtaining that knowledge of God, which alone can make him “wise unto salvation,” than because he is either by nature or pursuit, more averse than other men, from religion. The scenes of terror through which he so often passes, in which he may almost be said to spend his days, fail not to implant in his heart that fear of God which is the beginning of wisdom, and though from habit he may look with calm indifference on the waves of the sea, which are “mighty, and rage horribly,” he never fails, while in the immediate presence of death, to lift his untutored thoughts to the “mightier Lord who dwelleth on High;” and “if rejoicing he forgets his fears, when he sees the storm allayed,” 'tis because there is no one to keep alive his recollection of past mercies, nor to nurture by godly instruction the tender germ of piety; if the vows made in the midnight hour of alarm, be performed not when he returns in safety to the land, 'tis because there is no sanctuary to receive the poor pilgrim within its hallowed walls,—no minister of God, to whom he can go to disclose the secrets of his bosom. Is there any cause for wonder then, if all be forgotten, and he goes forth on the ruthless sea again to brave its rude blasts, and ruder waves, and it may be perhaps, for the last time, ere he sinks into the gloomy caverns of the deep, unrepentant and unforgiven? The experience of years, and familiarity with seamen, and their feelings, enable me to speak with confidence on this subject, and it is for their sakes with whom I have shared “the dangers of the sea,” and witnessed “the goodness of the Lord,” that I pen the following feeble sketch of one of those appalling displays of omnipotence, and striking proofs of a special Providence, which move the fears, and soften

Vaughan, D.D., Rector of the Institute, Oak street, or to either of the following gentlemen, Trustees, viz: Jas. C. Booth, Joseph Cabot, Samuel V. Merrick, Caspar Morris, M. D. William Welsh. It is important that, prior to Aug. 1, notice should be given to the Rector of those pupils who expect to enter at the opening of the Institute.

ing, but thank us, she “righted,” and we breathed again. But what was the prospect before us? Embayed between the iron-bound coast of Cuba, the dangerous reefs of Florida, and the long line of the Bahama Banks, our situation seemed absolutely hopeless. The ocean contained no spot more unfavorable in which to receive a hurricane. To “lay to” was impossible, for we should “capsize;” to scud was to run into the jaws of certain death. The choice was between “the scalping knife and tomahawk,” and as the only alternative it was determined to “scud,” though apparently an act of entire desperation. To flee before such raging blast directly on to Cuba, (not more than 40 miles distant) of which, if, as was at every instant probable, it should break on board must have sent us to the bottom, and this too in a low, deep-waisted dangerous vessel, together completed an amount of peril which few, if any, ever before survived to narrate. The helm was “put up,” and we flew on the wings of the hurricane, counting the moments we had yet to live ere the brig should be hurled upon the rocks, and the scene be closed. As sea after sea would sweep by us, rolling over the bulwarks, and shutting every thing from view, and the brig “broaching to” by the concussion would seemingly make her final struggle to recover, we thought our last hour on earth had come. Suddenly, when but a short distance could have separated us from the rugged shores of Cuba (for we could not see 20 yards in any direction) the wind shifted 4 points and there appeared a glimmer of hope, feeble though it were, that we might yet be saved! We were, at all events, thankful that there was granted us a little more time to prepare for death. Away we dashed on our course with the speed of a goaded racer, the sea pursuing, if possible, in loftier mountains and the hurricane roaring with all the fury of unchained violence, while to add yet greater horror to the scene, a lurid glare o’erspread the dark clouds, reflecting an unearthly hue upon the angry waves—a sign that the hurricane was abroad in all its might, this mysterious appearance being said ever to attend these awful storms. We were now clear of Cuba, but whither bound? Blown and driven at the mercy of winds and waves, without any reckoning we seemed to rush blindfold into the arms of death. Again night shut us in! and what a night! All the dangers, and terrors of the sea were accumulated on this one poor little brig, and the souls that were pent up within her. Before morning we knew that “the end must come!” All had been done that man could do, and to

* We have been favoured by a kind correspondent with this form of prayer, which we think will interest our readers.—Ed.

God we raised our mournful cry. He alone could save us now, or "hear the voice of our complaint," and this sole remaining hope sustained all hearts, though few gave utterance to their thoughts. It was while waiting thus for our long-delayed death, as a group of the officers sat in the cabin, that a scene was witnessed never to be forgotten by any who were present, but specially brought to light at this time in proof that the sailor's heart is now, as ever it hath been, "in the right place." As the mariners of old cried "Save Lord, or we perish" when "The rough winds were warring on broad Galilee,

And the fathomless waters rose foaming and free;
When no refuge was near for the perishing bark,
But the breakers were loud, and the surges were dark," so do sailors now cast themselves into the arms of their Saviour, when they feel His power, and behold His works. The "time was at hand when we must die," and in silence we sat preparing for the event, horrible, as under the circumstances it must have been. At this moment of solemnity and awe, it was proposed to call upon God in prayer, to stretch out His hand and save us. With a firm and clear voice one of the beautiful forms of our liturgy was read, to which all with deep sincerity of heart responded, Amen. In a short time afterwards the long line of breakers was seen through the mist and gloom of the tempest, and we knew that in a very few instants we should receive an answer to our prayers, either by being rescued from a watery grave, or by lifting up our eyes in Paradise. The head of the brig was turned directly on the reef, and upon the crest of a terrific billow we swept with utmost speed into the foaming surf. She struck with shattering force, her seams opening, and the whole frame quivering as if in the act of breaking up. A huge breaker poured over us with resistless violence. Again she struck! The rudder was torn from its pintles, and ground to pieces, and the strong-bolted ribs and planks must soon follow. Sharp axes, wielded by strong arms, sent the masts reeling, crashing over the sides—a few more heavy thumps succeeded, and suddenly we found ourselves in smooth water inside of the reef, and safe! Not a soul lost—not a soul hurt! The hurricane, like a wild beast disappointed of his prey, departed, leaving us with thankful hearts to meditate upon our miraculous escape.

The morning disclosed to us our position. We had run on the Florida coast about 30 miles from Key West. Gratitude for our preservation was the theme of all conversation, and many were the vows made, and expressed, that the remainder of our lives thus returned to us, after having been as it were "required at our hands," should be dedicated to the Gracious God who had spared us. The Providence displayed in our preservation, from first to last, could not be mistaken or overlooked. It was plain as the Sun at noon-day, and no one ventured to speak of chance, as the blind guide which had steered us with such skill through so many and intricate dangers. The brig had been detained in Key West, waiting for a favorable appearance of the weather—and sailed for Havana—there Com. Sloat met her, on his way home from the distant Pacific ocean, and ordered her to convey him to the United States. Here also adverse weather delayed her for some days, but despite of it, she put to sea. If it had been possible, she would have returned to that snug harbor, but the wind did not permit it. After being knocked down on our "beam ends," she righted contrary to all the rules of science and seamanship. We scudded down to within a stone's throw of Cuba, no one being able to explain why it was that the seas did not break on board, and swamp us, and just when about to be thrown upon an iron-bound coast, the wind hauled, and took us clear. After continuing to scud for 10 or 12 hours more, threading our way through the numerous vessels, that like ourselves, were driving about in this little basin, to have run foul of any one of which, must have sent us down, and just as we bore up to "beach her" to have the wind shift suddenly 2 points, and to the direction which blew exactly up the only channel of escape—to find the next day, that if we had struck a few yards on either side of the narrow mouth through which we entered, we must have gone to pieces, as did a Spanish brig, from which we took the sole survivor of 21 persons—if too we had reached the Florida coast sooner than we did, we must have stuck fast, and perished, the sea not then being high enough to lift us clear of several rocks and bars that lay before us—these facts, all summed up, made an aggregate of proof, that God alone could have been with us, as with St. Paul in the Adriatic, and that thus it was, that there was "no loss of any man's life among us, nor even of the ship." And further, of the vessels in Key West harbor, not one escaped, but being driven up high and dry on the banks and adjacent, all were totally lost. In Havana, the very name of which implies security, out of 170 or 180 vessels, but 3 or 4 remained afloat after the hurricane, the remainder being dashed to pieces on the mole, founded, or otherwise injured, with great loss of life. Com. Sloat's arrival just in time to order the brig out of this snug place, and the impossibility of returning to it after we were once at sea—our being driven away from the coast of Florida, until water enough to float us over all danger, had been piled up there by the arrest of the Gulf-stream—our entrance through the centre of a narrow, intricate, rock-strewn channel, in the midst of darkness, not knowing where we were, and being safely conducted through it, by a favorable shift of wind, with other particulars unnoticed or forgotten, settled the fact, that we were saved by the merciful and direct interposition of God. When it was known too that prayers were offered for this very purpose, not only by the officers but by many of the hardy old seamen,—and this not from the effect of panic, for all were calm and resigned, universal was the feeling of deep devotion, and resolute the purpose in all fear and Godly sincerity to seek amendment of life.

When the brig was taken off and carried into Key West, the crew were forced to live on shore, exposed to those temptations so fatal to seamen, and which especially abound in that corrupt place. The effect, however, of the religious impressions lately made upon them, was shown by the fact, that not one misbehaved—a case I am sure almost without precedent in any instance of a man-of-war's crew similarly situated before. Well do I remember the contrast between the conduct of this brig's officers and crew and that of a frigate's in which, not many years ago, I passed through a scene of almost equal peril. The hour of danger, and probable death witnessed, blasphemies, oaths, and reckless desperation—and when a safe harbor received us within its wished for shores, no thanksgiving was heard, amid the drunkenness and revelry that ensued. Sailors were then more neglected than they are now.

Such are some of the dangers that seamen encounter, and such their general effect upon them. Such too are the displays they witness of Divine Providence, and the vows of gratitude, they utter, and suppose in every port that received the rescued mariner, there was a Sailor's home, and chapel ready with open doors to welcome the wanderer back—a chaplain to water by his counsels, prayers and ministrations the good seed sown by the hand of God? At Key West, alas! there was none! and what has been the consequence? God only knows. These men, so ready then, to turn to the Lord, what and where are they now? Some have already gone to their accounts. The rest scattered to the four winds, may at this moment be in a similar scene of peril, bemoaning themselves with bitter cries, that they heeded not the warning then vouchsafed them "to prepare to meet their God." It is designed to erect in this city, a Floating Chapel, in which as to an Ark of Safety, the penitent, and grateful sailor may come to offer up his prayers and thanksgiving—to provide for him a chaplain who, knowing the necessities and sympathizing with the feelings of seamen, will devote himself, by Divine permission, to their service. Shall this effort fail for want of necessary means? Hurricanes still continue to blow—Sailors still continue to behold God's wonders on the deep, and to register on High their vows of amendment should their lives be spared to reach the wished for Heaven. Shall their fellow Christians continue to leave them to wander as outcasts on the land, and return to brave again the tempest and the wreck, and to sink at last, as needs they must, if unrepentant, beneath the waves of eternal death? Build them Chapels—provide them with Chaplains, preach the Gospel to them in its fulness and then it shall no more be said

"That men who trace the dangerous waves Forget the mighty God who saves."

MR. EDITOR:—

Many thanks are due to your correspondent "Vocula," for calling the attention of the Church to the inaudible manner in which the responses are made in many congregations. If there is anything that tends to chill the spirit of devotion in the worship of God, it is this. But as much as our congregations are to be condemned on this score, there is an error on the part of many of our clergy, to which I would respectfully invite their attention, equally painful in its effects upon the feelings of the worshipper, and to which the cold and inarticulate responses of the congregations may perhaps in many instances be attributed. I allude to the manner in which they are hurried by the minister through their responses. It is not that there is any irreverent haste in pronouncing his part of the service, but in the Psalter and Litany, especially the latter, too many clergymen seem to forget that any allowance of time is to be made to their congregations. How often especially in the supplication to the adorable Trinity, with which the Litany commences, when the heart of the worshipper seems to be drawn into the very presence, as it were, of the incomprehensible "Majesty on High," is he suddenly and painfully called back to earth, by what always falls upon the ear like an impatient interruption on the part of the minister. The consequence is, that he is obliged to be always ready to hurry through the solemn alternation allotted him in the most undevout haste: and in many Churches, the people, knowing what they have to expect, if at all behind-hand, are in the habit of making a running start, as it were, and beginning the response before the minister finishes his sentence. Thus this sublime and reverent service is conducted as if it were a continual and breathless struggle between two contending parties for the privilege of being heard. I know that it is perhaps difficult for a minister to acquire the requisite degree of forbearance in this respect towards his congregation, especially if they be of that class so truthfully described by "Vocula;" but the evil is so great, and so contrary to the "decency and order" required in God's worship, that it seems well worthy of their serious attention. I know not to what extent it may prevail in the large cities, where more attention is given to the Liturgy and the proprieties of public worship; but living, as I do, on the outposts of the Church, I may truly say that this is a fault with at least three out of every four of the clergy of my acquaintance.

I trust that no one will regard this communication as at all disrespectful or presumptuous. It is a matter which a clergyman cannot correct, and of which he cannot even be aware, unless his attention is called to it by one of his audience.

MADISON, IND., JUNE 14TH, 1848.

REV. AND DEAR BROTHER.—As we trust that you feel a deep interest in the cause of our Redeemer, and of his Church in the West, we venture to appeal to your Christian sympathy in behalf of CHRIST CHURCH, MADISON.

This Parish, like almost all others in this Diocese, has hitherto been extremely feeble. Indiana, the fourth state in the Union, in regard to white population, has within its bounds but two Parishes of our Church, that are self-supporting. Madison, the second city in the State, with 7,000 inhabitants, has no Protestant Episcopal Church edifice. Less than three months ago, the then Missionary, reported the congregation of Christ Church, as embracing 35 adults, and 40 children, in 12 families. The present Rector entered upon his duties on the first of May last; and he believes with the vestry, that in one year from the consecration of a Church, such as the prospects of this growing city demand, we would have, by God's blessing, a congregation second to none in the Diocese. The one great obstacle to our growth, is our inability to erect a suitable house of worship. Compelled to hold our services in an inconvenient upper room, we can only secure the regular attendance of those who are already and in principle attached to our Church. We have a lot secured and paid for, in a well built section of the city, and at a distance from any Protestant house of worship. The Episcopal Church is looked upon kindly by Christians of other names, and by many not now interested in any Church. Some educated as Episcopalians, but alienated from us through various circumstances, will return to us as soon as we are on a permanent basis. Our Sunday School is steadily increasing, and when we can obtain suitable accommodations, is likely to be an important element in our prosperity. The few families now identified with us, are making vigorous exertions; and we hope to raise here more than one half of what we shall need; but the strength of our little Parish is largely tasked in the effort to sustain a minister, so that we must look abroad for help.

Our aims are moderate, whilst we would endeavor to provide for a growth which a reasonable faith leads us to anticipate; and this we cannot do without liberal assistance. To put up a small and temporary building would only embarrass us in the future. Our resolution on one point is firmly fixed; not to involve ourselves in debt. But we must have many free sittings. We must have, in this new country, pews with moderate rents. Help rendered to us now, we feel assured, will in a short time be returned ten fold to this Diocese, and to the more distant West.

Our Bishop, as it will be seen, appreciates our views, and sanctions this application. If our Bishop elect shall accept the Episcopate, it will gladden his heart and strengthen his hands for good, should we take away the reproach that we have no Church in the chief city of the Diocese.

Do something for us: according to your means, and according to your interest in Christ's cause in this great valley. Whatever your heart prompts you to give, or what you can obtain by collection, please remit by mail to either of the undersigned, or through

The time, I believe, has arrived when the Church can be fully established at Madison, in Indiana. The place is the most important in the State, and the few members who reside there have determined to exert themselves to the uttermost. Under these circumstances I cordially commend their effort; and trust they will be aided by their more favored brethren at the East, in the erection of a suitable house for public worship.

MR. EDITOR:—I have just read an article in the Banner of the 13th May, signed "Western," and find myself disposed to trouble you on the same subject. Your correspondent has touched a subject of some importance at this time. I say at this time, because, every where in the West, there are self sent preachers haranguing the people on this subject, pretending to settle the matter beyond doubt. It is but the fruit of schism going on from bad to worse.

I do not now intend to give you a history of this perversion of Scripture. My design in writing, is to express the opinion that "Western's" communication is not sufficiently conclusive, or will not appear so, to general readers; and also, to make a request which you can act on as your discretion shall decide. It is this,—that you will publish in the Banner, the vix chapters (inclusive) of Chapin's Primitive Church. This, you know, is a most scholarly work; and to my mind, more conclusive on the subject of Baptism, or, at least, on the questions, "Who are subjects?" and "What is the mode?" than any thing in print. His arguments are put up in such a manner as to be plain to the most simple, and at the same time, satisfactory to the most erudite. I could wish heartily that the author would give that part of his book, to the Church, in a separate form, to be used as a hand book, were it not that the whole work is so complete, that it would be almost injustice to put a portion of it to press without the rest.

I do not conceive that the Rev. author would object to such a step as I propose; seeing it would materially aid many missionaries who have not the work, and perhaps are ignorant of its excellence. I heartily wish the book in the hands of every member of the Church. On the subjects of Episcopacy and the Apostolical Succession, it is the most complete work in existence. I know that my endorsement goes for nothing, and is worth just the same; yet I do not fear being found at fault, especially as I have heard no other opinion of the work by those who have read it.

I pray, Mr. Editor, you will not think this any dictation as to the manner in which you shall discharge your duties. I disclaim such a thought. The Banner fully meets the expectations of all.

Submitting my suggestion to your judgment, I remain, truly yours, OZARK.

The following FORM OF THANKSGIVING FOR PEACE is set forth in conformity with Canon XLVII, of 1832, to be used in the Churches of the Diocese of Pennsylvania during the present and next following month.

ALONZO POTTER, Bishop, &c.

Philadelphia, June 19th, 1848.

Thanksgiving for Peace.

O Eternal God our Heavenly Father, in Whose hand are all power and might, we praise and magnify Thy glorious name, that Thou hast been pleased to restore to our land the blessings of peace. Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us but unto Thy name be all the praise. Give us grace, we beseech Thee, to improve this great mercy to Thy glory, the advancement of Thy gospel, the honour of our country, and as much as in us lieth, to the good of all mankind. Bestow upon us, also, such a just sense of all Thy great and manifold favours to our land, that we may show forth Thy praise by an humble, holy, and obedient walking before Thee all our days, through Jesus Christ our Lord, to Whom with Thee and the Holy Spirit, as for all Thy mercies so especially for this our deliverance from the evils of war, be all honour and glory world without end. Amen.

NEW MISSIONARY COLLEGE IN THE WEST.—The following account of "the Governor Clark Mission" in the Diocese of Missouri, will deeply interest our readers.

The happy results which have attended the successful establishment of "Nashotah," afford strong encouragement for similar efforts. Experience has taught our zealous and devoted Western Bishops that a Clergy for the West must be trained upon the field of their arduous and self-denying labors. All therefore who feel an interest in this land of promise for the Church, should do their utmost to sustain and encourage these Institutions. We have often expressed our sense of the claims which "Nashotah" has upon the liberality of all who desire to extend the Gospel in the Church throughout that region where the "laborers are few." We would now urge upon our readers this new call upon their charity.

Although the Bishop's letter was written "in haste," and only to furnish the facts which we might present to our readers, we prefer giving it just as it is. It comes warm from the heart, and will we trust, affect the hearts of all who are ready to feel the power of such an earnest demand from one of our chief Pastors. If any are thus moved to give aid, they can send their contributions directly to THE BISHOP, or through THE EDITOR OF THE BANNER.

St. Louis, June 12, 1848, }
Monday in Whitsun Week. }

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

I wrote to you a few days since, and then promised that I would soon write again, and say something of the Governor Clark Mission. I have now just returned from a visit to that Mission, and would redeem my promise.

You are aware, perhaps, that the Clark Mission is situated on 60 acres of land within a half mile of the town of Palmyra, in Marion county, in this State. The site was given to me by certain citizens of Marion county, for the contemplated mission, and a beautiful site it is. It is 150 miles from the city of St. Louis, and about six miles from the Mississippi river. My friend Mr. George R. Clark, of St. Louis, had prior to this gift, presented to me 333 acres of land in Montgomery county, in this State, for the Mission, but this site did not please us, and I availed myself of the proposal of the citizens of Marion, while at the same time I hold the gift of Mr. Clark, for the benefit of the Mission. Mr. Clark is the son of the earliest Governor of Missouri, and as a token of filial love and missionary gratitude, the Mission took its name, "the Governor Clark Mission."

Upon the grounds there is a dwelling-house, containing five rooms, and other out-houses. In addition to this accommodation, we have rented at an expense of $50 a year, another house containing as many more rooms, adjoining the lands of the Mission, for we found it impossible to proceed without it. In January last, I appointed the Rev. Wm. B. Corbyn, the Rector of the Mission, and on the 14th of February he was able to begin the enterprise. I rejoice greatly that I placed him at the post, for a better selection of a suitable man for the work contemplated, I do not think I could have found in the Church.

You know Nashotah, and the purposes of Nashotah, and therefore I need say nothing further of the purposes of our Mission, than that it is designed to be a younger sister of that excellent mission, Nashotah. Ours is intended to be (what thus far it has proved to be) a SELF-SUPPORTING MISSION. We require only the necessary buildings for carrying on our work, and then we take care of the work without demands upon our brethren elsewhere. If they find that the Mission shall deserve their endowments with their prayers, we shall be glad to receive them, for thereby our opportunities of usefulness will be greatly enlarged.

I was in the mission on my late visit, one week. I found there 27 boys under its instruction, 8 of whom are inmates of the house. The cost to the parent who places his boy there, is $125 per annum, while parents unable to pay this amount pay a less sum, and those unable to pay any sum, have the training of the mission for their child gratuitously. There are now two beneficiaries of this kind, in the establishment, and applications for young men and boys of each grade are numerous, but with our present limited room we cannot receive them.

As for the teaching in the Mission, it is decidedly the most thorough that I have ever seen in any place. We purpose fitting the inmates for "that station of life to which it shall please God to call them," and you may judge of the mode in which we seek to accomplish this, when I tell you of the daily routine at the Mission.

At 8 o'clock, A. M., all the students are assembled, and the daily service of the Church is read. After this they enter upon their daily studies, and these are continued (with the intermission of a half hour) till 3 o'clock, P. M. They are then employed in works of out-door industry, and the garden and grounds of the mission tell of that industry. At 6 o'clock the Evening service of the Church is read, and after this they are employed in out-door work again, or in preparing their lessons for the coming morning. It is delightful in these daily services of our Holy Church, to mark the spirit of our boys, and as their voices mingle in chanting the anthems and appropriate psalms, no choir could awaken more devotional feeling. I do not know that I ever felt the power and loveliness of this part of our Church services, so much as in the mission. The chants of the Church seem to be the life of the boys, and not unfrequently during the hours of out-door work you will hear on the mission grounds the chanting of portions of the psalter. In fact as you approach the Mission, the first sound that you will probably hear will be the chanting of some song of praise of our Holy Church.

At 9 o'clock, P. M., the inmates are again called to the prayers of the house, before retiring. One of the Psalms of David is chanted, and then with the Lord's Prayer an appropriate collect and the benediction by the Rector, they retire for the night. This last service is strikingly solemn and beautiful.

Thus you have the daily routine, and what may we not hope from such a course of discipline in the Church? And yet we are in our infancy, have barely commenced our good work.—May God give us grace to carry it on as we should!

I have said that we have constant applications for admission which we are compelled to refuse for want of room. This must not be. The Mission was begun in faith, and in faith we shall prosecute it. God who in his mercy put it into my heart to set forth my purpose, has put it in the hearts of some already to aid in this blessed work. I have faith to believe that he will still reach the hearts of others. A wilderness is around us. Would that all the more highly privileged members of Christ's Holy Church might see it! We will work for Christ's sake, we will trust the good Lord, but we ask for their prayers and their sympathies.

More room I must provide, and "the Chapel of the Disciples" must be built. My boys call for it, and the little village adjoining must have it. Trusting that the good Lord will raise up friends for this Mission, I am forced this season, if possible, to erect the school-room and dormitory. The self-denying Rector, is there, and there he will remain at his post. He works for no reward, except God's blessing upon his earnest labours, and that blessing we feel assured he will find. We work by faith, not by sight. Faith is the capital of the Mission.

I send this sheet to you because I think you feel an interest in our work, seeing that we are one in the bonds of a Catholic love.

If you see fit you may with these facts before you, speak of the Clark Mission, and let the friends in the East know what our work is, and how we are struggling to accomplish it.

Praying always that God may bless you, and all the brethren everywhere, I am my dear Sir, in haste,

Yours, most affectionately,

Bishop C. S. HAWKS.

To the Editor of the Banner of the Cross, Philadelphia.

P. S. I had forgotten to mention that on Sunday, June 4th, in the village of Palmyra I confirmed four persons, one of them an inmate of the Mission.

We are much indebted to the kind correspondent who has favored us with the following intelligence.

DIocese of MISSISSIPPI.—BISHOP OTEY'S FINAL VISITATION.—May 14. At Christ Church, Jefferson county, the Bishop confirmed seven persons, and instituted the Rector, Rev. David Kerr.

May 18. At St. Mary's Church, Laurel Hill, (Rev. T. S. Savage, Rector,) confirmed four persons.

May 28. At Trinity Church, Natchez, (Rev. Wm. M. Giles, Rector,) baptized ten adults and twenty children, and confirmed twenty-eight persons. The Rector was instituted.

At Christ's Church, Vicksburg, (Rev. S. Patterson, Rector,) confirmed twenty-two persons.

June 1. Preached at Clinton, at 11 o'clock, A. M., and at Jackson, at 8 o'clock.

June 3. Confirmed at St. Andrew's, Jackson, six persons.

June 2. At Brandon, the Bishop preached, baptized an adult, and confirmed two.

June 4. At St. James', Canton, confirmed three persons.

June 6. At St. Andrew's, Kirkwood, (Rev. E. H. Downing, Rector,) confirmed six persons.

June 8. Preached at Lexington.

June 11. Consecrated Trinity Church, Yazoo City, and preached at 11 o'clock. In the afternoon the Rector (Rev. Dr. Camp) baptized six adults, and six children. The Bishop preached, and confirmed nine persons.

It is proper to state that, with two exceptions, all the parishes above-mentioned are new; until very recently the Church services had never been heard in their bounds. This fact shows that the Church in Mississippi has every thing to encourage her laborers. Eight new parishes were added at the recent Annual Convention: and had we men of the true stamp, as many more, perhaps, might be added at our next Convention. In many places in the State, where a number of Church families have settled together, they are anxious to procure a pastor, and are ready and willing to give him a liberal support. Under the good providence of God, our late loved Bishop, and his pastors have witnessed the fruits of their labors; and now behold the Church in this State, in peace and prosperity, and blessed with no little strength and energy. Our greatest need now is, a successor to Bishop Otey; one who, like him, will combine fervent piety, fine learning, practical skill, and an unfaltering zeal in the work of his Master. Such a man will find that much of the labor of organizing, enlarging, and edifying a new Diocese has already been accomplished—that the Church is upon a sure and good foundation—possessed of a laborious Clergy, and a body of intelligent, zealous, and faithful laity, such as is rarely to be met with in any Diocese. With unrelaxed efforts the Church may hope, within a few years, to double its present resources. All things seem propitious.—God has blessed us: and walking in the old path of EVANGELICAL TRUTH and APOSTOLIC ORDER, we expect the continuance of his blessing.

Foreign Intelligence.

The English Church Papers contain a full and interesting account of the annual meeting of the National Society of Education.

The English Churchman thus speaks of this meeting.

The Annual Meeting of the National Society which was held yesterday was, probably, the most stormy which has been witnessed for some years, and we trust that it was such a storm as will clear the atmosphere, and give us good bracing weather for some time to come.

The following items we extract from the (London) Guardian.

We understand that St. Augustine's College, Canterbury, will be opened on St. Peter's Day. From the very confined dimensions of the chapel it will be impossible that many can be present at its consecration but those who are specially invited. His Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury has, however, most kindly consented to preach the consecration sermon during the morning service of the cathedral, which will be postponed to an hour sufficiently late to allow of the presence of those who come from London by the morning train. The collection will be devoted to the furtherance of the undertaking. Afterwards the college will be opened, when there will be a luncheon. We are informed that all clergymen who show their cards will be admitted into the college on this occasion. The afternoon service will also be postponed to a late hour.

The ceremonial of laying the foundation stones of Linsdale and Seghill new churches, took place on Wednesday last, the former by the Bishop of Oxford, the latter by John Carr, Esq. Seghill Church is to contain 530 sittings, 426 of which are to be free.

The installation of the Bishop of Chester is to take place on the 16th inst., in the cathedral of the diocese.

The Oxford Herald states that the Rev. Dr. Hinds, chaplain to the Archbishop of Dublin, is to be the new Bishop of Cork and Cloyne.

Rev. Dr. Rudd

THE GOSPEL MESSENGER GETTING WARM.—The last person we should ever suspect of getting into a heat is the Editor of the Gospel Messenger. Though not the "oldest inhabitant," he is certainly the oldest Editor in the Church. And though in all respects he sets a good example to his younger brethren, in none is he more pre-eminent than in showing them the advantages of keeping cool. The only adversary who can make the Doctor warm is the atmosphere. And even of this he discourses in the following cool and dispassionate manner. Such an editorial is better than a load of Rockland ice! But if they call it warm in Utica at 90 degrees, what must it be in Philadelphia at 100 degrees? One thing we are resolved upon, that is to eschew all controversial subjects during the dog days. We fear lest some of the atmospheric heat may find its way into our editorials. We think it enough for our readers to suffer from the heat of the weather, without being excited by the heat of newspapers! But we must not keep our readers any longer from the cool reflections of the Gospel Messenger.

THE COLD AND THE HEAT.—For a week or ten days preceding the 15th inst., the cold was very severe for the season, frost occurred several times, and the winds were very high.—Friday, Saturday and Sunday last, were intensely hot. The mercury in our very coolest position stood through most of the 17th, from 83 to 90 degrees, being at the former, 83 degrees, at six o'clock, P. M. The nights were very unfavorable to refreshing sleep. For several hours on Sunday, the thermometer declared 90 degrees. In other parts of the city, we understand the mercury was much higher than with us.

Our neighbor of the Gazette, can talk very pleasantly and well on the transition from Cloaks to Ice Creams, of which he has lots to his taste, and all those matters; but for ourselves, we must be content to talk in humble phrase, and to say in praise of Him, "who hath made Summer and Winter," that we rely on His promise, as expressed in the language of the Psalmist, (Psalm cxxi. 6.)

"The Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand; the sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night."

The lovely Bishop Horne, who knew and enjoyed much of nature, and more still of grace, makes the following remarks upon this passage, and it is worthy of a Christian's notice.—"The meaning is," says he, "that the good man, during his journey through life, shall be under God's protection at all seasons; as the Israelite in the wilderness, was defended from the burning heat of the sun, by the moist and refreshing shadow of the cloud; and secured against the inclement influences of the nocturnal heavens, by the kindly warmth and splendor diffused from the pillar of fire. Be thou with us, thy servants, O Lord: in the world, as thou wast with Israel, in the wilderness; suffer not our virtue to dissolve before the sultry heat of prosperity; permit it not to be frozen by the chilling blasts of adversity."

Let the feelings and piety of this excellent prelate be those of our hearts, and "frost and hail, and snow, fulfilling His word," will be all the same to us.

The Rev. Dr. Williams and the Editor of the Calendar were correct in stating that Trench on the MIRACLES had not been re-published in this country. With an obtuseness somewhat miraculous, we confounded the above work with Appleton's "beautiful re-publication" of Trench on the PARABLES!

Convention of Tennessee.

A correspondent from Knoxville has sent us the following in reference to the place of meeting of this Convention.

"I noticed some weeks since that you published that the Convention of this Diocese would meet in West Tennessee on some day previous to this date. In this you are mistaken. It will meet at this place on the third Thursday (20th) of July next."

NEW AGENT.—The Rev. J. Elliot Thompson has kindly consented to act as Agent for the "Banner" at Paterson, New Jersey.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.—The Editor of the Banner gratefully acknowledges the receipt of $10, from an unknown correspondent, to be appropriated "to the use of the poor Widows and Orphans in this city." This donation shall be faithfully applied as directed, and we are sure the prayers which their charitable benefactor entreats will be duly offered and graciously answered by that "Father who seeth in secret."

The Editor also acknowledges from X. the receipt of $1, to be applied to the relief of any "poor Church in this Diocese."

Connecticut Convention.

The proceedings of the first day, Tuesday, were contained in our last.

On Wednesday morning, Convention was opened with Divine service, read by the Rev. Mr. Cornwall, assisted in the lessons by the Rev. J. H. Nichols, and with a sermon by the Rev. Mr. Bronson, from 1 Cor. iv. 3, 4. Thomas R. Pynchon, formerly a tutor in Trinity College, was ordained Deacon. The Bishop was assisted in the Litany and the Holy Communion, by the Rev. Dr. Mead, and in the administration of the latter by the Rev. Dr. Totten, who also presented the candidate, and the Rev. Messrs. Cornwall, J. H. Nichols, and Cook.

After the religious services were concluded, the Convention commenced the transaction of business.

The Rev. Junius M. Willey was appointed assistant Secretary.

Rules of order were adopted; several additional lay delegates admitted to seats; the Reports of the Standing Committee, of the Treasurer of the Society for Promotion of Christian Knowledge; of the Treasurer of the Convention; and of the Fund for aged and infirm Clergymen, were read, and the usual committees appointed.

Adjourned to 2½ o'clock, P. M.

Wednesday afternoon.

Some additional lay delegates admitted to their seats, the roll called, and other preliminary business transacted.

A new parish, by the name of St. Thomas' Church, New Haven, was admitted into union with the Convention.

The Bishop then delivered his annual address, which will be found in our columns to-day.

That portion of the address which relates to the Christian Knowledge Society, our Diocesan Missionary Society, was referred to a committee.

The election of the Standing Committee of the Diocese then took place, and the following gentlemen were chosen with great unanimity:—The Rev. Drs. Croswell, Jarvis, Mead, Rev. Robert A. Hallam, Rev. J. L. Clark.

The Parochial Reports were presented without being read.

The two Committees appointed last year on the Seabury Monument, made their reports, from which it appears that the requisite sum of money has not yet been obtained, and the work has not been accomplished. The Committees were continued; and it is hoped that, within another year, through their instrumentality, an altar-tomb to our first Bishop, from a design by Upjohn, will adorn the new St. James', at New London.

After some other proceedings of lesser moment, the Convention adjourned till 8 o'clock the next morning.

Thursday.

Convention met at 8 o'clock, A. M.

Morning prayer by the Rev. Jas. Mackay, assisted in the lessons by the Rev. S. G. Hitchcock.

The Rev. Mr. Watson, Chairman of the Committee appointed to consider that portion of the Bishop's Address which related to the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, made a report, recommending the passage of a Canon, the effect of which would be to assess on the several parishes a sum equal to the wants of the Society. The matter was laid over till the next Convention for final action. Meanwhile, an advisory committee of two from each county, was appointed to co-operate with the Bishop and Standing Committee, in arranging plans, and making estimates for the operations of the Society for the present year. It is understood that this three-fold Committee will, at an early date, issue a circular, announcing what missionary operations are to be undertaken, and what amount of contributions from each parish will be its proportion for their accomplishment. The Convention then resolved itself into the Church Scholarship Society, and transacted the business of that Society. An amendment to the Constitution, in reference to the admission of the Clergy to seats in the Convention, was, after an animated discussion, approved and laid over to the next Convention for final action. The effect of the amendment would be to admit all the clergy to seats in the first instance, and afterwards to enumerate disqualifying circumstances.

After singing the 107th Selection of Psalms, the Bishop dismissed the Convention with Prayer and Benediction, at 12 o'clock.

From the Address of Bishop Brownell, to his Convention, 1848.

MY BRETHREN OF THE CLERGY AND OF THE LAITY:

At the present annual meeting of our Diocesan Convention, I have little to lay before you, except the stated canonical report of my Episcopal Acts for the past year; and the reiterated acknowledgment of the goodness of God, which has so long been extended to that portion of His Church committed to our care. During the past year, death has not been permitted to diminish the number of our clergy. The wonted degree of peace and harmony continues to prevail throughout the Diocese. The Church presents a healthful aspect of external prosperity, and we trust there has been no decline in her spiritual condition.

Since the last annual Convention, the holy rite of Confirmation has been administered in fifty-four parishes, to 541 persons.

The precarious tenure of the connexion between our clergy and their parishes constitutes one of the greatest evils in the condition of our portion of the Church. The frequent changes and removals which occur, are alike injurious to the interests of the clergy and the people. The larger parishes of the diocese are indeed happily exempted from this inconvenience. But in the weaker parishes, where the wasted strength can barely support a clergyman, the defection of only one or two families, either from private pique, or from the hope of obtaining a more popular preacher, frequently renders it necessary for the pastor to resign. Now a long observation has convinced me, that in a large portion of these removals, neither the clergyman nor the parish is benefitted by the change. It is almost the only discouraging circumstance in the condition of the diocese, that during the past year these changes have been more numerous than usual.

Among the most noticeable facts in the present condition of the diocese, we may refer to the advancements in ecclesiastical architecture, and to the zeal and liberality evinced in the erection and improvement of churches.

On the 12th of January last, I consecrated the new granite edifice in Waterbury, then just completed, by the name of St. John's Church. This noble building is from plans furnished by Austin, of New Haven, and is now the most perfect church edifice in the diocese. Two other noble churches, of freestone, are now in process of erection, the one in Norwich, and the other in New London. Both are from plans by Upjohn. The former is fully enclosed, and will probably be ready for consecration in the autumn. The corner stone of the latter was laid by the Bishop of Rhode Island, acting on my behalf, on the 3d of November last, and the edifice will be enclosed in the course of the summer. When these churches are completed, they will probably be more artistic and imposing than those at Waterbury. On the 31st day of May, I laid the corner stone of a church to be erected in the new parish of Stonington, to be called Calvary Church. The building is to be of granite, and the plan is by Upjohn. Another new and spacious freestone church is being erected in the parish of Meriden, the corner stone having been laid, with due solemnities, on Thursday last. On the 17th of last August, I laid the corner stone of a church in the new parish at Winsted, and the building is now nearly ready for consecration. Another new church is also in progress of erection in the parish of New Britain; and still another at Nicholl's Farms, near Bridgeport.

I think it proper to record, in this place, that another Bishop has been added to our Church during the past year, to preside over the Diocese of Maine—the Right Rev. George Burgess, D.D.; and that I assisted at his consecration in Christ Church, Hartford, on the 31st day of October last, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Chase, of Illinois, presiding.

BRETHREN OF THE CONVENTION:

In my last year's address, I called your attention, with some earnestness, to the Christian Knowledge Society, as the most efficient instrumentality for promoting the extension of the Church, and advancing the spiritual prosperity of the diocese. My visitations during the autumn of last year, and the spring of this, have satisfied me that the religious condition of the state has not, for several years, presented so auspicious a period for the success of such an agency. I will now only suggest to you, that after providing means for sustaining a few of the weakest existing parishes, a strong effort should be made for carrying the services of the church, with their attendant blessings, to some of the more populous parts of the state, where they are not yet known, and particularly to such new manufacturing villages as are most destitute of religious instruction.

In my last annual address, I also called the attention of the Convention to the efforts which had been made to increase the efficiency of Trinity College. It is impossible to overrate the importance of this Institution to the welfare of the Church. It has already done efficient service, but I trust we have seen only the first dawning of the light and influence which shall mark its future progress. In recommending its interests to your fostering care, we must not be unmindful of the Episcopal Academy at Cheshire, and the private institutions of the diocese, under episcopal auspices, all of which are eminently subsidiary to the cause of sound learning in the church.

BRETHREN:—It is not my design to add any thing to what I have said on former occasions, concerning the General Institutions of the Church. You must be well aware of the influence of these institutions on its prosperity, and in the maintaining of pure religion in our land. Neither is it my intention, at this time, to offer any new remarks on the present condition and future prospects of the church. You are fully acquainted with my views on these subjects; and I have seen no reason to change them. Our duty, however, is ever the same; to exercise, each in our respective stations, a watchful care over the welfare of the church; sedulous to preserve the purity and integrity of its faith, and to illustrate the renovating influence of its doctrine and institutions by the purity and holiness of our lives.

Calendar.

The Bishop of Maryland's Address to the Sixtieth Annual Convention.

Of Schools not diocesan, but managed strictly on the principles of the Church, we have St. John's Institute, near Georgetown, for boys, and the Hannah More Academy for girls, both excellently well conducted. Of the former the Rev. Mr. Ten Broeck, late of the diocese of New Jersey, has taken charge, and if thorough qualifications and unwearied diligence, with a well established reputation, can ensure success, will not fail of it. In the Hannah More Academy, Mrs. Lyons is receiving her well earned reward in a steady growth of the school, and in the realization of her best hopes in the development of its influence on the scholars, six of whom have been confirmed and admitted to communion within the year. Of the Landon Female Institute under the Rev. Mr. Phillips, I have received no report and had no personal knowledge within the year; but I believe it to be going on successfully, and still deserving the approbation heretofore expressed to the Convention. Ingleside school for girls, near Catonsville; Rock Hall Institute at Ellicott's Mills for boys; and several more or less strictly parochial schools for one or both of the sexes, deserve more than the mere mention of their existence, which alone I am able to make in this address. But even studied brevity would not excuse me for passing by the male and female schools established in Baltimore for the education of the children residents in that city under the superintendence of the Church. St. Mary's Hall, for girls, was established at my instance by Mr. and Mrs. Sargeant, in the autumn of 1846, and has been ever since slowly but surely earning for itself support and reputation. Trinity School, under the Rev. Mr. Riley and Mr. Hamilton, opened last September, and has filled up with a rapidity surpassing the expectations but not the deserts of its founders.

These day schools, in connexion with our College and boarding schools, complete the provisions of the Church in this diocese, for the higher kind of education for her children. We yet want schools of a lower grade of expense, and proportionally inferior pretensions, for the multitudes who cannot afford the price of the first class. Whether parochial or general, or both, they might be had, and well maintained, at the outlay of a little effort, if the sense of duty and clear views of its direction, were sufficiently strong among us. It is cheering to perceive, at present, that the tendency is in the right direction. I trust it will not be very long before a still more general agreement among the sons of the Church, as to the propriety and necessity of providing among ourselves for the training of all our youth, of every station in society, for eternity as well as the duties of this life will enable us to institute and effectually carry on a complete series of Church Schools, from the College down to the charity and infant school, and House of Refuge. In order to that most desirable result, union and hearty co-operation is all we need. Am I asking too much of you, brethren, when I entreat you, laying aside individual preferences and aims, to work together zealously, each in his station and sphere of influence doing all he can, for so good a cause?

The mention of union and co-operation, and the preference of the general good to private views and inclinations, naturally suggests a reference to our diocesan paper. It continued to be edited until near the close of the second volume, with his wonted ability and energy, by the Rev. Mr. Franklin. A change in his other engagements having compelled him to resign the charge, I have been happy enough to obtain the valuable services of the Rev. Mr. Van Bokkelen, in order to the continuance of the paper. I am daily more sensible of the importance of its maintenance to the prosperity of the diocese, in which its general circulation will keep up and extend a unity of feeling and action, a lively interest of the parts in each other and the whole a prevalent sympathy and harmony, to which nothing else will tend so directly or so effectually. The agency of my brethren of the clergy in bringing about a general circulation of the paper such as is absolutely necessary for its support and usefulness in the desired way, has already been besought in a private circular. I now address myself to you, laymen of Maryland, and ask you, for the love of peace and prosperity in our borders, as you desire the consolidation and extension of the Church among you, to lend me your aid in this undertaking, here and at home by your own subscriptions and by the use of your influence with your friends and neighbours, to assist in providing a means of circulating ecclesiastical intelligence and profitable religious reading in every parish and neighbourhood in the diocese.

Of our missionary doings in the past year, I have little to say that is encouraging. In compliance with a request of each of the Committees of the General Board of Missions of the Church and with a resolution of the House of Bishops, I addressed Pastoral Letters to the diocese, recommending collections for the Domestic Missions on a Sunday in Advent, and for the Foreign Missions on a Sunday after Epiphany. The recommendations were pretty generally complied with, and, I believe, with results equalling the average returns from other dioceses. That such special efforts should have been needed, is matter of painful reflection. It will be still more so, if, as I fear, there should have been a subsequent general relapse into former inattention to the duty of regular contributions to these branches of the work of the Church.

Such inattention to a still more obvious and binding duty, the prosecution of missionary efforts in needy parts of our own diocesan field called forth from your Board of Missions, not long since, a request for a Pastoral Letter on the subject to the Diocese. It was accordingly addressed; and has met in some instances with a most gratifying and prompt response; in most of the parishes and congregations, as I hope and believe, (although the returns do not yet show it,) with willing assent to the proposed collection. I wish the limits of this communication allowed me to enter upon a statement of the reasons why the diocese should be up and doing in provision for its many neglected, or decayed parishes, feeble congregations, and untouched wastes. A tale might be told, of destitution on the part of brethren of your household, of the stranger brought in to dwell among you, and of the wretchedly ignorant and poor; and of corresponding fearful responsibility for their condition resting upon you; that would startle the most indifferent, and sound too large to find easy belief. Yet of the eight clergymen that are doing missionary work under appointment of the Ecclesiastical authority, five receive no assistance from the Diocesan Board, and several of the vacant clergy, who would gladly labor wherever they were sent, remain idle for want of provision for their maintenance at some missionary post. How long shall this disgraceful state of things continue? How long shall we be asked for bread, and give our brethren stones? I am persuaded that the disposition to do right in this matter prevails amongst us, extensively and strongly. The liberal heart that deviseth liberal things is not wanting to the laity of Maryland. But for want of efficient organization and uniform action, liberality and zeal are smothered in the bud, and every branch of the working of the Church for the extension of its public services, multiplication of its means of grace, consolidation of its discipline, and dissemination within itself and around it, of the knowledge of its doctrines and distinctive principles, must be reported as yet lamentably deficient in most parts of the diocese. For improvement in this respect, much depends upon the parochial clergy, with whom all that is well and properly done, must originate, and by them be guided and directed. But they need the stay of some central action beginning here, and can never be expected to work together vigorously and harmoniously, except in a mode devised and sanctioned by this body. To the Convention, then, I look for the development of the energy of the Church in all that is necessary, as material and machinery, for her inner and outer growth. Provision for missions, for the distribution of the Bible, the Book of Common Prayer and Homilies and religious tracts, and for the encouragement and support of Sunday Schools, and if there be any other good work, parochial or diocesan, for that too, must be made here, to be general and effective. Until it is made here, we shall have, as heretofore, you to near, and I to tell a miserable tale of neglected duty and work undone.

At present the distribution of the Prayer Book in the diocese is continued as before reported to the Convention, by the Prayer Book and Homily Society of Maryland, the funds being obtained by offerings collected at my visitations. A few excellent ladies in Baltimore are going on, as they have done for many years, to employ the scanty sum they are able to gather by personal applications and receive from the contributions of a very few parishes, in the publication of religious tracts suited to the wants of our people and demands of the clergy. They have for some time stereotyped all they publish, and are thus gradually accumulating a stock of plates which will enable them to keep always on hand a supply of all their publications. The want of a depository in which these might be always accessible, together with a full supply of the extensive series of tracts of the New York Prot. Epis. Tract Society and of the truly excellent and useful publications of the General Sunday School Union of the Church, is much felt. That the demand for all these means of nourishment and growth for the Church is steadily increasing is a favorable indication of healthful energy; but it makes the want of suitable provision for its supply more pressing, and the duty of taking measures to that effect more bounden.

The consecrations of churches in the past year have been both remarkable. The first at Easton, of Christ Church in St. Peter's Parish Talbot county, was the consummation of an effort among the most energetic and praiseworthy that have been at any time made in the diocese. The erection of a stone church in Easton, substantial, roomy and well adorned, not only neat but beautiful, without remaining debt, and without relinquishing the former church, still used for sacred purposes, is a triumph of enterprise, liberality and perseverance on the part of all concerned in the undertaking, which deserves especial commemoration and all our thanks, as an example by which every other part of the diocese may be profited. A goodly assemblage of the clergy from both shores were partakers together in the joy of their beloved brother on the day of the crowning of his long deferred hopes and many labors, and returned I am sure, feeling with me, that it was good to have gone up to the Lord's house with His rejoicing people, and to have seen how He had prospered those who labored for the glory of His Name in humble diligence and faith.

The other consecration was of a much humbler edifice, but not less beautiful, and equally remarkable as a proof how much can be accomplished by a few zealous spirits unwearied in labor and of unshrinking faith. St. John's Church, Huntingdon, Baltimore county, on the York road, near this city, is in my estimation the most strictly correct and chaste ecclesiastical edifice in the diocese. It is, to be sure, small and unexpensive, but it is also substantial, and if unpretending, yet in every respect of the very best materials, design and finish that were attainable with the amount of expenditure that was practicable. It occupies new ground, being erected by a congregation formed with the last four years. Under its present indefatigable rector, the congregation is making growth if not rapid, yet very sound and sure, and nowhere among us is the beauty of holiness in the devout participation of our solemn services more regularly and heartily exemplified than in its house of worship.

To the details which have been now submitted, I have found occasion to add little in the way of general remark. Quietness and harmony have prevailed among us in a great degree. May their prevalence continually increase! In order to that, may we ever more and more commit our way unto the Lord, in simplicity and godly sincerity serving Him, holding fast the faithful word as we have been taught, speaking the truth in love, and so growing up into Him in all things, which is the Head, even Christ, from whom the whole Body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the Body unto the edifying of itself in love.

WILLIAM ROLLINSON WHITTINGHAM,
Baltimore, May, 31st, 1848. Bishop of Maryland.

O Almighty God, Which hast prepared everlasting life to all those that be Thy faithful servants: grant unto us, Lord, sure hope of the life everlasting, that we being in this miserable world, may have some taste and feeling of it in our hearts, and that, not by our deserving, but by the merits and deserving of our Saviour and Lord, Jesus Christ. Amen.

From the New York Churchman.

During the sitting of the New Jersey Convention last week, in Newark, there were admitted into union with it three different parishes, two of them (St. Philip and St. Matthew) from the city of Newark itself. Both of them were admitted under circumstances of unusual interest. The one was composed entirely of persons of African descent, and against their admission not a single objection was urged, not a single voice was heard. The circumstances are worthy of note, as illustrative of the right-onward Scriptural policy pursued in the Diocese. All felt that as sinners redeemed by the blood of the same Saviour the members of St. Philip's Parish had a right to be represented in the "Councils of Christ's Church," as they had the hope of being admitted into the same heaven.

The admission of St. Matthew's Church, a German congregation, was under circumstances of still greater interest. Their former pastor had been educated in Göttingen, Hanover, and had gathered quite a large congregation under the name of Evangelical Protestants, holding doctrines similar to those of the Church of England. For the last year, however, he had from time to time attended the services of the Church, of which he had previously known something in his native country, and was drawn more and more towards her, until his mind attained a conviction of the apostolic origin of her ministry. Relinquishing at once the exercise of his former pastoral functions, he applied to the Bishop for a license as lay reader, and is now one of the candidates for orders in the Diocese. The greater part of his former congregation have followed him into the Church, and attend regularly upon the services which he conducts as lay reader in the German language. About fifty families have signified their desire and intention to do so by a written pledge; and some twenty or thirty more are regarded as members of the congregation. In the last three or four months he has been preparing an interesting class of young persons for confirmation; and on Thursday evening during the sitting of the Convention, they were admitted to that apostolic rite by the Bishop in Trinity Church, being recommended thereto by the Rector. The following notice of the service is taken from the Newark Daily Advertiser: "During the evening service the Bishop confirmed thirteen persons belonging to the German congregation in this city who have lately conformed to the Episcopal Church. The whole service with the exception of the chants, &c., was in the German language, and performed by the Rev. Mr. Cook, a Missionary in New York. He also preached a sermon in the same language. No one could hear without being impressed with the power and grandeur of that language as a vehicle for prayer. The whole service was exceedingly imposing; and the attention and interest of the Germans, and especially the reverent behaviour of the youthful class, was very gratifying."

An interesting circumstance relating to one of the candidates, a young girl, will serve to show the feelings and the fitness of the whole class. She had come down to the city, week after week, a distance of ten miles from the residence of her father, for whom (her mother being dead) she kept house, in order to be instructed in the doctrines and duties of our holy religion. During the whole course, she had manifested the utmost religious sensibility, and it was to her a joy long waited for when on that evening she had the privilege of renewing and ratifying her baptismal engagements under the blessing of Apostolic hands. But ere the following Sunday, the ordinary season for Communion in the churches, she must of necessity return to her aged and infirm father; and yet she felt she could not go without partaking of the memorials of her Saviour's broken body and shed blood. Her request, made known through her former Pastor, was at once complied with; and on Saturday morning, in Trinity Church, the tolling of the bell having called two or three together, the Rector after Morning Prayer, administered to her, in her own language, the Holy Communion. Then, and not before, was she ready to return to her waiting father and tell him the great things the Lord had done for her soul. "Gentle, grateful, humble girl! the blessing of God go with thee! Would that more were like thee!"

M. H. H.

At the conclusion of the services, many of the members of this congregation gathered around the Chancel, and were introduced to the Bishop. Their whole manner evinced the unusual interest which they felt on the occasion.

"A great door and effectual" seems thus to be "opened" in our growing city, to a class of citizens, upon whom the Church, heretofore, has been able to exert but little influence. There are, it is supposed, at this present moment, drawn hither by the reputation of Newark for its manufactures, in which they themselves have no little skill, upwards of five thousand native Germans. All these, with the exception of those who are wedded to the errors of the Roman Catholic system, embracing not more than one quarter of the whole number, are drawn more or less strongly towards the Church. They have observed in their Fatherland the same Ecclesiastical Year. All the Festivals and Fasts of the Church are perfectly familiar to them. Christmas and Epiphany, and Ash Wednesday, and the Fast of Lent, and Good Friday, and Easter Sunday, and Ascension Day, and Whitsunday, are with them as "household words," and observed by them most religiously. The Holy Rite of Confirmation is prized by them as a most precious privilege—without which, and the blessings which they believe accompanies it—they are unwilling that their children should go out from the parental roof, and from under the parental eye—to the business of life; while in sickness and in death, it is their joy and comfort to receive the Holy Communion of the body and blood of

* The services held on Thursday Evening, June 1st, in Trinity Church, during the sitting of the Convention, on which occasion the Bishop administered the rite of Confirmation.

Christ.—The writer himself has administered it to one of their numbers—since gone to her rest—under such circumstances; and he can truly say, he never saw more unfeigned humility, more lively faith, or deeper gratitude. And for all these things they seek in vain—with the single exception, perhaps of the Lutherans—among the different Protestant sects by whom they are surrounded.

The deepest interest is felt in the welfare of this congregation by the Resident Clergy, and, indeed, by the whole Convention. Several services have been held for them in Grace Church, of this city, in which Rev. Mr. Watson, the Rector, was present, and participated; and the first service in the German language was performed by Rev. Mr. Lowell, the zealous and laborious missionary, who is successfully engaged in establishing a "Free Mission Church" in a destitute section of the city. His knowledge of the language was, under these circumstances, of unusual interest and promise—contributing much to the present auspicious results. On Easter Sunday, Divine Service was celebrated, and the Holy Communion administered by Rev. Dr. Ver Mehr, of St. Mary's Hall, Burlington, to about thirty communicants.

To Rev. Mr. Cook, of St. Simon's (German), New York, we feel largely indebted for the active interest which he has manifested, and especially, for the appropriate and impressive sermon which he preached on the occasion of the Confirmation. When will the Churchmen of New York awake up to their responsibility in regard to the German population among themselves? There are, it is said, above sixty thousand in that one city, chiefly of the poorer classes; and yet the doors of but one Church are open for them—a building hardly suitable for the purpose—while the Minister himself, abundant as he is in the labors of his ministerial office, is obliged, in order to support his family, to attend to the arduous duties of a daily school! Where is there a better missionary field? Is it not "white already to Harvest?"—M. H. H. Rev. Matthew W. Henderson

Thy Will be Done.

Being accustomed from our infancy to repeat the Lord's Prayer, we are too apt to offer up the petitions without considering their exact import, their comprehensiveness, and the practical duties involved in them. If, after considering the latitude of its meaning, and instituting a candid and scrutinizing examination of our hearts, we can unreservedly offer up the petition, "thy will be done," it will be the surest test of the divine life in our souls. We are not only to be resigned to the Divine will in the great events of life, but, if we recognize a particular Providence, we must exercise a spirit of acquiescence, as well as resignation in all the minor trials and vexations which encompass us. We see many bear the darkest, most mysterious and agonizing dispensations with un murmuring fortitude, who are continually fretting at trifles. In the family Morning Prayer we say, "grant us patience under any afflictions thou shalt see fit to lay on us, and minds always contented with our present condition." None are exempt from afflictions, but do we not aggravate them by riveting our attention upon them, to the exclusion of the consideration of our mercies? God appoints each one of us the cross we most require, and the one we most reluctantly carry: and yet, I believe, hereafter, we shall all gratefully acknowledge that we would have selected that sancifying cross, from which we now wish to be released. We would be more resigned to the will of God, if we would more frequently take a retrospective view of the past events of our lives. How often would the gratification of our apparently innocent and reasonable wishes have eventuated in our temporal misery, perhaps in our eternal ruin! We all resemble the self-willed child who substituted my for thy, whenever she repeated this prayer. "My will be done!" How shocking the expression looks in writing! But if we use the microscope of truth, we will observe that the spirit of rebellion has written it in legible characters on all our hearts. We do not offer up this petition in filial love and confidence, but often in despair, because we know we must submit, and cannot resist his will. Children who have been habituated, from their early childhood, to submit to parental authority, from reverence for the wisdom and virtues of the authors of their existence, and confidence in their love, will find it much easier cheerfully to acquiesce in the Divine will, than others who have been allowed to follow the "devices and desires of their own hearts," without restraint. In the domestic manège there are innumerable petty trials and vexations to exercise and improve the Christian graces of patience and forbearance: in all the business transactions of life, we will be tried with the fraud, imposition, and over reaching of the covetous and unprincipled: in our social intercourse we will come in contact with those who are not only uncongenial, but peculiarly disagreeable and annoying to us, and even in our Church associations, we shall not be exempted from trials. Instead of indulging in a querulous and discontented disposition, it is the will of God, that we should exercise the "wisdom of the serpent, united to the harmlessness of the dove." Thomas a Kempis says we are not what we wish to be ourselves, how can we expect others to be what we wish them to be in regard to us? Thy indications of the Divine will are not to be mistaken, when we observe the diversities of tempers and dispositions in members of the same family. Domestic harmony can only be maintained by mutual concession, by the cultivation of the love of God and man, and the acquisition of a meek and humble spirit, which esteems others better than ourselves, and equally wise. Owing to the pride and selfishness of depraved human nature, there are always some domineering, dictatorial spirits who are continually contending for the mastery, and majestically insisting upon others thinking, feeling, and acting in accordance with their contracted views. The slightest opposition inflames them, and instead of rectifying their own dispositions, they attribute their infelicities of temper to the provocations of others. The most irritable people always complain most of the bad tempers of others, being lamentably unconscious of their besetting sin. It is the act of Omnipotence to make men of one mind in a house. And it is the will of God that his children should act as peacemakers by returning the "soft answer that turneth away wrath," and allaying the irritation of the choleric, instead of exasperating them. It is his will that we should imitate the example of Him who bore such contradiction of sinners against himself, with a meek and quiet spirit. It is his will that we should practice self-command, and self-discipline, and he daily provides the means. Some murmur against Providence, because they are "crazed with care" in the performances of self-imposed duties which God does not require of them. I have expatiated upon this part of the subject, because we so seldom consider these matters in reference to the will of the High and Mighty Ruler of the Universe.

When parents are disappointed in all their fondest expectations in regard to those children whose early virtues and talents gave promise of their future respectability, usefulness, and happiness, and observe them gradually becoming the victims of some degrading, soul-destroying vice, can their breaking hearts sigh "thy will be done?" They can, in regard to their own their own trial or chastisement, but, as it is not the will of God that any should perish, their resignation must be limited to their own discipline. When we behold those in whom all our affections are concentrated, suddenly arrested by excruciating and incurable disease, and it does not appear to us that their gentle spirits require such painful discipline, how difficult it is to say "thy will be done;" but when we see their refined and purified natures gradually assimilating to that of just men made perfect, and behold the image of their Divine Master becoming daily more legible while they are in the furnace of affliction, and when patience has had its perfect work, and we observe the dying eye illumined with the certain hope of immortal bliss and gaze upon the impress of the peace of God on their placid brow after dissolution, we can not only gratefully say "thy will be done," but, ascending with the emancipated spirit to the habitation of the saints in light, can joyfully exclaim, "Praise the Lord, oh my soul, and all that is within me, bless his holy name." When we are deprived of health and strength, debarred from all the pleasures of social intercourse, and suffering days and wearisome nights are appointed to us, without any intermission; when we lie down "sweet sleep to find," and the torture of every nerve and muscle not only prevents sleep, but rest also, and the spirits are crushed and the mental energies weakened by protracted sufferings, can we say "thy will be done?" Yes, if we reflect upon the agony and bloody sweat, the cross and passion of the immaculate Lamb of God, and imitate his example, who, being in an agony, prayed more fervently, we will find "his grace sufficient for us." When we mistake physical depression for the withdrawal of the light of God's countenance, can we say "thy will be done?" Yes, if we reflect upon the unknown mental sufferings of the Son of God, when he exclaimed upon the cross, "my God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" we can profitably employ the tedious night watches in prayer for those we love, for all who require our prayers, for the Church, and the world. I have written these few desultory remarks upon the passive significance of the petition; its active significance is equally extensive, as we may perceive by observing its juxtaposition with the preceding petition, "thy kingdom come." We know that it is the will of God that we should diligently search the Scriptures to learn all our religious, social, domestic, and relative responsibilities. We shall find the summary of our duties is to "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and to love one another;" to do unto others as we wish them to do to us; to do good unto all men. These practical doctrines are so plain, that he who is anxious to perform the will of God, need not leave the old paths to follow any new lights or rather ignis fatui, to teach him what he must do to be saved.

We know that it is the will of God that "all should come to the knowledge of the truth," and if we do not give cheerfully and liberally of our substance, and put every talent in requisition to co-operate with those who wish to carry the glad tidings of salvation to the remotest isles, and those who are anxious to collect into the fold of the Great Shepherd, those countless multitudes who are wandering in heathen darkness over our vast territories, we do not desire to perform the will of God. It is intended that we should associate together to accomplish this great object; a variety of societies must be kept in vigorous operation, and whoever enrolls his or her name as a member should conscientiously perform his or her share of the labor, and not tacitly delegate his duty to others. Every angel who is employed to minister to the heirs of salvation, performs the task assigned to him in doing the will of God. If we complain of any duty God gives us the ability to perform, we murmur against his will. Let us therefore trim our lamps and gird up our loins, that we may be found doing the will of God when he summons us to give an account of our stewardship, and escape the condemnation of that servant who "knew his Lord's will and did it not." Diocesan Intelligence.

New York.—The Church of St. John Baptist.—In pursuance of notice duly given at Morning Service on the two Sundays previous to the time appointed, in which services Rev. Dr. Berrian and Rev. Samuel L. Southard participated, an election of Church wardens and Vestrymen was held on Monday, the 12th inst., in order to the Incorporation of a new parish in the upper part of Lexington Avenue.

At a meeting of the Vestry, the Rev. Cornelius Roosevelt Duffie was unanimously elected Rector. Several most desirable lots having been presented on Lexington Avenue, corner of 35th street, as a site for a church edifice, it is the intention of the Vestry to take immediate measures for its erection.

The church will be built of free stone, after a design by Mr.

Frank Wills, Architect, and in point of beauty and correctness of style, one of the greatest ornaments of the city. It is intended to seat from 600 to 700 without galleries. The situation is one of the most eligible in the upper part of the city, being upon elevated ground, in a neighbourhood rapidly improving, and increasing in population, and which very shortly will greatly need such an edifice as it is now proposed to build.

The corner-stone will be laid by Bishop DeLancey, on Saturday, the 24th inst., being the Festival of St. John Baptist, at 5 o'clock, P. M.—Churchman.

Western New York.—ORDINATION.—On Trinity Sunday, Bishop DeLancey held an ordination in Trinity Church, Geneva, at which Professor Henry L. Low, of Geneva College, was admitted to the holy order of Deacons, and the Rev. D. C. Millett, of St. John's Church, Catharine, the Rev. Almon Gregory, of Zion Church, Rome, and the Rev. Thomas N. Benedict, officiating in St. John's Church, Canandaigua, Deacons were admitted to the Priesthood. Prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Spalding, of Hammondsport, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Gregory, of Syracuse.

The candidates for Deacon's orders were presented by the Rev. Dr. Hale, and the candidates for Priest's orders, by the Rev. Dr. Gregory. The Rev. Messrs. VanIngen, Hale, Hobart, Gregory and Spalding, united in the laying on of hands. The sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. VanIngen, and the holy communion administered by the Bishop. The Rev. Messrs. Hobart, Hale, VanIngen, and Spalding, assisted in the distribution of the elements.—Gospel Messenger.

Alabama.—ORDINATION.—On the 26th ult., in St. John's Church, Montgomery, Mr. James Henry Ticknor, late a Methodist Licentiate, was admitted to the holy Order of Deacons, by the Right Rev. Dr. Cobbs, Bishop of the Diocese—the Rev. Wm. D. Cairns, of the Diocese of Georgia, preaching the Ordination Sermon, and the Rev. Mr. Zimmer assisting in the administration of the Eucharist.

In connexion with this notice, it may be gratifying to many to be informed that the health of Bishop Cobbs, which during the winter has been such as to prevent the performance of much active duty, is now so far restored as to encourage the hope that he may long be spared to his Diocese and the Church. Illustrating as he does so beautifully in all his ministrations, the evangelical zeal and Catholic Churchmanship of good old Bishop Wilson, of Sodor and Man, we have scarcely one amongst us whose loss would be more extensively or severely felt. It is therefore a cause of devout thankfulness to the Church at large that God, in His mercy, has spared him to the great work of establishing the Church in the important Diocese over which He has placed him.—Churchman.

Connecticut.—CORNER STONE.—The corner stone of St. Mark's Church, New Britain, was laid with appropriate rites, on Monday, the 19th inst., at 5 o'clock, P. M. A procession, consisting of the officiating Clergy, Wardens, Vestry, and members of the Parish, was formed at the Academy, which is used while the Church is in progress, for the celebration of divine service. As the procession approached the site of the new Church the Service was begun (according to the New York Ritual) by the Rev. P. S. Chauncey, Rector of Christ Church, Hartford. The articles deposited in the box were announced, and the corner-stone was laid, (at the request of the Bishop, who was absent on official duty,) by the Rev. A. Jackson, Rector of the Parish. A prayer was then offered by the Rev. C. R. Fisher of Hartford, and formerly Minister of the Parish; after which the Rev. Mr. Chauncey, delivered in the presence of a numerous and very attentive congregation, an appropriate and beautiful address. The Gloria in excelsis was then heartily sung by the whole congregation; and the remaining collects were offered and the benediction pronounced by the Rector of the Parish.

The material of the Church is to be wood; the style, gothic; the dimensions, 55 feet in length by 34 in width; the chancel extending 12 feet farther. The entrance is through the tower in front.—The total length 75 feet. The site is very central, being at the north-west angle of the public square.

There is a small but devoted band of Churchmen who, with the promise of some assistance from abroad, have undertaken a great work. If they are enabled to carry it out, there is every reason to believe that a self-sustaining and prosperous Parish will soon be established. The village is eminently prosperous and rapidly increasing in population. Houses are fast springing up and yet there is at all times a demand for them far beyond the supply.

We commend this enterprise to the favorable consideration of our brethren as one which promises to amply repay all that may be expended upon it. If what the few Churchmen of New Britain are attempting to do now had been done ten years ago, that would, in all probability, have been, at this moment, one of the strong parishes of the diocese.

Subscriptions for this object will be gratefully received by the Editor of the Calendar.—Calendar.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. B. B. Killikelly, D. D. having resigned the charge of St. Mary's Church, Delphi, Indiana, requests all letters and papers to be directed to him at his present residence, "Kittanning, Armstrong Co., Pa."

The Rev. Thomas B. Flower has been received into the diocese of Maryland by Letters Dimissory from the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Virginia.

AN INDIAN IDEA.—The following is an Indian's idea of the Trinity. He had been listening to a missionary:

"When I went home," said he, "I thought and studied long upon what my white brother told me. I was dark! very dark! I could not understand how one should be three and three should be one. At last looking around me, I saw water, ice and snow. I called the Father water, the Son ice, and the Holy Ghost snow. There I could see three in one—all water, yet distinctly three forms. I then understood the speech of my white brother, and the Great Spirit he worshipped."

Faith.

There are dark shadows on the brow of night,
And yet o'er fields and over woodland brake,
There falls a dim and deeply softened light,
That casts its gleamings o'er the tranquil lake.

Thro' the dark clouds that hide her form from sight,
The silvery moon sends down her chaste beams:
We tell her presence only by her light,
That over wood and wave so softly gleams.

E'en so, within the Christian's secret soul,
The heav'nly lamp of faith unseen doth blaze;
Save that when round him clouds of sorrow roll,
We see them brightened by its holy rays.

Christ Crucified,

*The Hope, the Theme, and the Model of the Christian Minister;
The Sixth Charge to the Clergy of the Diocese of New Jersey; by GEORGE WASHINGTON DOANE, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of the Diocese.*

MY BRETHREN OF THE CLERGY:

It is an amazing thought, that, while we are taught, in one place of Holy Scripture,* that a man's soul is worth far more than the whole world, so much more that the two admit of no comparison; and, in another place, that the righteous scarcely can be saved, (St. Peter iv. 18.) we have been set apart, in solemn manner, for the care of other souls besides our own! So that, our pastoral aim is nothing less than this, nor less than this our load of pastoral care, to save ourselves, and them that hear us! (1 Timothy iv. 16.) Can any wonder that considers this, that Luther should confess, that he never went into the pulpit without trembling?† Or that St. Chrysostom should doubt, whether any Ruler of the Church might certainly be saved? Or that, even an Apostle, should exclaim, in overwhelmed and overwhelming apprehension, "Who is sufficient for these things?" (2 Corinthians ii. 16.) Well might we run, and hide ourselves from such a charge, and stop our ears, with all an adder's deafness, to the call, to undertake, or to pursue, it; but that we read, in the same place, of the same Apostle, his own answer to the yearning outbreak of his awed and agonizing soul: "Not that we are sufficient, of ourselves, to think any thing, as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God."

To-day, the entrance on a sixth triennial period of my ministry among you, as your Bishop, invites me, by canonical provision, to address you, in a CHARGE. In doing so, it is my desire, dear reverend brethren, to charge myself, through you. Whatever load is laid upon the Pastor's heart, that has to answer for a single flock, is multiplied and aggravated to the Bishop's, who has the care of many Pastors, and of many flocks; who, in a certain sense, is set to save their souls, who are to save themselves, and them that hear them. Who wonders, that St. Ambrose ran away, by night, when he was chosen Bishop of Milan? Who does not wonder, that, "I will not be Bishop," (Nolo Episcopari,) should not still be the reply, that arts, spontaneous and instinctive, to refuse a call, so far beyond the strength of human hearts? "How weary should I be of this Rochet," says holy Bishop Hall, "if you can show me, that Episcopacy is of any less than Divine Institution." Bear with me then, dear brethren, while I strive to strengthen my own spirit, for its fearful burden; and, with God's blessing, to establish yours, by the recourse, in which alone St. Paul found strength, to the most precious cross of Jesus Christ our Lord. God forbid," he said to the Galatians, "that I should glory, save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." (Galatians vi. 1.) Whatever Greeks may seek for, or the Jews require, he wrote to the Corinthians, "We preach Christ crucified." (1 Corinthians i. 23.) And, when he went to Corinth, he tells the Christians there, it was in no dependence upon eloquence or wisdom, but, in the unmoveable determination, "not to know any thing," among them, "save Jesus Christ, and Him" as crucified." (1 Corinthians ii. 2.) CHRIST CRUCIFIED, the Hope, the Theme, the Model of the Christian Minister, will be the argument, with which I strive, dear reverend brethren, to reinforce your spirits, and my own. And, may the God of peace, who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ, the great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make us "perfect in every good work, to do his will, working in us" "that which is well pleasing in His sight, through Jesus Christ our Lord, to Whom be glory, forever and ever!"

* "What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"—St. Matthew viii. 36.

i. That CHRIST CRUCIFIED, is the sole Hope of the Christian Minister, for pardon and salvation needs scarcely to be said. Whatever the magnitude, the dignity, the sanctity, of our great trust, as ministers of God, and "stewards of the mysteries of Christ," "we have this treasure in earthen vessels." (2 Corinthians iv. 7.) We are sinners, all. And, with the Apostle, must keep our bodies under, and bring them into subjection, lest that, by any means, when we have preached to others, we ourselves be castaways. (1 Corinthians ix. 27.) From this appalling end, our only rescue is the refuge of the Cross. The fountain, opened to our souls, "for sin and for uncleanness," flows from the pierced heart of Him, who suffered there. And, to be gathered at His bleeding feet; and look, with smitten souls, upon the agony that wrings His yearning frame; and take into our hearts, cut through with penitential shame, the unction of His blood: this is our only cleansing, and our only health. Daily, beloved brethren, let us kneel, in secret, there. Daily, let us pour out into His ear, the sins and sorrows of our souls. Daily, let us beseech Him, "by" His "Agony and Bloody Sweat, by" His "Cross and Passion, by" His "precious Death and Burial," to "have mercy on us, miserable sinners!" The plea, which other men present, is for their separate souls. Ours, for our own souls, and for the souls of them who hear us. How can we comfort them, that are not comforted ourselves? How can we win their souls for Jesus Christ, that are ourselves unwon? How can we go before them, in the way that leads to life, while yet our spirits linger in the grave of sin and death? Oh, for that fearful thought, that, of unfaithful watchmen, all the blood of every soul will be required. (Ezekiel xxxiii.) Oh, for the thought, more fearful yet, by far, that they, whom Christ has set as pastors, have the Church of God to feed, which He hath purchased with His blood! (Acts xx. 28.)

"Why should we crave the worldling's wreath,
On whom the Saviour deigned to breathe,
To whom His keys were given;
Who lead the choir where angels meet,
With angels' food our brethren greet,
And pour the drink of Heaven?"

When sorrow all our heart would ask,
We need not shun our daily task;
And hide ourselves for calm;
The herbs we seek to heal our woe,
Familiar by our pathway grow,
Our common air is balm.

Around each pure domestic shrine,
Bright flowers of Eden bloom and twine,
Our hearths are altars all."‡

ii. That which we look to, as the single source of safety for ourselves, we are to make our constant Theme, with others. We are to "preach CHRIST CRUCIFIED." We find Him in the ruin of the Fall, hopeless without His Cross. We lift Him up, when we "convince the world of sin;" nailing Him there, in cruelty and scorn, that it may kneel to Him, in penitence and faith, as its sole rescue from the awful curse. "We preach CHRIST CRUCIFIED," when we proclaim the nature and necessity of faith: "For God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him, should not perish, but have everlasting life." (St. John iii. 16.) "We preach CHRIST CRUCIFIED," when we require, as indispensable to every sinner, a hearty and sincere repentance: "Verily, I say unto you, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." (St. Luke xiii. 3.) "We preach CHRIST CRUCIFIED," when we enforce a willing and habitual obedience, as the taking and the bearing of His Cross, into our hearts, and on our lives: "God forbid that I should glory, save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world" (Galatians vi. 14.) "We preach CHRIST CRUCIFIED," when we inculcate baptism, as the door of entrance to the fold of pardon and salvation: "Not for works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost; which He shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour." (Titus iii. 5, 6.) "We preach CHRIST CRUCIFIED," when we invite believing penitents to come, and do as He, Who died for them, commanded, in taking of that Holy Supper, which He ordained and instituted, in His blood: "The Bread which we break, is it not the Communion of the Body of Christ?" "The Cup of Blessing, which we bless, is it not the Communion of the Blood of Christ?" "For, as often as ye eat this Bread, and drink this Cup, ye do show the Lord's death, till He come." (1 Corinthians x. 16; xi. 26.) "We preach CHRIST CRUCIFIED," when we set forth the preciousness and freedom of the blessed Gospel, and beseech mankind to be partakers of its blessings: "We pray you, in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God; for He hath made Him to be sin for us, Who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God, in Him." (2 Corinthians v. 20, 21.) "We preach CHRIST CRUCIFIED," when we supply the strength and consolations of our faith, to them that struggle, and are burdened, with the trials and the toils of life: "Looking unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher of our Faith, Who, for the joy that was set before Him, endured the Cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God." (Hebrews xii. 2.) "We preach CHRIST CRUCIFIED," when we present the Church, for them to add themselves to it, who would be saved: "The Church of God, which He hath purchased with His blood." (Acts xx. 28.) "We preach CHRIST CRUCIFIED," when we commend, to all who bear the Christian name, the duties and devotions of the Christian life: "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies, a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service; and be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed, by the renewing of your mind." (Romans xii. 1, 2.) In one, deep, urgent, burning thought, put into words by holy Chrysostom; "When we rise, the Cross; when we lie down, the Cross; in our thoughts, the Cross; in our studies, the Cross; every where, and at every time, the Cross, shining more glorious than the sun."

iii. And this will not suffice. The Cross may be upon our Churches, upon our houses, upon our Bibles, upon our bosoms, upon our lips. It must be printed on our hearts. It must be borne upon our lives. CHRIST CRUCIFIED can never be our hope, as sinners, and will vainly be our theme, as teachers, if He be not made the Model of our lives, as men. This, the Apostle deeply felt. "God forbid," he said, "that I should glory, save in the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ:" careful to add, lest all his glorying be vain, "by which the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world." This, the Apostle clearly showed: determined, when he went to Corinth, to know nothing among them, but "Jesus Christ, and Him" as "crucified." As multitudes are ruined, by the sad delusion, that there may be salvation, through an outward Cross, set up on Calvary, without an inward Cross, erected in the heart, and swaying and controlling all the life; so must our preaching, my dear reverend brethren, be delusive and destructive, if we frame not our lives, in humbleness, and holiness, and heavenly-mindedness, in self-denial, self-devotion, and self-sacrifice, upon the model of the Crucified. To tell, in soft and silken accents, of the sacrifice of Calvary; to speak of Jesus and Him crucified, from cushioned pulpit, to well dressed, well seated, and well mannered people; to take the pastoral office, for the shearing of the sheep; and count its duties done, when, twice a week, the minimum of public service is discharged, is not to do, as the Apostle did, at Corinth; is not to do, as the Apostle's Master did, when in the flesh. He did not wait for men to come to Him, for what He only had; but "went about," to do them good. He was not borne, in palanquin or chariot, upon His ministries of mercy; but walked, from town to town, on bare and bleeding feet. He did not make one day bear all the burden of the week, in teaching, or in worship; but was, all hours, of every day, about His Father's business; and found His meat and drink to do the will of Him that sent Him. No time so out of season, no place so out of keeping, that He used it not, for service to the sinners, whom He came to seek and save. At evening, in the heat of noon, before the morning dawned; on the lone mountain, by the sea-side, in the fisher's boat, at Jacob's well, upon the road that led to Emmaus; at all times, and in every place, He was the Healer, the Instructor, the Consoler, the unwearied, unexhausted, Friend, of man. He was an hungered, He was athirst, He was all night on watch. And, when His life had been all given, and all His work of life was done, was there a form of sorrow which He did not face, was there a depth of shame He did not fathom, for our sins? The mocking before Pilate, Herod's insulting reverence, the buffeting, the spitting and the scourging, the overmastering burden of the Cross, the lacerating crown of thorns, the palpitating nerves, shattered and severed by the nails, the sacred fountain of the heart laid open, with the spear, the thirst that parched the sense, the cloud that gloomed the soul, the mental pang that shook the earth, and hung the heavens with black; these were the outer parts of what He bore, Who bore for us our sins: and there was yet the unknown and unimaginable agony, that crushed and wrung the soul, to make the suffering and self-sacrifice of Calvary sufficient for the expiation of our sins. And we suppose, that our self-seeking, self-indulgence, self-idolatry, reflects the pattern of His Cross! And we suppose, that our divided hearts, and dull affections, and lame service, rise to the standard of the Gospel! And we suppose, that less than our whole nature, with its capacities and faculties; less than our whole life, with all its interests, and energies, and issues, meets our profession, as disciples of the Crucified! Dear reverend brethren, we but sleep upon our posts. We seek our own, and not the things of Jesus Christ. We are absorbed with sense and time, while souls, for which the Saviour died, are perishing; and the eternity, which hangs upon His sentence, rushes on, to meet us. "I beseech you," "by the mercies of God," rise to a nobler estimation of your trust! 1 beseech you, by the sufferings of Christ, rouse to a deeper apprehension of your account! Embrace the bleeding Cross. Take it to your pierced hearts. Be crucified on it, with Jesus Christ. St. Paul thought scorn of less than this. "God forbid," he said, that he should glory, but in the shame and torture of that Cross! "God forbid," he said, that he should think of it, but as it crucified the world to him, and him unto the world! Dear brethren, this is what we need, to make the Gospel fill the world. For this we wait, to make the Church a praise in all the earth. When men take note of us, that we have been with Christ, in all the ventures of His life, in all His willingness to die, they will surrender to us, at our will. The fire that kindles in our souls, will kindle theirs. They will yield up themselves to God. They will keep nothing back, that can promote His glory, or subserve His cause. The gold and silver will again be heaped before His Cross. The myrrh and frankincense again will breathe from off His altar. The costlier treasures, and more from fragrant incense, of souls on fire with love, and melted into meek obedience, will bless the earth, and fill the heavens with joy. The gracious Sufferer "shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied;" and ransomed saints vie, with rejoicing angels, in the praises of the Lamb.

My reverend brethren, in the providence of God, our lot has fallen, on most eventful times. The world is all astir. The fountains of the deep are broken up. Thrones and dominions pass away, like children's tracks upon the sand. Fabrics, the growth of centuries, have vanished at a word. All human wisdom is at fault. All human confidence has failed. The nursing mother, at whose breasts our feebleness was nurtured, is perplexed with "fear of change." The tyrant of the world, the unjust step-mother of Christendom, proud papal Rome, falters and totters, in her career of insolent impiety. Upon the youngest daughter of the Cross, the trust for human nature seems about to fall. We must bestir ourselves, to meet it. We must pray God to give us grace, to meet it well. The strength to do so must come to us from the Cross. We cannot conquer, if it be not in that sign.

1. It is a time for firmness in the faith. That which was once delivered to the saints, is that which we must keep. We have it in our ancient Creeds. We have it in our simple Catechism. We have it in our well ordered Liturgy. We prove them all by the sure Word of God. Shame on us, if we suffer change to pass on that, which eighteen hundred years of prayers and tears have consecrated! Wo to us, if we suffer that to be disjointed, which God has knit in one!

2. It is a time for frequency in prayer. All human strength is weakness. All human wisdom, folly. We know not what may be the issues of a year, or of an hour. In the simple confidence of little children, it becomes us to repose ourselves on God. In the entire dependence of little children, it becomes us to make known our wants to Him. The prayers, which prevailed with Him, when the cry was, "the Christians to the lions!"—the prayers which prevailed with Him, when from the stake, where Latimer and Ridley died, the flame was lighted up, that still burns on, and is to fill the world,† are ours, to offer, still; and He, Who made them His, before His Father's throne, still lives to intercede for us. Let us cry mightily unto God. Let us besiege His throne with prayers. Above all, let us beseech Him, "Lord, teach us to pray!"

3. It is a time for fervency of love. We need love's sympathy. We need love's confidence. We need love's energy. We need love's consolation. We need the life of love. "Love is life's only sign." Can we stand here, beneath the Cross, and not confess its power? Can we look up to Him, Who hung upon it, for our sins, and not give up ourselves, in self-denial, self-devotion, and self-sacrifice, to do its work?

"The spring of the regenerate heart,
The pulse, the glow, of every part,
Is the true love of Christ our Lord,
As man embraced, as God adored."‡

Beloved, let us yield ourselves obedient to its gentle, gracious power. Surely, if Christ "so loved us, we ought to love one another." Here, where He spreads for us His feast of love, let us renew our vows. Love gave itself, to be our spiritual food. Love pierced its heart, to yield our spiritual drink. Love gives itself, to hearts of love, to be their everlasting life. "Beloved, let us love one another: for love is of God; and every one that loveth, is born of God and knoweth God." In that short, simple, but sufficient, sermon, which beloved John, when he had filled his century of years, and had no strength to utter more, borne on men's shoulders, was accustomed to preach daily, in the Church at Ephesus, "MY LITTLE CHILDREN, LOVE ONE ANOTHER!"§

* "As the Governor, however, continued to urge him, and said, 'Swear, and I will dismiss you: revile Christ!'—Polycarp replied, 'Eighty and six years have I served Him, and He never did me wrong; and how can I now blaspheme my King, that has saved me!'"—The Proconsul said, 'I have wild beasts at hand; I will cast you to these, unless you change your mind.' He said, 'Call them!'"—Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History.

† "When Latimer came up, (for the poor old man made what speed he could, but by reason of his years, was slow.) Ridley ran to him and kissed him, saying, 'Be of good heart, brother; for God will either assuage the fury of the flame, or else strengthen us to abide it!' Then they kneeled down, both of them, and prayed very earnestly."—"Then did Ridley move the Lord Williams to intercede, that the leases which he had made, as Bishop of London, might be confirmed; and, when he had relieved his conscience of this, his only worldly care, a kindled fagot was laid at his feet: Latimer, who was fastened to the same stake, exclaiming at the instant, 'Be of good comfort, master Ridley, and play the man; we shall this day, light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust, shall never be put out.'"—Rev. J. J. Blunt's Sketch of the Reformation in England.

§ Beatus Joannes Evangelista, quum Ephesi, moraretur,

The True Glorifying.

FROM BISHOP WHITTINGHAM'S SERMON.

Of wealth and strength, little needs be said, in corroboration of the conclusion that they are possessions as worthless in themselves, as they are precarious in their nature. Although all the world is practically denying it without cessation, yet all the world knows, and has known, since the world stood, that 'strength' and 'riches' are no real good—no absolute ground of 'glorifying' or complacent self-gratulation. Wealth cannot buy one ingredient of happiness: still less can strength command it. Nothing that satisfies the mind, nothing that can satiate the thirsty soul, is within their purchase or procurement. Shame and everlasting contempt, the gnawing tooth of envious discontent, the burning pang of unappeasable desire, and, most of all, the hidden undying worm of remorse, are perfectly compatible with great and growing wealth, with strength and its consequent influence and power in any imaginable measure. These things are but in ans, not ends. Every one knows it, and so regards them, except the poor deluded wretches whom they have made their self-subjected slaves. In the use of them, consists their value; and it is the reason and the will which are tried in that use, that give them their worth—if any they can be deemed to have, when all the circumstances attending their possession are taken into consideration.

But such is not so obviously the case, at first glance, with the third object of our aspirations and endeavours—'wisdom.' Of it, none can rob us, as of wealth. It suffers no loss by over-mastery, as strength. It is imperishable as the mind, and independent of external circumstances as the soul. Once gotten, no fellow-being's grasp can wring it from us; nor can any or all living prevent its use, while in possession. Surely, then, 'the wise man' may 'glory in his wisdom!' Getting that, he has gotten "a treasure better than the merchandize of silver or fine gold, more precious than rubies, and not to be compared with all other things that can be desired!"

Yet this 'wisdom,' is, indeed, after all, no more than wealth or strength, an end in itself—no more than them, capable of constituting the happiness of its possessor or satisfying the cravings of an immortal soul.

Wisdom is the perfection of intellect, the result of mental action in acquirement and in the application of acquirements. As such, if it be in itself a good, it must be so with reference to this present state of being, all views of its probationary character and future continuation being set aside. If the growth and gains of mind be in themselves an end, they must be so in this life and for this life. Wisdom alone as human, has no moral attribute. It is its accompaniment with will and accountability that gives it moral bearing and results. The association of his intellectual faculties with responsible volition makes man's life a trial, and involves the consequence of accountability. Accountability with reference to any faculty, endowment, or possession, deprives it of the character of an end in itself, an absolute good, valuable irrespectively of its use or consequences. Man's birthright of free-will, giving life its character of a probationary state, makes him accountable for wisdom as for every other gift. Get it as he may, its worth is in its use. He cannot evade the universal law of being, by which all he is, and all he has, are made available for the profit of others, as a condition of their being of use or profit to himself.

But wisdom as merely human, must be available for this life only. We must try it by the laws of this present state, and with reference to our existence in this earth alone. We must, for the time, abjure our birthclaim of immortality, and to test the real worth of human wisdom in itself, try to imagine ourselves living on this globe as the several orders in the vegetable and animal kingdoms exist, each to fill its place in the multifarious variety of the great whole—links in the chain of being, dependent upon other links, and from which others again depend, and nothing more. We must think ourselves born and nourished, and sustained through our three score years and ten, that we may be parents of others, or pageants in the never-ending, still-beginning procession. We must fancy our strife for a place and share in society the mere onward movement of a dancing atom whirled into view by the current which floats it through the sunbeam, to be seen a moment, and then appear no more.

It is true that such an attempt to bring life, viewed as the present state of being only, down to its realities, must fill the soul with disgust and horror. No gains, no pleasures, no possessions, no endowments, no achievements, can be thought of for one instant with endurance as the pursuits and occupations of a reasonable and moral being, such as we know ourselves to be, if such gains, enjoyments, possessions, or endowments, if such acts and deeds and acquisitions, be conceived of as concerning neither ourselves nor others for anything more than this life which they and we spend in a few revolutions of the globe upon which we crawl. Yet even this repulsive task is necessary to measure man's wisdom as it is his own, apart from that 'knowledge of the Lord,' which it sets up to rival the moment he attempts to 'glory in it,' as his own.

Take, then, a laborer in the mines of wisdom, and estimate the produce of his labor, if, as an inhabitant of earth, he lays it out for earthly life alone. A man separates himself from early youth to the engrossing and wearing toil of study. He stores his mind with learning and fathoms the depths of science. He enlarges the limits of human knowledge. He becomes a discoverer, and reveals to his fellows an undetected planet wheeling its orbit beyond what had been thought the utmost limits of the system in which this world of ours finds place: or traces organic life in the secret functions which had been in-usque ad ultimam senectutem, et vix inter discipulorum manus ad ecclesiam deferretur; nec posset in plura vocum verba contexere, nihil aliud per singulas solebat proferre collectas, nisi hoc: 'Filioli, diligite alterutrum.' Tandem discipuli et fratres qui aderant, tedio affecti, quod eadem semper audirent, dixerunt, 'Magister, quare semper hoc loqueris?' accessible to the prying curiosity of all before him; or lays open to the wondering gaze of the multitude the laws and processes of nature till he approaches, seemingly, the very line which divides reproduction from creation:—thus he wins for his race a new possession and makes for himself a name. Presently a fever or a consumption, or, at latest, after some three or four score winters, the very exhaustion of worn out nature, lays him in the grave, and he becomes food for worms. What has he had? and what has he left behind him? He has had the satisfaction which an endueoned captive might enjoy in sound ing to the depth of one more foot the impenetrable walls within which he is to wear out his life and die; and he has left behind him the traces of his labor for the communication of the same satisfying intimacy with their prison to his fellow-captives. Bound life by living on this earth, and I defy you to make more of its best achievements in its admitted highest and noblest enterprises, the pursuits and gains of intellect! The brain whose fibres have served to track comets in their wanderings through illimitable space, and from the utmost verge of their eccentric orbits to soar off to other systems and congeries of systems at distances whence light must have travelled ten times longer than since the creation of this earth before it could have reached us, and thence to return to detect life in the beings of whom millions people a drop upon a needle's point, and to search out the laws that govern each—that brain must rot into earth no better than that of the baboon. And if its thoughts and acquisitions are left behind in the form of written knowledge, for what are they perpetuated but to stimulate the fibres of other brains, which are to rot a little later? Are those the triumphs of science? Is that the fruit of man's wisdom? Yes: it is: they are: if the science and wisdom or man have their end and their use as they are his alone in this life only. Thus viewed, life for its own sake, even in its fullest phase, the busy, fruitful life of the intellectual laborer and conqueror and creator, is utterly miserable and contemptible. What! shall I labor and strive, and it may be abridge my span of breathing-time to gather together and put in order materials which may serve to keep others laboring and striving during their few thousand days and nights, when they and I must dissolve away from all these things and perish as though they had never been? If this be 'wisdom,' let not the wise man glory in it!

But another devotes his intellectual toil to purposes more practical. He schemes and plans, and devises ways and means for compassing the improvement of his country or his age. He advances the well-being of some hundreds, or thousands or millions, of his race. Surely, he lives for others! His life is well laid out! For what? When he and they sleep together in the dust, what boots it? Admit that he has sweetened life for others, that he has prolonged it, that he has saved it. Did he procure them a reprieve from death? If not, the grave devours his labour at the last; and in the end there is naught to show for it. Of the millions who fattened the soil of Egypt, what remains to repay the wise labors of which they have left so many traces? Poisonous dust to breed contagion; and rotten mummies, to serve as fuel in the miserable cookery of the half starved fellow who shelters his penury beneath the ruins of their palaces. A little less discomfort during the strife of life, a brief prolongation of its struggle, an increase of the number who partake in it within a given portion of the earth's periphery, is all that the most successful statesman, the ablest benefactor of his kind, has ever had the ability to accomplish; and if he had accomplished that for every generation that should succeed him to the last, for what when the end shall have come, will they have to thank him? Say that he works out the problem of our day, the reconciliation of the liberty and intelligence of the masses with the safety and legitimate influence of the more cultivated, because more wealthy numbers, who, by a perpetual ordinance of God, will always be the few! Say that he performs the miracle of making every acre of his country's surface fill all the mouths that the inventions of modern art and the discoveries of modern science are apportioning to it with such startling rapidity of multiplication! What will he have accomplished, after all? Reduce his achievements to the reality of statistics, and it will appear that the bubble of life has been expanded by an imperceptible traction:—that is to say, that the toil-worn operative has some few months more of suffering before he goes down to the grave where he is to know his first sweet sleep, and the pale artist may linger out a death by inches for some days or weeks beyond the period at which it would otherwise have been cut short. In the meanwhile, a pestilence comes from the farthest East, and sweeps away a sixth of the human race, and he can neither ascertain its cause, determine its nature, nor arrest, nor even in any perceptible degree modify its progress. A famine ensues upon the operation of natural causes which he may guess at, but in no respect control, and one ninth of a degraded and oppressed but noble hearted people dies in slow torment, while half the adjacent realms, themselves put to utmost shifts for the supply of their necessities, look on in blank amazement and shuddering terror! Such are the triumphs of science in its noblest forms, the science of the wise statesman and of the diligent philanthropist, when considered as it bears on man as a creature of this life only. They are the sportings of the day-fly, giddily wheeling its little circles in the sunbeam which gave it birth and shall see it die, great only when measured by the littleness of the being who pretends to them: when estimated by the measureless and fathomless sea of being in itself, and of the capabilities of moral being, immeasurably little valueless beyond the power of expression of any factor.

Are these things said in disparagement of wisdom, brethren! God forbid! But in hindrance of its degradation, by withdrawing it from the light in which alone it can truly shine—the light of the countenance of God, of which, in so far as it has reality, it is a faint reflection, lighting up the haze on the shore of the ocean of eternity, in which we move. 'Happy is the man that findeth wisdom!' but never will he find it, if he look for it as a thing of time, or prize it as of value in itself or glory in it as his own. God's best gift, from the Father of lights it comes, and as of Him, and for Him it must be held. 'The fear of the Lord, that is the beginning of wisdom; and the knowledge of the holy, that is understanding.' He that glorify him in this, that he understandeth and knoweth the Lord which exerciseth loving kindness, judgment and righteousness in the earth.

Wisdom strength and riches, to anything else than phantoms in a vain show, must be means to ends beyond this life. The man who can brutify himself to believe that the dissolution of his body will end his being, whether he cry with the sensualist, Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die, or with Galileo and Newton look out upon systems of worlds arranged in endless order through illimitable space, is in either case equally self-satisfied. What matters it to him that beauteous order and infinite wisdom manifest themselves in the wonders of the heavens? To-morrow he must leave them. What matters it, if he suffer or starve, or in the abominable phrase of the heartless sceptic "turn a few ounces of blood from their natural channel"? The world will roll on as ever, and neither he, when he is not, nor it, which shall no longer know him and never needed him, shall be the worse. In God alone we live, and move, and have our being. In Him life and immortality come to light, and give our being truth and worth. 'Have faith in God,' and the riddle of life is read, and man assumes his place in it, the lord of the world he treads on, because the heir of an endless being elsewhere.

By faith in God, alone, can we 'understand and know' Him, in the sense of His own admonition in my text.

There is a sense, in which to profess to know God were madness, to desire it folly. We may know a thing when we acquire a conception of its causes, its constituent elements, its relations. We know a person when we are acquainted with his features, origin, past history, and connexions. The self-causing Cause of all can be so known of Himself alone. He is—and when we have affirmed that truth, we have exhausted the possible conception why He is, what He is, and how He is. Self-originate, self-subsistent, having no relations but the effect and direction of His will, the Creator cannot be known by aught that is created, that is, by any but Himself, in the sense in which man desires and acquires the knowledge of the things and persons by which he is surrounded in his present state.

There is another sense, in which 'to know God' is a possibility, but not to man in this stage of his existence. The knowledge as the being of God—not reflexly, by its results, but in itself is held out in prospect to those who by faith inherit life eternal. They shall see Him as He is. They shall know as they are known. In reality, directly, in the essence of our being itself, we are under the eye of God;—in the same reality, with equal directness, the essence of the Divine Being shall be made known in another life to those who in this shall have known His Person, His attributes and His will, by faith.

The very communication of such knowledge it is indeed as yet impossible to us to conceive. Neither sense nor intellect can be its medium; for sense and intellect must both grasp the objects which they transmit to the inmost consciousness of the soul: but the Creator, whose will enables and sustains them both in the measureless depths of His infinity comprehends all that He wills to be, and can be comprehended of nothing. No image of his essence can be painted on a mortal retina, to be seized by the prehensive faculty of the sentient being, and become the means of knowledge. No conception of his form and substance can be evolved by those reasoning powers which have all their play within the hollow of His hand, scintillating from the eternal reason which gives them being. Circumscribed by Him on every side, it is impossible that bodily sense or mental faculty can grasp the image which they must receive and convey to be the means of knowledge. As little can we know how He will make His essence known to us, as we can know how that essence is; because the little we do know of ourselves amounts only to certain knowledge that it is impossible, in the nature of things, that we, of ourselves, can be capable of knowing Him.

It is by faith only, then, that we can even realize the possibility of the knowledge of God in another state. That knowledge we may, in a sense, be said to have now by faith. Believing that He has promised it, we believe that He is able to make His promise good; and in that faith we enjoy, beforehand, in its operation on our moral and spiritual nature, the boon of which we live in expectation.

Such is the condition of that acquaintance with God which is the only true wisdom, strength and riches, as uniformly set before us in His word. 'Waiting upon the Lord' is its description, a state of firm, assured reliance on His essential truth and goodness, that it shall be manifested unto us and in us. 'The Lord is my portion,' saith my soul, therefore will I hope in him. 'The Lord is good unto them that wait for Him, to the soul that seeketh Him.' It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord. It is not 'by searching,' that we are to 'find out God.' It is not by investigation and mental labour that we are to attain to 'know and understand' Him. 'Be still, and know that I am God,' is His command. 'In His light shall we see light,' if in humble reverence and submission we prepare ourselves to receive it as from Him. Not in inertness and inactivity, indeed; but in that activity of the soul which may be likened to the action of the eye, directing itself toward the beam of light, and by its visive power receiving its impression. We must turn to God, to know Him. We must recognize His presence, as the optic nerve is cognizant of the presence of the light. We must desire to know Him, as the eye is appetent of the light. We must admit and cherish the gracious influences, as the healthy organ the visual ray.

Thus to do, is to live in the deep, settled, constant conviction of the actual presence of that infinite, eternal, all-holy Being who made us, Who sustains us in life. Who is to judge us, and Who has revealed Himself to us, incarnate in our nature for our redemption and salvation, in CHRIST JESUS. We cannot receive the knowledge of Him, if we desire it not. We cannot desire it, if we believe not in Him. There is no true belief in Him, but in the glad and obedient reception of His revelation of Himself. He has revealed Himself once for all and once only, in His wonderful union of our nature with Himself, by its assumption in the Person of the ETERNAL SON, GOD made man, that man might look on God and live. "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father; if we had known me, ye would have known the Father also," is the declaration on which the life of our souls is suspended: for "this is life eternal, to know the only true God and JESUS CHRIST whom He hath sent." To 'understand and know the Lord,' in his 'loving kindness, judgment and righteousness in the earth,' is humbly and thankfully to receive the Gospel of salvation in which He manifests Himself. The heathen sought the Lord, 'if haply he might feel after Him.' The Jew, in the morning twilight which has harbingered the coming Sun of righteousness still 'groped,' as the prophet mourns, 'like blind.' To us, He is present, made known in the glorious perfection of His attributes; brought near, even into the very participation of our nature, in the marvellous condescension of His love, risen with healing in His wings, to shed abroad the light of life and immortality, to pour into our hearts the vital heat of renewing and assisting grace, if we turn to Him, that He may shine upon us, and open our bosoms to receive his life-giving influences.

In Him it is, in God made one with man, in man elevated to the inconceivable exaltation of unity with God, that our nature becomes capable of receiving the truth, and in it true wisdom, strength, and riches. By faith in Him we attain "the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of CHRIST, the eyes of our understanding being enlightened" and "put on the new man which is renewed in knowledge, after the image of Him that created us."

In CHRIST the Invisible God has manifested himself among us; has been seen in human form; has left with us the keys and seals of the knowledge of Himself and of our own condition and destiny, and now reigns over us, dispensing, of the riches of His grace, true strength to be more than conquerors in the world-strife that we are passing through, true riches to be laid up in a life that changes not, and true wisdom, even 'the wisdom from above, pure, peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits,' to every soul of man that has the heart to appreciate and in thankful trust receive His offers. By faith we know Him, and hereby we do know that we know Him, if we keep his commandments. By humble, reverent, affectionate submission to the will of God revealed in CHRIST, in a holy life of communion with Him in His word and ordinances, we test for ourselves and show forth in action that state of the soul which is its qualification to receive the light which is from above, and in that light of God to see all earth and heaven irradiated with a new effulgency. No longer spent on things that perish in the using, but laid out in the service of Him who inhabiteth eternity, the labors of mind and body, the acquisitions and possessions of the whole man, corporeal and intellectual, assume a new character and value. What we do for God, and hold for Him, and spend for Him, and have of Him, is done and disbursed and had and held, for all eternity. It is sure and steadfast. The covenant ratified in the blood of Him, who, when He knew no sin, was made sin for us, ensures us our return. Made one with Him by the acceptance of that covenant, through its pledges and seals, in faith in Him we have wisdom, righteousness and redemption. Whether we live, we live unto the Lord, and whether we die, we die unto the Lord. Life and death are to the redeemed of CHRIST, the ransomed ones of God, the re-united to the source of truth and life and power, utterly different from what they seem to be to the unanointed eye and uninstructed heart. Life leaps beyond the grave into boundless continuity of being, set free from the shackles which embarrass it while coupled with mortality. Death drops its terror, and becomes the gate of liberty and goal of the hard race to be run on earth. Made one with CHRIST by faith, 'all things are ours, whether the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are ours, and we are CHRIST's, and CHRIST is God's.' "Therefore let no man glory in men. Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might; let not the rich man glory in his riches; but he that glorifyeth, let him glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth Him who is the Lord, who exerciseth loving-kindness, judgment and righteousness upon earth."

Eight Rules of a Christian Life, Recommended to Young Persons at Confirmation.*

MY YOUNG CHRISTIAN FRIENDS,

You are assembled here on a very serious and important business, for which I trust that by the instructions and admonitions of your parochial ministers you have been already duly prepared; that you have been thus made acquainted with the nature and intent of the rite of confirmation, and are duly instructed to join in it with devotion, and are steadfastly resolved, with God's good blessing, to act in future the part which is required by your Christian profession. Nevertheless, I am desirous of endeavouring to give additional efficacy to the good advice and instructions of your parochial ministers, by addressing to you a few brief words of exhortation at this season, when the solemnity in which you are about to engage may have disposed your minds to receive with attention, and may hereafter assist you in recollecting and practising with faithfulness, what I shall suggest for the promotion of your temporal and eternal happiness.

In pursuance of this object, I would now propose a few short, comprehensive, and useful rules, for the guidance of your future conduct; and may it please Almighty God to give his blessing to the undertaking, for the sake of his well-beloved Son!

I.—1. The first rule, which I shall offer for your guidance, is, that you be constant and diligent in prayer to Almighty God. However good may be your resolutions, it is impossible for you to resist your spiritual enemies, and to serve God and keep his commandments, without his special grace. This is one of the principles which the church hath laboured to impress deeply on your minds by the solemn admonition of her minister, in the catechism: "My good child, know this, that thou art not able to do these things of thyself." Food is not more necessary to a man's life, than the grace of God is to his living well; and the only way to insure God's grace is to call for it by diligent prayer.

* From "The Youthful Christian Soldier." By Richard, lord bishop of Down, Connor, and Dromore. Dublin: Hodges and Smith. London: Parker. 1848. The occasion on which this little book is published is very affecting. The venerable author, incapacitated by years and infirmity from oral addresses, has placed his admonitions in print. There are some touching references to himself in the poetical pieces.—Ed.

2. Prayer appears to have a natural tendency likewise to make a man live better. He who entreats God to "lead him not into temptation," if he does it with sincerity, must, it should seem, be thereby more disposed to avoid or resist temptation himself. And agreeable to this was the saying of a great man, that "prayer will either make you leave off sinning, or sinning will make you leave off praying."

3. I need hardly remind you that the repetition of a few prayers with the lips only cannot be attended by any benefit whatever. They will neither reach the ear of God, nor make any impression upon your own hearts. However strongly prayer be recommended to you (and too strongly recommended it cannot be), still it is none but "the fervent prayer which availeth much."

II.—1. Secondly, let me advise you to be uniform and strict in your observance of the Lord's day. You know that it hath pleased God, for the wisest reasons, to bless and hallow the seventh day, in other words, to distinguish it from the ordinary days of the week, and to consecrate it to his worship, and to other religious purposes.

2. You will keep the day holy, if you be constant in attending the public services of the church, and if you employ as much as you can of the remainder of the day in improving yourselves in religious learning, and in encouraging religious meditations.

3. It is not a day of business; therefore, if you desire to keep the commandment, you will not only carefully abstain from all manner of unnecessary work, but you will also be careful to avoid on that day all sorts of bargaining and of traffic, whether as a buyer or a seller. What is the effect of such practices but to change the Lord's day into a day of merchandize—a sin of the same character as that which our Lord so severely reprobated, when he drove the buyers and sellers out of the temple?

4. It is not a day of pleasure; if, therefore, you desire to keep the commandment, you will be cautious how you allow yourselves to indulge in idle diversions and unprofitable amusements. To abstain from such indulgences cannot be wrong; to allow yourselves in the pursuit of them, to say the least, may be wrong; and, where a doubt exists, it is manifestly better to take that which you know to be the safe path. I allude to such amusements as are followed after a conscientious performance of all the public duties of the day. It must not be omitted that any amusement which withdraws persons from the public service of the church, or which intrenches in any other respect on the religious duties of the day, is decidedly and unquestionably sinful. And if you be habitually or only occasionally guilty of making the sabbath a day of unedifying pastime, and of withdrawing yourselves from the appointed offices of religion, as the young and thoughtless are apt to be, I entreat you by all means, as you value the favour of God, to return to a more holy and Christian practice.

5. In a word, Sunday is the Lord's day; and therefore as much of the day as can be ought to be devoted to the Lord's honour and service.

III.—1. Thirdly, with an observance of the Lord's day, I would recommend to you (what, indeed is necessarily involved in it, and has accordingly been incidentally noticed) an attendance on the Lord's house; such attendance, indeed, I would recommend to you on every day when you have the privilege of attending; but especially on the Lord's day I would recommend to you a regular, constant, early, attentive, and devout attendance.

2. I recommend a regular attendance; by which I mean such an attendance as is formed into an uniform habit upon a conscientious sense of duty, and therefore does not continually give way to slight causes of absence, but is systematically and permanently maintained.

3. I recommend a constant attendance, by which I mean an attendance whenever you have an opportunity of coming. You will not, if you comply with this advice, be present only at one service of the day, and unnecessarily absent yourselves from the other; but, if it be possible, you will devote both your morning and your evening to the public worship of your God in the congregation of your brother Christians.

4. By an early attendance you will no doubt understand me to mean an attendance before the commencement of the service; so that you may not, by want of punctuality, deprive yourselves of those benefits which the provisions of the church at the opening of morning and evening prayer are calculated to confer, nor interrupt and disturb the devotions of your brethren, nor testify a want of due alacrity in the service, and of due reverence for the majesty, of Almighty God.

5. When I recommend you to be attentive in the house of God, I mean that you should be careful to partake in the service, to follow the minister with your minds and thoughts through the parts which are appropriated to him, and to repeat with your lips those parts which the church makes it your duty and gives you the privilege to repeat, such as the general confession, the Lord's prayer, the creeds, the suffrages after the apostles' creed, the alternate verses in the psalms and hymns, the responses in the litany, and the amen at the end of all the prayers in general. And, as means of doing this more effectually, and fixing your attention, which might otherwise be disposed to wander, you will, as many of you as are able, endeavour to furnish yourselves with common prayer-books, and will be studious and careful in the use of them.

6. To the several requisites that have been enumerated, I add devotion, because that is the principal qualification whereby our worship can be rendered beneficial to ourselves, or acceptable to that spiritual Being who requires those that worship him to "worship him in spirit and in truth." Whilst your lips are employed in praying to him or praising him, your hearts must be fixed upon him likewise, or it will be in vain that you pretend to worship him.

7. The public worship of Almighty God was instituted by God himself; you may be sure, therefore, that it was instituted for good purposes, and that it must be both your duty and your interest to join in it. I am persuaded, too, that there is not one of the particulars just specified as belonging to it, which you can venture to neglect without endangering your spiritual improvement. But, if you join in the service of the church, of which you were made members at your baptism, after the manner which has been just recommended, and to which you are now about to make solemn profession of your adherence, you will derive from your attendance all the advantages which public worship is calculated to give, and be strengthened in the profession of the Christian faith, and advance continually in the practice of Christian holiness.

IV.—1. Fourthly, I would recommend to you an early and frequent participation in the sacrament of the Lord's supper. The innocent gaiety of youth is not at all inconsistent with that sober mindedness which is requisite in order that you may be qualified to partake in it worthily. Whilst, on the contrary, if you be anxious to partake in it worthily, and if you will endeavour to prepare yourselves so to do (and otherwise, certainly, you ought not to do it at all), the effect, I trust, will be felt in your hearts, and witnessed by your future conduct. For I cannot persuade myself but that serious reflection on the death and sufferings of your Saviour, and on the benefits which he has thereby purchased for you, a faithful examination into your past lives, sincere repentance of your sins, and stedfast purposes of future amendment, will dispose you for the receiving of that spiritual strength and refreshment, which are communicated to the faithful in the Lord's supper.

2. Do not understand me as recommending you to come to the holy communion without a due acquaintance with the nature and intention of the institution, any more than without due examination of your hearts and lives. But as soon as you have that information, and as soon as you can resolve to live a Christian life—which indeed you have now, I trust, resolved, and are about to promise solemnly at your confirmation—you ought also to partake in the Lord's supper.

3. And do not, I pray you, let the example of many of those who are more advanced in years, but strangely ignorant or wilfully neglectful of their Christian obligation, mislead you to omit this your bounden duty and service; nor will you, I am persuaded, if you bear carefully in mind that this is one of the two sacraments ordained by Christ in his church, as generally necessary to salvation, and that this is one of those commandments which you will have promised to keep and to walk in all the days of your life.

V.—1. Fifthly, be diligent in reading the holy scripture, especially the gospels and the rest of the New Testament; for it is "able to make you wise unto salvation through faith in Jesus Christ." This is one of the best employments for those parts of the Lord's day which are not appropriated to public worship; and it would be well that it should be made a part, if but a small part, of your employment every day.

2. Let me here admonish you to recollect the apostle St. Paul's testimony, that "the scripture is given by inspiration of God, and that it is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." Being duly sensible of this, you will read it, not with the feelings which you may bring to a merely human composition, but with grateful reverence for the all-bountiful Giver, and with prayer for his blessing upon your undertaking; and you will not think that the bare reading of it is sufficient, but will endeavour to digest it inwardly, so that it may turn to the strengthening of your faith, and to the bettering of your practice.

3. It was alleged by St. Paul, in commendation of Timothy, that "from a child he had known the holy scriptures; and thereby he became 'an example to the believers,' being filled with 'unfeigned faith,' and 'thoroughly furnished unto all good works.'"

VI.—1. The sixth rule which I would give you is, be diligent in that state of life unto which it shall please God to call you: a rule which is not at all inconsistent with those that have been previously suggested, but is indeed recommended and strengthened by them. For, let a man be ever so diligent in his ordinary concerns, it is hard indeed if he cannot find time to do his duty by worshipping and serving God; whilst, on the other hand, the word of God will remind him to live an honest and industrious, as well as a religious life.

2. "Slothfulness," saith Solomon, "casteth into a deep sleep;" that is, it makes a man as senseless and unconcerned as men who are soundly asleep. But, while it makes a man unconcerned as to every thing virtuous and praiseworthy, it has a very different effect as to all vicious inclinations, which thrive on and are confirmed by it. Men cannot be altogether inactive: if they are not doing good, they will be doing evil: if they are not serving God by labouring honestly in their calling, they will be serving the devil, the great enemy of God and of their own souls, by "variance, strife, seditions, heresies, drunkenness, revellings, and such like." It is the remark of the wise man again, that "the hand of the diligent maketh rich;" and so it doth, when regulated by Christian principles, not only in a worldly, but also in a spiritual sense.

VII.—1. In the seventh place, frequent good company and those who fear God, and avoid such as are of a contrary disposition. We are all apt to imitate and conform to those with whom we associate. "As iron sharpeneth iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend;" so will the fear of God and a love of goodness in others beget the fear of God and virtuous inclinations and practices in you.

2. Nor is the reason of the latter part of the rule less powerful: "As he that toucheth pitch shall be defiled therewith, so he that hath fellowship with a wicked man shall be like unto him." It is scarcely in human nature to be otherwise. Take it upon trust; and venture not upon so hazardous an experiment.

3. However good may be your principles, be cautious how you keep company with those persons whose principles or practices are bad. Be assured that they will corrupt you.

4. If you have kept company with any such, quit them forthwith. They may be in some respects agreeable companions, and may contribute for a time to your enjoyment. But what profit have you in their society, if it deprive you of the fellowship of God's Holy Spirit and of good men here; and of Jesus Christ, and the blessed spirits, and the living God hereafter? And what value can you set upon enjoyments which will lead you astray into the way to hell, and into the chambers of death? It is a voice from heaven which calls upon you: "Come out from among them, my people, that ye be not partakers of their sins, and that ye receive not of their plagues."

5. As you avoid bad company, so also, in connexion therewith, I would exhort you to "abstain from all appearance of evil." The rule which is here laid down in the apostle's language, and is of great importance as a mean, under God's good blessing, of preventing sin, may be thus otherwise expressed and explained: Whatever you are disposed to do, if you have any reasonable suspicion that the thing is not lawful in itself, although you may not be able to pronounce it absolutely sinful, or if you have cause to think that it is likely to prove a temptation or an occasion to sin, by all means avoid it.

6. If you do that, concerning which you doubt whether or not it will please God, you are breaking in upon that perfect reverence with which you ought to regard his authority and approbation; you are diminishing somewhat of that fear which you ought to have of displeasing him, when you wilfully run the risk of doing it; and you are thereby taking a step towards doing things which you are certain will displease him. Besides, if you once stray beyond the bounds of right, who will insure you a return to them; or, if you once run into temptation, how can you be confident that you shall get clear of it again.

7. Assure yourselves that you will meet with dangers and temptations enough to try your fidelity to your heavenly Master, without seeking or sporting with those which you may avoid. Therefore, instead of running into apparent danger, we are taught by our Lord to pray; and we have great cause for being fervent in the prayer, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

VIII.—1. Lastly, endeavour to set God always before you, and to remember that, wherever you are, his eye is upon you; that, whatever you say, his ear is open unto you; and that whatever befalls you, it is poured out upon you by his hand, doubtless, if you will have it so, for your improvement and advantage.

2. If you reflect that he is "about your path, and about your bed, and spieth out all your ways, that there is not a word in your tongue, or a thought in your heart, but he knoweth it altogether," you will be studious to avoid every thought, word, and action, when he hath forbidden, at which, having forbidden it, he must be offended, and which, in the perfection of his wisdom, he cannot but know.

3. If you reflect that you are his steward, accountable to him for everything that you do, and that he will hereafter sentence you to happiness or misery according to your works in this life, whether they have been good or evil, you will be careful as you value eternal happiness, to "eschew evil and to do good."

4. If you regard him as the Disposer of all human events, and consider that all things, whether in a worldly view, fortunate or unfortunate, do in reality "work together for good to those who love God," you will fix on him your perpetual trust and love. In prosperity you will thank him who is "the Author and Giver of all good things;" and in adversity you will bless him, who "as a father chasteneth and pitieth his children;" and, "whether he gives or takes away, you will bless the name of the Lord."

5. Especially, and in one word, if you fix your thoughts on God, as the Father of you and of all the world, as the Redeemer of you and all mankind, as the Sanctifier of you and of all his elect people, as the present Lord, and the future Judge of all things, and if you then reflect upon yourself as a fallen, weak, sinful, and, but for his mercy, a lost creature, you will be filled with all humility, and will never cease to resolve, and strive, and beseech his grace to give effect to your own imperfect resolutions and endeavours, that so you may serve him truly all the days of your life, and do your duty in that state unto which it hath pleased him to call you.

IX.—1. Such, my young Christian friends, are the rules which I propose for your conduct in your Christian warfare; that you may successfully "fight the good fight of faith," and eventually "lay hold on eternal life, whereunto ye are called, and are now about to profess a good profession before many witnesses." By way of recapitulation it may be useful if I state that they consist of diligent and constant prayer, of an uniform observance of the Lord's day, of due attendance on the Lord's house, of an early and frequent participation of the Lord's supper, and of careful attention to God's holy word: add to these, diligence in that state of life unto which it shall please God to call you, caution in the selection of your companions, and abstinence from everything which has even the appearance of evil; the whole being animated by this one pervading principle, that you are at all times acting under the superintendence, and will hereafter have to answer at the tribunal, of your omniscient Creator and your unerring Judge.

2. The rules proposed, you see, are few, short, and comprehensive: they are plain and intelligible; and, what specially recommends them, they are drawn from the fountain of all truth, the oracles of God. The world, the flesh, and the devil, those powerful enemies, who are continually "defying the armies of the living God," are in force against you. But the Lord of hosts, who by the incarnation and death of his beloved Son hath delivered all those who believe in him, will deliver you also, if you be "steadfast in the faith," out of their hands; and, if you be thus prepared for the combat, steadfastly purposing withal to act at all times to the best of your knowledge and ability, aided by the fellowship of the Spirit, and relying on the merits and mediation of the Son of God, I fear not to say to you, in the language of Saul to David, when he dismissed him to fight against the gigantic champion of the Philistines, "Go; and the Lord be with you."

ALONZO POTTER, Bishop, &c.

Philadelphia, June 19th, 1848.

Thanksgiving for Peace.

O Eternal God our Heavenly Father, in Whose hand are all power and might, we praise and magnify Thy glorious name, that Thou hast been pleased to restore to our land the blessings of peace. Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us but unto Thy name be all the praise. Give us grace, we beseech Thee, to improve this great mercy to Thy glory, the advancement of Thy gospel, the honour of our country, and as much as in us lieth, to the good of all mankind. Bestow upon us, also, such a just sense of all Thy great and manifold favours to our land, that we may show forth Thy praise by an humble, holy, and obedient walking before Thee all our days, through Jesus Christ our Lord, to Whom with Thee and the Holy Spirit, as for all Thy mercies so especially for this our deliverance from the evils of war, be all honour and glory world without end Amen.

THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—The Annual meeting of the Board of Trustees of this important Church Institution, was held on Wednesday and Thursday of last week. The proceedings of the Board will be published from the records of the Secretary. In the mean time we would refer to the action of the Board in relation to a matter upon which the Church feels a deep interest. We allude to the proposed resignation of the Rev. Dr. Wilson.

As soon as the letter of Dr. Wilson was read, in which he tendered his resignation, on account of his desire to seek the quiet and rest more suited to his time of life, a most interesting discussion ensued. Resolutions were at once offered, expressing a deep sense of the value of Dr. Wilson's services, and of their great importance to the Institution in which he had been so long a Professor. The strongest expressions of confidence and respect were made by all who spoke. The only diversity of opinion seemed to be as to the most respectful and proper mode of conveying the earnest wish of the Board, that the Dr. should withdraw his resignation. At length a Committee was appointed, of which the Right Rev. Dr. Potter was Chairman, to confer with Dr. Wilson, and to urge the strong desire of the Trustees. This was done by a unanimous resolution.

We are sure that all who feel interested in the Seminary, will be glad to learn that Dr. Wilson, yielding to the representations of the Committee, has agreed to withdraw his resignation for the present. Thus the Seminary will continue to enjoy the benefit of his sound learning, wisdom, and judgment, and those who are there training for the Ministry of the Church, will have the influence of those ripe instructions wherein the precepts of the scholar are enforced by the example of the Christian gentleman.

If any satisfaction can be added to "the testimony of a good science," surely this venerable and faithful servant of the church, must be gratified by the unanimous and hearty expressions of confidence and respect from all quarters. To show that the same feeling pervades all connected with the Seminary, we depend, according to request, the following expression of the feelings of the students, and we may add that similar resolutions were passed by the Alumni at their annual meeting.

At a Meeting of the Middle Class of the General Theological Seminary, held on the Festival of St. John Baptist, June 24, 1848, the following Preamble and Resolutions were adopted.

Whereas, We have heard with unfeigned regret, of the resignation of the Rev. Bird Wilson, D. D., Professor of Systematic Divinity in the General Theological Seminary; Therefore,

Resolved, That by this resignation, the General Theological Seminary loses the valuable services of one who for twenty-seven years has performed his duties as Professor, with unflinching regularity, and eminent ability.

Resolved, That while we sincerely regret our loss, we look back with pleasure upon our past intercourse with the Rev. Professor of Systematic Divinity, characterized, as it has been in his part, by the most exemplary kindness and amiability.

Resolved, That it is our earnest hope and prayer that the Rev. Dr. Wilson may pass the evening of his days in that calm enjoyment which the recollection of past fidelity, and the hope of future happiness, can alone produce.

Resolved, That a copy of this Preamble and Resolutions be presented to the Rev. Professor of Systematic Divinity, and that they be published in the Church papers generally.

THE ANNUAL COMMENCEMENT of the General Theological Seminary was held on Friday morning in St. John's Chapel. The Right Rev. Dr. Delancey presided.

Morning Prayer was read the Rev. Messrs. Eigenbrodt and Weston. Bishop Delancey read the Ante-Communion Service, the Rev. Mr. Odenheimer reading the Epistle.

The following members of the Senior Class then advanced with the Faculty to the Chancel, and after being addressed by the Bishop, received the usual Testimonials as Graduates of the Seminary.

R. Ralston Cox,	Josiah Phelps,
T. Stafford Drowne,	Sylvanus Reed,
Theodore A. Eaton,	Horace H. Reide,
James F. Le Baron,	Robert C. Rogers,
Andrew Mackie, Jr.,	Rufus D. Stearns.

After which the Holy Communion was administered by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Odenheimer, Loutrell, and Clapp.

Bishop De Lancey's address to the graduating class, was a clear, practical, and solemn exhibition of the means by which under the Divine appointment, the Church was to be edified or built up. It was well calculated to make a deep impression upon the minds and hearts of those who were about entering upon the great work of the Gospel Ministry. The means chiefly dwelt upon, were, preaching of the Word of God, and prayer. On the former point the Bishop gave some most excellent and important practical counsels, as to the character of that preaching by which the Church is edified. On the subject of prayer, the Bishop dwelt chiefly upon the important influence of public prayer, as provided for in the ritual of the Church. In a most impressive manner he quoted the example and authority of Bishop White, in support of the weekday services. We trust this noble Address will be given to the Church.

ANOTHER CHURCH DESTROYED BY FIRE.—It is with extreme regret we learn that St. Paul's Church, Paterson, N. J., was totally destroyed by fire on the morning of the 28th inst., and more melancholy still, one of the congregation, a worthy man of the name of Johnson, lost his life in his endeavors to save some of the Church furniture. The fire originated in a manufactory near the Church, and destroyed with it Congress Hall, and other buildings. $3000 was insured on the Church, but its debts amount to about the same.—Churchman.

We sympathize deeply with the congregation who have suffered this calamity. After having struggled through many difficulties, and secured a more prosperous condition, they have been overwhelmed with this fearful loss. The insurance only covered a third of the value of the Church. Still let them not despair. The Church Herself is fire-proof, though her material buildings may be reduced to ashes. "The gates of hell shall not prevail against her," is the policy of her perpetual insurance! Be of good cheer then afflicted brethren! From out the ashes, over which you now mourn, you shall see the reality of which the Phoenix was but the fable. We shall soon expect an invitation to another consecration in Paterson. There are strong Church hearts there, and ready Church hands too, and these never fail. And surely there are hearts and hands elsewhere ready to help in such a case. We are ready to receive any voluntary offerings, and to transmit them at once. Wait not, friends of the Church, to be called on. God "loveth a cheerful giver," and He, who ruleth the raging of the elements, may be heard from this burning Church, calling upon His people to show their love to Him, and to His suffering flock.

We most heartily concur in the following remarks from the New York Churchman, and commend them to the notice of our city authorities.

SABBATH BREAKING.—Patrick McKeon was arrested yesterday morning, by officer McConnell, of the 16th ward, for carting stone on the Sabbath, and abusing the officer. He was taken to the 2d district police court, and committed by Justice Blake.

Yesterday morning the officers of the 11th ward arrested six men, mostly Germans, on a charge of gambling with cards on Sunday. The accused were committed for examination.—Evening Post.

Will any one inform us on what principle we are to reconcile the equity of the above commitments with the impunity granted to newsboys of crying their commodities through the streets every Sunday morning? If the object of the law be to preserve the sanctity of the Lord's Day, we cannot see why the public vending of newspapers does not fall under its lash as well as hard labor and gambling with cards. Or, if its object be to preserve religious decorum and morals agreeably to the sentiments and habits of the majority of the community, then we should think the public vending of newspapers as practised in our city, would be a more fitting object of punishment than either of the other offences. The carting of stone is comparatively a quiet employment, and gambling with cards is a sin that is committed in-doors, without the knowledge and of course without the disturbance of the religious and moral portion of society; while the hawking about of newspapers and the cries of the newsboys, are, to all persons who desire to keep the Lord's Day holy, a source of extreme and painful annoyance, and one from which they have no means of escape, and which is imposed upon them against their will.

We trust we shall not be understood as extenuating the offence of laboring, or gambling with cards, on the Lord's Day. The former (except in cases of necessity) and the latter (at all times reprehensible) are undoubtedly profanations of the Day, and violations of its sanctity, and we are thankful to live under laws which prohibit them. But certainly the laws ought to be equal in their operation; and we ask, merely for information, how it is that Patrick McKeon and a half dozen Germans should be punished for their desecration of the day, while some hundreds of boys are protected by the law in a course which is equally a violation of the sanctity of the day, which admits of no extenuation on the score of necessity or utility, and which is neither a less, nor less extensive source of annoyance and disturbance to the religious portion of the community. We should be glad to have the theory of the law explained.

THE FOURTH OF JULY AT BURLINGTON COLLEGE.—It was our privilege, among many others, escaping from the usual noise and smoke and gun powder odor, which distinguish this national festival, to spend a quiet and happy day of rational enjoyment at Burlington College. The fourth of July has especial honor at this place, because it is regarded as the birth day not only of a nation, but as the natal day of the College, one of those institutions to which our country must look as most important among the bulwarks and defences by which her glory and her liberties are to be secured.

It has been the great object of the Bishop to show the pupils of Burlington College that they can spend a happy day, and most properly celebrate such a festival without the use of gun powder, and that joy and gladness need not be attended with noise and riot. These, it must be owned, are great and important practical views to be impressed upon the rising generation. Their gravity and importance will appear more manifest to those who calmly reflect upon the sad waste of life and property consequent upon each celebration of our great national festival. In fact, we think, it is hazardous nothing to say that the celebrations of a century will cost more money and destroy more lives than were expended in the battles of the Revolution.

The feeling which prevails among the inhabitants of Burlington is favorable to such quiet celebrations.

This celebration began at nine o'clock by the young gentlemen of the college coming in procession, with their teachers, to pay their respects to the Bishop. They were drawn up in order before the front door of the Bishop's residence, where one of their number read a most appropriate address to the Bishop. To this the Bishop replied in his usual happy manner, and exhorted the pupils to celebrate this day in a manner becoming its hallowed recollections.

At one o'clock, a number of citizens and many parents of the pupils assembled at the College. A procession was formed, and then proceeded in order to the large hall which was appropriately decorated.

The exercises began by a choir of teachers and pupils singing "Hail Columbia." After this the Declaration of Independence was read by one of the teachers. After which the "Star Spangled Banner" was sung with great spirit. Then the Bishop delivered an Address, of which we will venture to say, none more appropriate, more useful, or more eloquent was heard in the length and breadth of the land. Its introduction was a thrilling and powerful eulogium upon the blessedness of peace. The argument went to show that the celebrations of the fourth of July were not to revive warlike recollections or hostile feelings towards the country from which the fathers of our republic separated. But the remembrances of past wars should rather excite thoughts of future peace. The conclusion of the address was singularly felicitous. A young friend of the Bishop's had been introduced by him to the poet and philosopher, Martin Farquhar Tupper, the well known author of "Proverbial Philosophy." The kindly feelings entertained by this distinguished author towards America have been expressed in some beautiful sonnets which we have already copied into the Banner. Through the friend whom the Bishop introduced he sent "a Loving ballad, addressed to brother Jonathan," full of wit and sparkling all through with bright and happy thoughts of mingled humor and noble sentiment. By a felicitous coincidence the letter, containing this ballad, reached the Bishop two days before. It suggested the subject of the address.

The reading of this ballad called forth continual expressions of pleasure and approbation. It will soon be made public, and we are sure will carry, in its bright and glittering tide of song, the name of Martin Farquhar Tupper far and wide through the land. His name will be more familiar and more loved, though before a known and cherished one, by his brother Jonathan.

The reading of this ballad was most appropriately followed by the singing of "Auld Lang Syne." The whole audience standing and joining in the chorus.

Immediately after the exercises a meeting was held, and a committee appointed to obtain the Bishop's Address for publication, and sufficient money was handed in at once to pay the printer.

After these delightful exercises, the pupils of the College entertained their friends with a very excellent collation. The rest of the day was spent by the pupils in their boats and on the beautiful college green in healthful and happy sports. All who shared these pleasures owned that a fourth of July so spent, was not only a day of happiness, but one of most useful and profitable occupation.

We are sure the following appeal from the Bishop of the diocese will not be unanswered:

The Parish of Christ Church, Adams county, a small and feeble band, are anxious to establish a parish library, to be composed of religious and other unexceptionable books, the circulation of which through the community generally may do good and at the same time conciliate regard for the Church. The rector having collected a considerable number of volumes, asks aid of those who have popular works adapted to such a library which they would be willing to give, or who could contribute small sums in money. The subscriber commends the object as a worthy one, and being about to leave books for it with Mr. George, No. 16 south Seventh street, would mention that Mr. G. has kindly consented to receive and deliver any contributions whether in money or books which may be made by others.

Missionary Annals.

To those benevolent donors, who have contributed to our necessities, and encouraged our efforts, some tokens of God's blessing on their contributions, will be acceptable. Some Missionary report to our friends seems as proper as a Missionary's acknowledgement, and the Missionary spirit in the Church would pine and die without its proper aliment, missionary facts. The various reports in the Spirit of Missions, for May, must have encouraged every heart that cherishes a watchful and prayerful interest in the prosperity of Zion, and a sympathy in the trials of her toil-worn laborers. These laborers, at home and abroad, share largely in the toils and difficulties of the ministry, and but sparingly in the emoluments and comforts of their brethren in some places; and the past two or three years have witnessed peculiar trials and exertions among them all. Our faithful brother at Little Rock writes, "The Lord has much blessed my parish, indeed, where has the Church, the Missionary field, brought forth more abundantly than in Arkansas; and who, (if the result is a test,) have labored more diligently than we poor fellows!" whose sorrows the Lord is turning into joy? In all these South-western borders, there is a voice of praise and thanksgiving, and, it may be truly said of our benefactors, who have encouraged us by their contributions and prayers, "the wilderness and solitary place have been made glad for them." The contributions of books alone which have been received at this mission, have, by God's blessing, been followed by encouraging results. We have received a good supply of Bibles, Prayer Books and Tracts, and books for the use of our Sunday Schools, and the arrival of a Parish Library is a new era in the history of this mission, and, if I mistake not, in the history of the Church west of the Mississippi. When the present Missionary came here in 1845, he had no Library beyond his Bible and Prayer Book and a few tracts, for nearly a year. There was no Library to which access could be had. At this time, within the precincts of this Parish, where the Church was then, "without form and void," we have a Sunday School Library which is read by the pupils and teachers of a flourishing Sunday School, and a good foundation laid, in the recent contribution of "the Bishop White Library Association," for a Parish Library. Our families, now 14 in number, as also other families and individuals, are supplied with Prayer Books and Tracts, and both parents and children mingle their voices in our responsive worship, and in the songs of Zion, which we now sing in this strange land. Our Librarian is the drummer of this garrison, recently confirmed, "a devout soldier, who, since a room was furnished for us here, has 'waited upon us continually.'" Previous to his enlistment under the banner of Christ, he was not particularly noticeable except for his respectful deportment and faithful attention to his duties. But, now, among the soldiers of the garrison, and the invalids of the hospital, he is benevolently active and useful, like Joseph among the King's prisoners in Egypt, he converses, reads and prays with them, distributes amongst them tracts, and gets them to Church. Some 20 miles down the river at the plantation of Gen. Arbuckle, on which are 30 servants, we have a Missionary in one of these whose name is John, a noble negro servant of the General's who has accompanied his master through many vicissitudes. He was baptized at Fort Gibson six years since, and confirmed here with 14 others at the recent Episcopal visitation, and returned, like the Ethiopian of old, to his place of duty, rejoicing; supplied, out of the donations of books received from our benevolent friends abroad, with the means of instruction for this flock of 30 household servants.

Last Sunday he came up with a view to attend our services, and, for the first time in his life, to enjoy the privilege of the holy communion. It was evidently "a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord" to his soul. He teaches the servants in a regular Sunday School, and makes himself very useful at the farm, and enjoys the confidence of all who know him, and stands, a monument of saving mercy, and a pre-eminent example to the negro population of this country.

In our Sunday School, at the Garrison, we have two classes of colored children, and our labors for this unfortunate class of people have not been in vain in the Lord.

I have baptized 9, one of whom was an adult, a free colored girl, well educated and intelligently pious, has been confirmed, and is now a regular, and consistent communicant. A negro servant, but a short time since, solicited a Prayer Book, which he thankfully received; and another there is, who spends his leisure, as ferryman, in reading the tracts, with which I am enabled to furnish him.

At one time, 3 negro servants, and as many Creek Indians were regularly instructed by the pupils of the Prairie Seminary, and the servants were found more teachable than the Indians. Of the latter class, we have had a few boys and girls in our school, no one of whom has left us, without some additional knowledge of the Church, and some little religious improvement, with a Prayer Book. One of them, a Seneca girl, whose name is Mary, I have since visited on a bed of suffering. I found her Prayer Book by her side, and her heart resting on the Saviour. She has since been baptized, and with her mother, confirmed: and now writes to me that her health is greatly improved, and that she still rejoices in the Saviour, whose name she has confessed. One little volume of pious meditations I gave her when she left us, she has circulated, as an instrument of doing good, in her neighborhood, where the means of religious instruction are almost unknown. I present these facts, that our benevolent donors may see that the instrumentalities with which they have furnished us, are usefully employed: and, by God's blessing, are contributing to the spiritual fertility and productiveness of a portion of the great Missionary field, not long since, morally barren and unfruitful. We wish to furnish each steamboat that traverses our uncertain river, with a Bible and Prayer Book—could we effect this very desirable object, much good would certainly result. It is truly gratifying to compare the present religious state of our communities with what it was three years ago, the change is obvious, almost miraculous:—we are no longer a Sabbath-breaking, but a Church-going community:—true, the din of business, and the noise of mirth are now sometimes heard on the Lord's day, but the sentiment of the people frowns upon every Sabbath violation,—and the Lord is honored, where He was once continually blasphemed. That our friends will be encouraged still to lend their aid, and offer their prayers, and that the Lord will send the latter as well as the former rain upon this needy portion of His vineyard, is the hope and prayer of

A WESTERN MISSIONARY.

For the Banner of the Cross.

The West—Indiana—Lafayette.

REV. AND DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

When one changes his residence for a new and distant place he notices many things in his new abode which escape the observation of older inhabitants, and by comparison or contrast is enabled to give an account of new scenes and society, which may be interesting to those at a distance. A residence in this place of seven or eight months gives the present writer this advantage.

I had often heard and read much of the "Great West;" but until November last I had never penetrated farther into its immense regions than Buffalo, Erie, Pittsburgh, and Maysville, Kentucky—places which lie only on its verge. Even here, on the bank of the Wabash, while, indeed, in the Great West, I am not any where near the "For West," for that is now receding to the Pacific. Still, however, so far as nature is concerned, I find myself in a new and strange region, while human beings are very much the same as I have found them on the hills, and in the valleys and crowded cities of the East.

On coming into the great valley of the Mississippi one is struck with the aspect and vast capabilities of these boundless and fertile plains. Before such a transition, he believes, on the representations of others, that it is destined, ere long, to become the centre of population, and eventually of wealth: but when he is here and looks around him to the distance of hundreds, I might say thousands, of miles, he sees that this must be the case eventually. The East will continue to have the advantage of its great and ever-growing commercial and manufacturing cities: and will for a long time continue to enjoy some advantages even in its villages and rural districts. But cities and villages are growing up in the West with a rapidity and vigor unknown to the older parts of our country; and the fertile vales and prairies are rapidly filling up with an enterprising and thrifty population, bringing with it all the agricultural improvements of older settlements. So that if the population of the East be not diminished by this incessant drain, it cannot keep pace with that of the West. In all respects, except proximity to the markets, the West has great advantages, especially in the superior fertility of the soil: and even as regards markets, railroads and canals, and telegraphic wires, are gradually overcoming our disadvantages, and placing us on an equality with the East.

As I can testify from personal observation and actual comparison, there is a very common mistake as respects the character of Western population. It is neither so rude and uncivilized, nor so immoral and irreligious, as many in the East are apt to think. Indeed, in every considerable place, a portion of the population is recently from the cities, villages, and rural districts of the older States, and equal in all respects to the aggregate, or medium, of those who remain behind. As regards buildings, and other improvements which characterize a civilized people, there is in our larger and more flourishing towns, a degree of elegance and taste no where to be found in the East—except in a few instances—south of New England and New York. Nothing like the same improvement had been made in twice the length of time in the older States.

From some cause or other Indiana has been regarded at the East as one of the rudest and most boorish States of the Great Valley; and many think it one of the last regions to be selected as a place of residence. Now, my acquaintance in this State is limited, but so far as it extends it warrants me in saying that I am acquainted with populous districts east of the mountains that would suffer in the comparison.

As regards the place in which I reside, Lafayette, I will now say a few words. It contains a population variously estimated at from 5000 to 6000. Perhaps the former is the true estimate. This population is derived from probably as many as twenty other States, and in this respect constitutes quite "a mixed multitude." But this sort of commixture is not adverse to the improvement of the race. There are now many persons of intelligence, taste, and refinement, as well as of enterprise and means. We have many large and tasteful private dwellings, adorned with beautiful yards, with trees and shrubbery—the choicest exotics from the East, as well as peculiar species indigenous to the West. In the grounds around my own residence, we have the locust, the linden, the horse-chestnut, the alanthus, the mulberry, the white pine, the arbor vitæ, the iron-wood, the chesnut, the catalpa, the sycamore, the laburnum, and others. Besides these there are several kinds of fruit trees, and a great variety of roses and shrubbery.

There are in the town—the city—several places of worship; none of them, however, characterised by much elegance or taste. The court-house surpasses those of many of the old and wealthy counties of the Eastern States. The amount of business exceeds that of any place of similar size I have ever seen.

As regards society, the different grades, or circles, are not so distinctly marked as in older places. Luxury and fashion walk abroad, and are seen in well-furnished drawing-rooms. Occasionally from two to three hundred invitations are issued for an evening party, and are generally honored. The entertainments would not disgrace places of similar size in the Atlantic States.

And now for religion and morality. I cannot speak very flatteringly on these points. There is a good deal of intemperance, and, I fear, a good deal of gambling and fraud, in the place. But I am told that a great improvement is perceptible; and evidently morality and virtue are gaining the ascendancy in public estimation. The religion is greatly diversified in character, as there are many different sects.

It will gratify you to learn that one man of God, a gentleman of means, has done much in this place for the Church, and of course, for the order and morality of the place. I refer to the Rev. Dr. S. A. Johnson, now Rector of St. John's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. He settled here about eleven or twelve years ago, when there were but two or three Church families in the place. He supported himself; and aided in erecting a neat little Church, presenting the ground on which it was built, which cost him, I think, $1500. His exemplary piety, his meek and unassuming manners, his able and faithful ministrations, and his unostentatious liberality, engaged the confidence and affections of all, and enabled him to gather around him a congregation highly respectable in standing and intelligence, and the largest Church congregation in the State. When, oh! when shall we see many other clergymen of the Church seeking the glory of God and His Church, and their own happiness, by pursuing a similar course? The character of Dr. Johnson in this place is one which any one might court. It is a legacy to the Church in this Diocese. All respected and loved him, even those who did not like his sound and consistent Churchmanship.

Dr. J. received no salary for his services, and on this account it has been supposed that his congregation gave nothing for the support of the Gospel, and grew up in habits of parsimony. But this is a mistake. With some assistance (probably) beside the lots on which it was built, they erected a Church which must have cost nearly $3000, and paid for it; and in addition to contributions for missions, and contingent expenses, and some aid to Churches elsewhere, they erected—as a present—a house upon the Doctor's grounds, close by the Church, at an expense of about $3500; and upon the premises he himself expended about $2000 more; making one of the most beautiful residences on the Wabash. This quasi Rectory, Dr. Johnson has leased to the congregation for ten years at a nominal rent. This property would probably command a rent of $300 per annum, and is occupied by the present incumbent, the Rev. Dr.

McCullough, who receives from the congregation besides, a salary of $600. Thus there are few congregations which do more in proportion to their number and means. Besides this, the Church has just been enlarged, improved, and newly and handsomely furnished, at considerable expense.

This is stated to stimulate other clergymen of sufficient means to come to the West, settle in new and thriving villages, and do likewise. So will their works in like manner follow them. In no other way can they do more good, or reap a richer reward.

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

DIED, at Wilmington, Del., on the 13th inst., WILLIAM GAYLEY, aged 78 years.

Mr. Gayley was one of the oldest communicants in Trinity Church, (the old Swedes,) and adorned his position by a suitable life. He occupied an humble station, but was universally beloved. And having been connected with the Church for more than half a century, was regarded as one of the venerable few who remain as connecting links between the present and the past. He had acted in the capacity of sexton, was subsequently elected a Vestryman, on account of his worth, and as an example of humble piety, and in this capacity, served the Church until his death. By his industry and economy he had accumulated a little property, and after appropriating a sum for the comfortable provision for his aged wife, having no children nor poor relations, he made, before his death, a donation of one thousand dollars to Trinity Church. This act of liberality is worthy of remembrance, as being an evidence of devotion and true Christian charity in one who felt under obligations to God, by the Church, for all his blessings, both temporal and spiritual. This deed of munificence by an humble and faithful man of God, should prompt others to similar acts of liberality, in making provision for the perpetuation of the institutions of Christ's Church—which is designed to be not only the means of imparting spiritual blessings, but furnishing a home for all God's poor. It is but proper to state that although Mr. Gayley had for many years designed to leave the principal part of his little property to Trinity Church, and some ten or fifteen years ago made a will accordingly, yet his attention was again called to the subject, by pastoral counsels, prompted by those rubrics, found in the office for the visitation of the sick—the observance of which his Rector did not feel authorised to neglect, that declare that "if" the sick person "hath not before disposed of his goods," he is to "be admonished to make his will," &c.

"The minister shall not omit earnestly to move such sick persons as are of ability, to be liberal to the poor."

What might we not expect from pastoral visitations, if the rectors of our Churches would always follow the wise counsels which have been given for their guidance. These facts have been now made public, because of your own remarks on this subject in a recent editorial, although this occurred some weeks before. They may furnish encouragement to others in the discharge of a very delicate but responsible duty.

Wilmington, June 22, 1848.

From the Church Times.

Address of Bishop Kemper, to the Eleventh Convention of Indiana.

BELOVED BRETHREN:

Agreeably to my promise, I again appear among you as your Bishop. I have, however, but little to report. Soon after I left you, I had my first western sickness, and when through the favor of our heavenly Father my health was partly restored, it was deemed expedient for me to go to the East. The business of the General Convention detained me there until the navigation of the Lakes had become dangerous. Your delegation as well as myself returned home in safety, truly grateful, I trust, for the merciful protection which had been extended over us, and conscious that to the extent of our ability we had done our duty at the great Council of the American Church. I had intended to visit the Diocese in my usual manner during the spring which has just passed. Finding however, by correspondence and occasional intercourse, that you were not discouraged at the events of the past year, I determined to leave to my successor whom you will doubtless now choose, those ecclesiastical acts which are always interesting and endearing, and in the performance of which he would the sooner become acquainted with the condition and prospect of your several parishes. My pledge for administering the diocese, so long as there is a necessity thereof, shall not be forgotten.

The printed Journal minutely details the occurrences of our last Convention. Divine service was frequently celebrated during the session. I preached the night we adjourned; and again the next morning. During that day, Sunday, the 15th July, I likewise baptized an infant at the request of the rector; and he admitted five adults into the bosom of the Church by the same holy sacrament. The state of this parish,* I considered quite promising, and there were prospects, which have I believe been fully realized, under the indefatigable exertions of our brother, the Rev. Dr. Killikelly, of having another parish organized at Pittsburgh, a flourishing little village, almost immediately opposite Delphi.

On Thursday, 2d March, St. Paul's Church, La Porte, was consecrated. On this occasion, the lessons were read by the Rev. Mr. Brown, the prayers by the Rev. Mr. Engle of Niles, Michigan, the instrument of donation by the rector, and the sentence of consecration by the Rev. Mr. Halsted. I preached; and was truly delighted to find so neat and comfortable a building. After an arduous struggle, the wish of many years has been accomplished. The congregation can now assemble, whenever called together by their able pastor, in their own house of worship, which has been erected by their own means; and which they were enabled in all sincerity to dedicate to Almighty God, for they were not in debt.

A severe snow storm, and the delicate health of our estimable brother, the Rev. Mr. Halsted, prevented me from visiting Mishawaka, where I had an appointment the evening of the 3d inst.

On Sunday the 5th, I instituted the Rev. Solon W. Manney, rector of St. Paul's Church, La Porte, and preached the sermon. We were assisted in the solemn services by the Rev. Messrs. Brown and Halsted.

That night, I administered the holy rite of confirmation to two persons in Trinity Church, Michigan city, and preached. On Ash-Wednesday, 5th March, two services were celebrated, at both of which I preached; and in the morning after the second lesson, catechised, at the request of the rector, the Rev. F. C. Brown, the large and flourishing Sunday school, or rather the catechetical classes of the parish.

The Church at Vincennes has been vacant for eighteen months, and every effort thus far to supply it has been unavailing. Anxiously solicitous for its welfare, I was enabled to travel from town and devote a day or two to its spiritual interests. I was most kindly received, and have every reason to believe, that the members have continued faithful to the sacred cause of the Redeemer. I preached there last Saturday night, the 27th of May, and held several services on the Lord's day following, during which I baptized one adult and two infants, confirmed three persons, administered the holy communion, and preached two sermons. It is a station of no little interest, and presents an inviting and promising field to a self-sacrificing clergyman.

Another candidate has been added to our list, Mr. George A. Chase, who was the successful Principal of the Franklin County Seminary, at Brookville, and is now Professor in St. John's College, and Cincinnati Classical Academy.

The Rev. Thomas B. Fairchild has removed from Lawrenceburg, and is now the Missionary at Logansport.

The Rev. Colley A. Foster has been transferred from the diocese of Pennsylvania, and is now officiating as the Missionary at Evansville.

The Rev. John W. McCullough, D.D. has removed from the diocese of Delaware, and has become the rector of St. John's Church, Lafayette.

The Rev. Robert B. Claxton has been transferred from the diocese of Pennsylvania, and is now officiating at Madison.

And the Rev. Henry P. Powers who has been officiating with much acceptance at Fort Wayne, presented to me this morning his letters of transfer from Bishop McCoskry.

Thus, some most important vacancies have been supplied; and if I am not greatly mistaken, the reports of the clergy now to be read to you, will show that the diocese is in a healthy and growing state; and that amidst many trials and difficulties, we have abundant cause to thank God for the past, and take courage for the future.

I have lately transferred the Rev. N. A. Okerton, deacon, to the diocese of Virginia.

The renunciations are still alarmingly frequent. No less than seven have been reported to me during the last twelve months. How careful should we be in reference to the preparation of young men for the ministry! They should be duly educated and thoroughly trained; and their studies should be pursued under such circumstances as will enable two or more respectable divines to testify to their godly conversation, and their devoted and their self-denying spirit.

I shall be happy to unite with you in every measure that may promote the honor of our adorable Master, and the prosperity of the Church.

JACKSON KEMPER, Bishop.

We have been favoured with a copy of "the Rhode Island Country Journal," from which we take the following account.

The Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The annual meeting of this Board of Missions is now in session in this city. It assembled Tuesday in Grace Church. Divine service was celebrated at 10½ o'clock, A. M. Morning prayer was read by Rev. C. H. Halsey, Secretary and General Agent of the Domestic Committee, assisted by the Rev. P. P. Irving, Secretary and General Agent of the Foreign Committee; the Ante-Communion service by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Connecticut, assisted by the Right Rev. Bishop of Maine, who read the Epistle, and the Right Rev. Bishop of New Hampshire, who read the Gospel. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Thomas M. Clark, Assistant Minister of Trinity Church, Boston.

The service for celebration of the Lord's Supper was read by Right Rev. Bishop of Rhode Island, assisted by Right Rev. Bishop of Massachusetts. The Elements were distributed by Right Rev. the Bishop of Connecticut, assisted by Bishops of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Hampshire and Maine.

At the close of religious exercises, the Board proceeded to business, Right Rev. Bishop of Connecticut in the Chair. The Rev. Mr. Van Pelt was re-elected Secretary, and then the Board adjourned to meet at 3½ o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON.

The Board again met at 3½ o'clock, P. M., the Rev. Bishop of Connecticut in the Chair.

Rev. Mr. Irving, Foreign Secretary, presented and read the annual report of the accounts of the Treasurer of the Foreign Committee, which was referred to its proper committee.

The Rev. Mr. Halsey, Domestic Secretary, presented and read the annual report of the accounts of the Treasurer of Domestic Committee, which was also referred.

Mr. Irving also read the joint report of the editors of the Spirit of Missions. This periodical is still supported without tax upon the treasury. The number distributed gratuitously to the clergy is on the increase, and calls for a proportionate effort on their part to extend its circulation and to obtain new subscribers among their parishioners.

The Rev. Mr. Halsey, Domestic Secretary and General Agent, then read the annual report of the Domestic Committee, which, with accompanying documents, was referred to a committee of five, of which the Right Rev. Bishop Burgess is Chairman.

The Rev. Mr. Irving, Foreign Secretary and General Agent, then read the annual report of Foreign Committee, with accompanying documents, which was also referred to a committee of five, of which the Right Rev. Bishop of New Hampshire is Chairman.

The Secretary of the Board (Rev. Mr. Van Pelt) read a communication from Right Rev. Bishop Southgate, at Constantinople, complaining of the action of the Foreign Committee in its effects upon the mission entrusted to him. This, with a communication from Right Rev. Bishop Boone of China, was referred.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

The Board met. Present, Right Rev. Bishops of Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, and Maine, besides several clergy and laity from different parts of the country.

The Bishop of Connecticut, being Senior Bishop, presided, and opened the meeting with prayers. The Secretary presented and read the annual report of Missionary Bishop of the North-West, which was referred to the committee in charge of other documents relating to domestic missions.

The Committee on annual accounts of Domestic and Foreign Treasuries, reported that the same were correct. By these it appears that about $28,500 have been received during the past year by the Domestic Treasury, and about $41,500 by the Foreign Treasury.

The Bishop of Maine, as Chairman of Committee on Domestic Report, presented an interesting report and a series of resolutions, calculated to awaken attention to the importance of this subject, which were severally adopted by the Board.

The committee on vacancies reported one vacancy in the Board, which was filled by the appointment of Rev. Francis L. Hawks, D.D., Rector of Christ Church, New Orleans.

The Bishop of New Hampshire, as Chairman of Committee on Foreign Report, presented a report and series of resolutions, which were calculated to remove certain difficulties which might have arisen upon this subject, which resolutions were severally adopted.

The Board then adjourned to meet at 4½ o'clock, P. M. The Board again met at that hour, and after attending to some business of a general nature, adjourned sine die, after resolving to hold the next annual meeting in the city of New York, and a vote of thanks to the Rector and Vestry of Grace Church for the use of their church, and to the inhabitants of Providence for their hospitality to the members of the Board.

An interesting missionary meeting was held last evening at St. John's Church, in this city, at which several addresses and a collection for the object were made.

NEW YORK.—EPISCOPAL ACTS BY THE BISHOP OF WESTERN NEW YORK, ACTING BY REQUEST OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE OF THE DIOCESE:

Confirmed in St. Thomas', Sunday morning, 25th ult., 37 persons; in All Saints', in the afternoon, same day, 40, including 2 from the Church of the Nativity. In St. Cornelius, Tuesday afternoon, 27th ult., 20 persons; in St. Mark's Williamsburg, Tuesday evening, 20, including 4 from Emmanuel Church, Brooklyn, and 1 from St. Paul's College. In Brooklyn, one sick person, in private, from St. Paul's, Albany.

CONFIRMATION AT THE SOLDIER'S MISSION.—On Tuesday afternoon last, Bishop De Lancey, according to appointment, administered this Holy Rite at the Church of St. Cornelius, Governor's Island, and seldom, if ever, have we witnessed it under circumstances of greater beauty or higher excitement. The humble, yet deeply reverential edifice—the loveliness of the scenery around—the fresh and cooling breezes from the Bay which it overlooks—still more, all the "rich pomp and circumstance of glorious war"—humbling itself in the House of God, and at the foot of the Cross, and seeking there a blessing from Apostolic hands—all this went to form a scene that will not soon be effaced from our hearts and memory. The number actually confirmed was nineteen, (six being necessarily absent)—all of the army, and a large proportion common soldiers—thus evincing the unsoundness of that popular opinion which goes to divorce the Christian life from the Military. We were struck, on the contrary, with the deeply-reverential manner of all the troops present, who crowded the Church to overflowing—going to show that religious truth had taken at least some hold of their hearts and affections. Of the collection then taken up—amounting to but $8 30—one half was immediately remitted for the purchase of Prayer Books from the Bible and Prayer Book Society, whose liberality has already gone beyond their means in donations to this Mission, and to which liberality its success, (under God,) is doubtless greatly to be attributed. The remaining half of the collection is applied to the purchase of Tracts for distribution, and books for the Sunday School.

LAYING OF CORNER-STONE OF THE CHURCH OF ST. JOHN BAPTIST.—Feast of St. John Baptist, June 24. The Bishop laid the corner-stone of the above Church, about to be erected on Lexington Avenue. The procession was formed at the residence of John H. Costar, Esq., at 5 o'clock, P. M. In addition to the Bishop and the Rector, there were present the Rev. Drs. Seabury, Haight, Price, Schroeder—Rev. Messrs. L. Carter, R. Cox, Eigenbrodt, Vinton, Harison, Leonard, Howland, Loutrel, Weston, Hart, Mines, Little and Peters, nearly all of whom were habited in surplices.

The Rev. Dr. Schroeder announced the contents of the leaden box, as follows, viz:

Bible, Book of Common Prayer, Constitution and Canons of the Church in the United States, and the Diocese of New York, and a paper containing the name of the church, with the date of its incorporation, names of Rector, Church Wardens, and Vestrymen, the Architect, the donors of the land, the date of laying the corner-stone, and the name of the Bishop performing the ceremony.

The Rector delivered an excellent and appropriate address, a copy of which will be found in our columns. The remaining services were by the Bishop.

The lots for this church were a gift.

The church will be erected in the pointed or Gothic style of architecture, and of that particular character generally denominated early decorated, and which prevailed in England during the reign of Edward the First. It will consist of a nave and aisle, 80 feet by 50 feet. Chancel 22 feet in depth, with a sacristy or vestry on the north side—and a tower and spire at the south-west corner of the nave, 130 feet in height. The roof will be of open timber work—those of clerestory and chancel being supported by arched ribs springing from corbels. The tracery in the windows will be varied, as is oftentimes found in ancient examples; and it is in contemplation to fill the east window with rich painted glass, by Warrington, of London, which, if carried into effect, will be the first instance in this country in which glass of the true mediæval character will have been introduced.

We are pleased to know that this undertaking is commenced under the most auspicious circumstances. The site is an elevated one, in a rapidly growing portion of the city, and where a new church will, ere long, be needed. We trust nothing will occur to impede the progress of the erection of the edifice, and when completed and consecrated to the service of the Ever Living God, may it be a home and a resting-place for many weary souls.—Churchman.

MARYLAND.—CONSECRATIONS.—On Thursday in Whitsun week, June 15th, Grace Church, Elk Ridge Landing, was solemnly consecrated to the honor of the great Name of God. The Deed of Donation and Request to consecrate was read by the Rev. James E. Van Bokkelen the minister of the Church; the sentence of Consecration by the Rev. Daniel Henshaw; the Bishop read the Ante-Communion service, preached, and administered the Holy Communion.

On Saturday of the same week, June 17th, the chapel of the College of St. James was consecrated by the name of St. James's Chapel. The Resolutions of the Trustees, requesting consecration were read, and the deed of covenant appropriating the Chapel handed to the Bishop, by Joseph C. Passmore, Esq., Treasurer of the Board. The sentence of Consecration was read by the Rev. James A. Buck; the Bishop preached, and administered the Holy Communion. The Chapel, enlarged to double its original length last summer, has been additionally beautified by the insertion of a circular East window of rich stained glass.

On the evening of the same day, after Evening Prayers in the chapel, the students in the Grammar School and College, with the Faculty, Trustees, and visitors of the clergy and laity, having gone from the chapel to the burying ground in procession singing the 69th selection from the Psalms, the burying ground of the College was consecrated, with the service used for that purpose in this diocese.

ORDINATION.—On Trinity Sunday, in St. James's Chapel, Joseph C. Passmore, Robert G. H. Clarkson, and Alexander D. Jones were admitted to the holy order of Deacons.

The Bishop preached. The candidates were presented by the Rev. Dr. Bowman of Pennsylvania.

The Rev. Messrs. Passmore and Clarkson will continue their connexion with the College of St. James; the former as Vice Rector of the College, and the latter as Rector of the Grammar School. The Rev. Mr. Jones is officiating in St. Mark's Chapel, St. Mary Anne Parish, Cecil county.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. J. H. Morrison has resigned the charge of St. John's Church, Richmond, Virginia, and accepted that of St. John's, Montgomery, Alabama.

NEGLECT OF OPPORTUNITIES.—All the dealings of God in the physical universe abundantly shew that he has attached fearful penalties to the neglect of opportunities. Take the case of a slothful husbandman. Such an one neglects the seed-time; and what is his situation at harvest? While the fields about him are waving with the yellow grain, ripe for the sickle, his ground is an uncultivated waste. Yet a few days, and the storms of winter howl round him; and he is in famine, and want, and misery. His "harvest is past," his "summer is ended," he is "not saved." Or look at him who has neglected youth, that golden season for mental, moral, and physical improvement, and has devoted it to idleness and vice. What are the consequences of his course? Poverty, disease, loss of character, of intellect, of affection, and in most cases an untimely death. Now if such are dealings of God in the physical, we have every reason to expect the same in the moral world. If the husbandman who neglects seed-time and summer, starves in the winter; if the youth who has plunged into vicious excesses, perishes; there is every reason to expect that he who neglects the spiritual seed time, will not be saved in the harvest of the end of the world.—Rev. B. D. Winslow.

Christian Sympathy.

BY THE REV. EDWARD C. JONES.

"Weep with them that weep."—ROMANS, 12-15.

Yes, weep with them that weep,
Who bend in speechless sorrow;
Where lies in dreamless sleep,
The breast that knows no morrow;
Thou too must wail the dead,
And have thy heart-links broken,
Thy tear-drops must be shed,
Though grief, be all unspoken.
Then let thy soul go forth,
In true and kindly feeling,
A single word has worth,
That word, thy love revealing.
The whispered word of God,
The hand's own friendly pressure,
To him who feels the Rod,
Is more than India's treasure.
As sunbeams seek the wave,
And dews the smiling blossom,
Thus "balm and oil" will crave,
Thy brother's aching bosom;
In Wealth thou may'st be poor,
And have no gift to offer,
Be Feeling then thine ore,
And Sympathy thy coffer;
Thus when thy heart is crushed,
Thy ties by Death all riven,
Thy sorrows shall be hushed,

America and Great Britain:

The Address at Burlington College, on the seventy-second Anniversary of American Independence, July 4, 1848; by the Right Rev. George Washington Doane, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of New Jersey, President of the College. Burlington: Edmund Morris, at the Missionary Press, 1848.

The great gift of God to man is peace. The angels sang it, when they brought from heaven the welcome message of a Saviour born: "Glory be to God on high, and on earth, peace." And, when the Saviour was about to go again to heaven, His message to His disciples, and, through them, to us, was still the same: "Peace I leave with you; My peace I give unto you." The gifts of God to man are sacred trusts. They are not his own. He holds them for his kind; and must account for them to God. Of nothing is this truer, than of peace. Peace is a rare thing. It is the halcyon weather of the heart; when the virtues brood, and all the charities are teeming with a warmer and more genial life. The Sabbath morning of Creation was not so serene, in its solemn hush; nor Plato's loveliest dream, the music of the Spheres, more exquisite in harmony. Perfect, in patriotism, as in piety, was that prayer of Royal William, for the people, and the country, of his love: "Pray for peace of Jerusalem!" And, loveliest of the strains of prayer, and fittest for an angel's voice, is that, which we have from our fathers' Liturgy, "Give peace, in our time, O God; because there is none other that fighteth for us, but only thou, O God!"

have not forgotten, that the great public document,* which has just been read before us, as the manner of this celebration was the solemn prelude of a long and arduous war, between nations; who, in the sight of God, stood, as a mother and child. Nor, that, in thirty years, they were again engaged in war. Nor, that, since then, the danger, once and again, has been most imminent, that they must bathe themselves in blood. rather because these things have been so, that I have spoken thus. Because, as one that has to do with young and tender minds, I would be careful for their first impressions. Because, in settling, as the usage of this College, to be kept, I have, to "the last syllable of recorded time," the observance of the birth-day of our nation, I would disavow, now and forever, myself, for you, my friends, and for these children, the faintest shadow of a thought, that it involves the slightest remnant of a hostile feeling, toward that great nation, from whose womb we sprung, and, at whose bursting breasts, our fathers all were nursed. That, so far from that, a fit and proper use of this, our nation's holiday, is the renewal of the vows of love, which brothers owe to brothers. That, having fought our way to man's estate, and won the prize for which we fought, and made it glorious before men and angels, we can well afford to shake hands, and be friends; and, none the less, but some the more, that we have quarrelled twice, and fought it out.† That, having tried the issues of the fight, and tasted all its woes, our thoughts are turned to peace; as God's great gift to us, and our great trust for man. That, so God help us, we will fight no more; and, least of all, with our own brethren of the blood: but, will set forth, to all mankind, as truths, which freemen only feel, that, the two nations of the world, who know what freedom is, and how to use it, are too great to fight; that, neither can require of either, what the other should not give; that, where it cannot quite agree, we can agree to disagree; that, we have common duties, to perform; a common trust, for human kind, to execute; a common source, from which our hearts all fill their cisterns, with the same red blood; a common language, which our mothers' voice first made familiar to our ears, in lullabies; in which we wooed and won our wives; in which our children lisped and prattled nature's loveliest melodies to all our hearts; a common stock of learning and of letters, such as all the world beside has not to show; and, best and dearest of them all, a common Church, a common altar, and the common prayers. Not, that the acts and efforts of our patriot fathers shall be disavowed, or disregarded. Not, that the trials and the toils, the struggles and the sacrifices, of the men of seventy-six, can ever cease to be our heritage and glory. Not, that the memory of Lexington and Bunker Hill, of Monmouth, Princeton, Trenton, ever can grow pale. But, that, things done are finished; that by-gones should be by-gones; that a fight, fought through, is done; that the only justifiable end of war is true and lasting peace; that life was made for love; that nations have a mission and a trust; that Great Britain and America are set, for the two hemispheres, to be the feuglemen of freedom, and the standard-bearers of the Cross.

These obvious and most enviable truths, God, by His gracious providence, is making real, in our time. The ready heart and open hand, which poured the golden treasures of our garner on the hearths of starving Ireland, with an eagerness, which gain has never prompted, an impetuosity which commerce never felt, touched all the tenderest places in the British heart; and, when the threatened demonstration of the Chartists, but the other day, frightened "the isle from its propriety," the pulseless stillness, in which an anxious nation waited, on our Western strand, to hear the issue, and the manly burst of joyful gladness which welled up to God, to own His mercy, to the nation and the Church, in which our fathers worshipped and were nurtured, have stirred the truest and the deepest pulses of the heart of England; and knit her to us, with a bond of cordial, and, I trust imperishable love. We may well rejoice, that these things are. The world is stirred, and tossed, and agitated, like a seething caldron. An hour upturns a throne. Another, and the new republic is the crater of a new volcano. Another, and perhaps a throne is cast up, with its fierce and fiery flood. No man can say, this day, what nation on the Continent of Europe is not involved in civil war. No man can say, what government is not the creature and the prey of a mad mob. No man can say, what instincts of nature are desecrated, what charities of life are trampled under foot, what holiest places are profaned. It seems the trial-hour of Europe; and, it may be, of the world. In human view, the salient points of hope, for Truth and Freedom; and for Christianity, as charged with both, and, indispensable to their existence, are now, America and England. If God keep us at peace, hold us erect in our position with the nations, and make us faithful to our trust for man, the issue, with His blessing, is an issue full of hope. A new order of things may be established, on a better basis, and to better purposes. Freedom secured by Law. Order enforced by Love. Patriotism purified by Religion. The World subjected to the Cross. Time made the foretaste of Immortality. That it may be so, let us unite our prayers. That it may be so, let us combine our efforts. Let us devote the day to thoughts and offices of love. Let us devote our lives to acts and influences of peace. And, for ourselves, and for our brothers of the blood, and in the faith, let the one strife hereafter ever be, which shall do most to realize the angel's hymn, and bring heaven down to earth: "Glory be to God on high; and on earth peace, good will to men!"

A Poet and a Painter of our own, a Poet and a Painter for all time, Washington Allston, in years, now long gone by, uttered such thoughts and sentiments as these, in words, which cannot die. His noble lyric, "England and America," among the very noblest of its name, sounds, like a trumpet, through all time, and thrills through every heart.

† Iræ amantium, amoris reintegratio.

Though ages long have past,
Since our fathers left their home,
Their pilot, in the blast,
O'er untravelled seas to roam,
Yet lives the blood of England in our veins;
And, shall we not proclaim
That blood of honest fame,
Which no tyranny can tame,
By its chains?

While the language free and bold
Which the bard of Avon sung,
In which our Milton told
How the vault of Heaven rung,
When Satan, blasted, fell with all his host;
While these with reverence meet,
Ten thousand echoes greet,
And, from rock to rock repeat,
Round our coast:

While the manners, while the arts,
That mould a nation's soul,
Still cling around our hearts,
Between, let ocean roll,
Our joint communion breaking with the sun;
Yet, still, from either beach,
The voice of blood shall reach,
More audible than speech,
We are one.

And now, this day, as from another generation, there comes to me, by the last steamer, an echo to this glorious trumpet-rally of the nations. A dear young friend,* the son of one of the best friends I ever had, commended, by my letters, to the true English hearts, who have enshrined me in their love, visiting at Albury, the delightful residence of Martin Farquhar Tupper, the author of "Proverbial Philosophy," an English gentleman, in every highest sense, and a true Christian Poet, sends me a ballad, written by Mr. Tupper, in honour of the visit; with the expression of his wish, that I will make it public, in America. Can I better do it than, here, with you, my children, and my friends? You will say, with me, that, had he known our gathering, he could not have fitted an apter shaft, nor given it happier aim. It is dated, "Albury, June 8, 1848;" and is entitled.

A LOVING BALLAD, TO BROTHER JONATHAN;

FROM MARTIN FARQUHAR TUPPER.

Ho, brother, I'm a Britisher,
A chip of heart of oak,
That wouldn't warp or swerve or stir,
From what I thought or spoke:
And you, a blunt and honest man,
Straight forward, kind and true;
I tell you, brother Jonathan,
That you're a Briton, too!

I know your heart, an open heart,
I read your mind and will;
A greyhound, ever on the start,
To run for honour, still:
And, shrewd to scheme a likely plan,
And, stout to see it done;
I tell you, brother Jonathan,
That you and I are one.

There may be jealousies and strife,
For men have selfish ends;
But petty quarrels ginger life,
And help to season friends;
And Pundits, who, with solemn scan,
Judge humans most aright,
Decide it, testy Jonathan,
That brothers always fight.

Two fledgeling sparrows, in one nest,
Will chirp about a worm;
Then, how should eaglets meekly rest,
The nurslings of the storm?
No, while their rustled pinions fan
The eyrie's downy side,
Like you and me, my Jonathan,
It's all for love and pride.

"God save the Queen" delights you still,
And "British Grenadiers;"
The good old strains your heart-strings thrill,
And hold you by both ears:

* George Henry Warren, travelling with his brother Stephen E. Warren; both of Troy, New York. They are the sons of Nathan Warren, who was the brother of Esaias and Stephen; the sons of Eliakim and Phebe Warren. Five names have never stood for more of purity and piety and charity; nor has the Church had truer children. They are now all at rest; and their memory is blessed.

And we—O, hate us, if you can,
For we are proud of you—
We like you, brother Jonathan,
And "Yankee Doodle," too.

There's nothing foreign in your face,
Nor strange upon your tongue;
You come not of another race,
From baser lineage sprung:
No, brother, though away you ran,
As truant boys will do,
Still, true it is, young Jonathan,
My fathers fathered you.

Time was—it was not long ago—
Your grandsires went with mine,
To battle traitors, blow for blow,
For England's royal line:
Or, tripp'd to court to kiss Queen Anne,
Or worship royal Bess;
And you and I, good Jonathan,
Went with them, then, I guess.

Together, both—'twas long ago—
Among the Roses, fought;
Or, charging fierce the Paynim foe,
Did all knight-errants ought:
As Cavalier or Puritan,
Together pray'd or swore;
For John's own brother, Jonathan,
Was simple John, of yore.

There lived a man, a man of men,
A king, on fancy's throne;
We ne'er shall see his like again,
The globe is all his own:
And, if we claim him of our clan,
He half belongs to you;
For Shakspeare, happy Jonathan,
Is yours, and ours, too.

There was another glorious name,
A poet for all time,
Who gained "the double first" of fame,
The beautiful, sublime;
And, let us hide him as we can,
More miserly than pelf,
Our Yankee brother, Jonathan,
Cries "halves!" in Milton's self.

Well, well; and every praise of old,
That makes us famous still;
You would be just, and may be bold,
To share it, if you will:
Since England's glory first began,
Till—just the other day,
The half is yours—but, Jonathan,
Why did you run away?

Oh, brother, could we both be one,
In nation and in name,
How gladly would the very sun
Lie basking in our fame!
In either world, to lead the van,
And, "go ahead," for good;
While each, to John and Jonathan,
Yields tribute-gratitude.

Add but your stripes, and golden stars,
To our St. George's Cross;
And never dream of mutual wars,
Two dunces' mutual loss:
Let us two bless, where others ban,
And love when others hate;
And so, my cordial Jonathan,
We'll fit, I calculate.

What more? I touch not holier strings,
A loftier strain to win;
Nor glance at prophets, priests and kings,
Or heavenly kith and kin:
As friend with friend, and man with man,
O, let our hearts be thus—
As David's love to Jonathan,
Be Jonathan's to us!

From Chambers' Journal.

Danish Justice.

The war had broken out between England and France; Bonaparte had broken the treaty of Amiens; all was consternation amongst our countrymen in India, particularly those who had valuable cargoes at sea, and those who were about to return to their native land. I was one of the latter class; so I joyfully accepted a passage home on board a Dane—Denmark, as yet, remaining neuter in our quarrel.

So far as luxury went, I certainly found her very inferior to our regular Indianmen; but as a sailer, she was far superior, and in point of discipline, her crew was as well regulated and as strictly commanded as the crew of a British man-of-war. In fact, such order, regularity and implicit obedience I could never have believed to exist on board a merchantman.

The chief mate was one of the finest young men I ever saw. He had just been promoted to his present post—not from the mere fact of his being the owner's son, but really from sterling merit. He was beloved by the crew, amongst whom he had served, as is usual in the Danish service, five years, and was equally popular with his brother officers and the passengers returning to Europe.

The only bad character we had on board was the cook, a swarthy, ill-looking Portuguese, who managed somehow or other daily to cause some disturbance amongst the seamen. For this he had often been reprimanded; and the evening when this sketch opens, he had just been released from irons, into which he had been ordered for four-and-twenty hours by the chief mate, for having attempted to poison a sailor who had offended him. In return for having punished him thus severely, the irritated Portuguese swore to revenge himself on the first officer.

The mate, who was called Charles, was walking in the waist with a beautiful young English girl, to whom he was engaged to be married, stopping occasionally to admire the flying-fish, as they skimmed over the surface of the water, pursued by their cruel destroyer, talking over the anticipated bliss their union would confer, their hopes and fears, the approval of their parents, their bright prospects, indulging in future scenes of life, as steady as the trade-wind before which they were quietly running—when suddenly, ere a soul could interpose, or even suspect his design, the cook rushed forward and buried his knife with one plunge into the heart of the unfortunate young man, who fell without a cry, as the exulting Portuguese burst forth into a demoniac laugh of triumph.

Unconscious of the full extent of her bereavement, the poor girl hung over him; and as a friend, who had rushed forward to support him, drew the knife from his bosom, her whole dress, which was white, was stained with his blood. With an effort Charles turned towards her, gave her one last look of fervent affection, and as the blade left the wound, fell a corpse in the arms of him who held him.

By this time the captain had come on deck. He shed tears like a child, for he loved poor Charles as his own son. The exasperated crew would instantly have fallen on the assassin, and taken summary vengeance, so truly attached had they been to the chief mate, and were only kept within bounds by their commander's presence. The cook, who appeared to glory in his deed, was instantly seized and confined. The corpse was taken below, while the wretched betrothed was carried in a state of insensibility to her cabin.

Eight bells had struck the following evening, when I received a summons to attend on deck. I therefore instantly ascended, and found the whole of the crew, dressed in their Sunday clothes, together with all the officers of the ship, and the male passengers, assembled. The men off duty were lining either side of the deck; the captain, surrounded by his officers, was standing immediately in front of the poop; and the body of the unfortunate victim lay stretched on a grating, over which the national flag of Denmark had been thrown, immediately in the centre. In an instant I saw that I had been summoned to be present at the funeral of the chief mate, and my heart beat high with grief as I uncovered my head and stepped on the quarter-deck.

It was nearly a dead calm; we had passed the trades, and were fast approaching the line; the sun had begun to decline, but still burnt with a fervent heat; the sails hung listlessly against the masts, and the mainsail was brailed up, in order to allow the breeze, should any rise, to go forward. I had observed all the morning a still more sure indication of our approach to the torrid zone. Through the clear blue water I had remarked a couple of sharks following the vessel, accompanied by their usual companions—the pilot-fish. This the sailors had expected as a matter of course, as they superstitiously believe that these monsters of the deep always attach themselves to a ship in which a dead body lies, anxiously anticipating their dreadful meal. In their appearance, however, I only saw the usual announcement of our vicinity to the line.

In such weather, placed in a ship, which seems to represent the whole world—shut out from all save the little band that encircles us, with the wide and fathomless element around us—the ethereal throne from which God seems to look down upon us; at one moment our voice rising in solemn prayer for one we have loved, and the next, the splash of the divided waters, as they receive in their bosom the creature he has made—all these, at such a moment, make the heart thrill with a deeper awe, a closer fellowship with its Creator than any resident on shore can know—a consciousness of the grandeur of God and the feebleness of man, which those alone can feel who "go down in ships, and see the wonders of the deep."

I took my place with the other passenger. Not a word was spoken, for we all believed we were about to witness the last rites performed over our late friend, and consequently stood in anxious silence; when suddenly a steady tramp was heard, and the larboard watch, with drawn cutlasses, slowly marched down the waist, escorting the murderer, whom they conducted to the side of the corpse; then withdrew a few paces, and formed a line, which completed the hollow square.

We now began to exchange glances. Surely the assassin had not been brought here to witness the burial of his victim; and yet what else could it be for? Had it been for trial, (as we had heard that the Danes often proceeded to instant investigation and summary punishment,) we should probably have seen the tackle prepared for hanging the culprit at the yard-arm. This, however, was not the case; and we all, therefore, felt puzzled as to the meaning of the scene.

We were not long kept in doubt. The second mate read from a paper which he held in his hand the full powers delegated to the captain to hold courts-martial, and carry their sentences into effect, the law in similar cases, &c. &c.; and called on the prisoner to know whether he would consent to be tried in the Danish language. To this he willingly assented, and the court was declared open.

The flag was suddenly withdrawn from the face of the corpse; and even the monster who had struck the blow shuddered as he beheld the calm, almost seraphic, look of him whom he had stricken.

The trial now proceeded in the most solemn manner. Evidence of the crime was adduced, and the deed clearly brought home to the accused. I confess that my blood turned cold when I saw the knife produced which had been used as the instrument of the murder, and the demon-like smile of the prisoner as he beheld it, stained as it was with the blood of one who had been forced by his duty to punish him.

After a strict investigation, the captain appealed to all present when the prisoner was unanimously declared guilty.

The officers put on their hats, and the captain proceeded to pass sentence. Great was my surprise (not understanding one word which the commander said) to see the culprit throw himself on his knees, and begin to sue for mercy. After the unfeeling and obdurate manner in which he had conducted himself, such an appeal was unaccountable; for it was quite evident he did not fear death, or repent the deed he had committed. What threatened torture could thus bend his hardened spirit? I was at a loss to conjecture.

Four men now approached and lifted up the corpse. A similar number seized the prisoner, while ten or twelve others approached with strong cords. In a moment I understood the whole, and could not wonder at the struggles of the murderer, as I saw him lashed back to back, firmly, tightly, without the power to move, to the dead body of his victim. His cries were stopped by a sort of gag, and, writhing as he was, he, with the body, was laid on the grating, and carried to the gangway. The crew mounted on the nettings and upon the shrouds. A few prayers from the Danish burial-service were read by a chaplain on board, and the dead and the living, the murderer and his victim, were launched into eternity, bound together!

As the dreadful burden separated the clear waters, a sudden flash darted through their transparency, and a general shudder went round, as each one felt it was the expectant shark that rushed forward for his prey. I caught a glance of the living man's eye as he was falling; it haunts me even to this moment; there was more than agony in it!

We paused only for a few minutes, and imagined we saw some blood-stains rising to the surface. Not one amongst us could remain to see more. We turned away, and sought to forget the stern and awe-inspiring punishment we had seen inflicted.

The Father—An Instructive Sketch.

It is the duty of mothers to sustain the reverses of fortune. Frequent and sudden as they have been to our own country, it is important that young females should possess some employment by which they might obtain a livelihood in case they should be reduced to the necessity of supporting themselves. When families are unexpectedly reduced from affluence to poverty, how pitifully contemptible it is to see the mother desponding or helpless, and permitting her daughters to embarrass those whom it is their duty to assist and cheer.

"I have lost my whole fortune," said a merchant, as he returned one evening to his home; "we can no longer keep our carriage. We must leave this large house. The children can no longer go to expensive schools. Yesterday I was a rich man; to-day there is nothing I can call my own."

"Dear husband," said the wife, "we are still rich in each other and our children. Money may pass away, but God has given us a better treasure in those active hands and loving hearts."

"Dear father," said the children, "do not look so sober. We will help you to get a living."

"What can you do, poor things?" said he.

"You shall see, you shall see," answered several cheerful voices. "It is a pity if we have been to school for nothing. How can the father of eight children be poor. We shall work and make you rich again."

"I shall help," said the younger girl, hardly four years old. "I will not have any new things bought, and I shall sell my great doll."

The heart of the husband and father, which had sunk within his bosom like a stone, was lifted up. The sweet enthusiasm of the scene cheered him, and his nightly prayer was like a song of praise.

They left this stately house. The servants were dismissed. Pictures and plate, rich carpet and furniture were sold, and she who had been so long the mistress of the mansion shed no tear. "Pay every debt," said she, "let no one suffer through us, and we may yet be happy."

He rented a neat cottage and a small piece of ground a few miles from the city. With the aid of his sons he cultivated vegetables for the market. He viewed with delight and astonishment the economy of his wife, nurtured as she had been, in wealth, and the efficiency which his daughters soon acquired under her training.

The eldest one instructed her in the work of the household, and also assisted the younger children. Besides they executed various works, which they had learned as accomplishments, but which they found could be disposed of to advantage. They embroidered with taste some of the ornamental parts of female apparel, which were readily sold to a merchant in the city.

They cultivated flowers, and sent bouquets to market in the cart that conveyed the vegetables; they platted straw, they painted maps, they executed plain needlework. Every one was at her post, busy and cheerful. The cottage was like a bee-hive.

"I never enjoyed such health before," said the father.

"And I never was so happy before," said the mother.

"We never knew how many things we could do, when we lived in the great house," said the children, "and we love each other a great deal better here. You call us your little bees."

"Yes," replied the father, "and you make just such honey as the heart likes to feed on."

Economy as well as industry was strictly observed. Nothing was wasted. Nothing unnecessary was purchased. The eldest daughter became assistant teacher in a distinguished female seminary, and the second took her place as instructress to the family.

The little dwelling which had always been kept neat, they were soon able to beautify. Its construction was improved, and the vines and flowering trees were replanted around it. The merchant was happier under his woodbine covered porch, in a summer's evening, than he had been in his showy dressing room.

"We are now thriving and prosperous," said he, "shall we return to the city?"

"Oh, no," was the unanimous reply.

"Let us remain," said the wife, "where we have found health and contentment."

'Father,' said the youngest, 'all we children hope you are not going to be rich again; for then,' she added, 'we little ones were shut up in the nursery, and did not see much of you or mother. Now we all live together, and sister, who loves us, teaches us, and we learn to be industrious and useful. We were none of us happy when we were rich and did not work. So father please not be a rich man any more.'—Mrs. Sigourney.

Physician, Heal Thyself.—Luke iv. 23.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

Has it never occurred to you in these times, when, judging of their belief by their practice, many individuals seem to suppose, that the infallibility which we deny to the Bishop of Rome is yet lodged with themselves, that a few thoughts upon the above words would be seasonable, and might, perhaps, exert upon some a wholesome influence?

We learn from the manner in which they were introduced by our Blessed Lord into His discourse in the Synagogue at Nazareth, that they constituted a familiar proverb among His countrymen. And sayings akin to them may be found in almost all languages.

It is not now our purpose to consider them in reference to the special application made of them by the Saviour; but to take the maxim by itself, and in its primary sense, and employ it, as may legitimately be done, by way of fraternal admonition of any in our midst who may be more solicitous about the spiritual health of others, than for their own.

We live in what is emphatically an age of doctors. Not only does many a petty school, which has been permitted by legislative enactment to dignify itself with the name of college, seek to acquire notoriety by exercising the mighty prerogative of making D. D.'s of them whom neither nature nor education has so distinguished; but the Church is swarming with a host of self-constituted doctors, lay as well as clerical, who are unable to produce even such a license for killing or curing as a parchment diploma, with the imposing paraphernalia of red sealing wax and blue ribbon.

Among those whose office it is to prescribe for the body's ailments, there is at the present day a very great diversity of practice. And a corresponding variety will be found to obtain with those who would minister to the Church's health. There are Theologians, as well as in Medicine, both Allopathists and Homeopaths.—Thompsonians and Professors of the Water-cure. And each class will insist that his own system furnishes the only effectual remedies for all the ills under which we labour.

The great principle which governs the practice of the Allopathist is, that, to restore the body to a healthy state, those medicines should be used which are calculated to bring about such a condition as is incompatible with the existence of the disease to be conquered. Thus the D. D.'s of this school prescribe good, as the remedy for evil; love, for hate; blessing, for cursing; and prayer, for persecution. But it is a perversion of the principle, when, as a cure for existing ills, Churches are advised to form combinations with the sects; or to rest upon the system of the Church the peculiar dogmas of a Calvin, a Zuinglius, or a Wesley. The blending of elements dissimilar, is apt to produce such a result as follows the attempts to make vinegar and oil amalgamate; and to bring out any thing rather than true charity; as all past experience sufficiently proves.

On the other hand, the Homeopathist would render evil, for ill; and railing, for railing; as prairie-men sometimes kindle a conflagration to extinguish another; fighting fire with fire. The more adroit practitioners of this class do, indeed, administer their medicines in small doses; they use but few words; but they take care that they shall contain such a concentration of gall to make them more than an equivalent for the diluted bitterness the physician who is not so well aware as themselves of the effects of volatilization upon what remains after that process. They will also so disguise the taste of what they administer, that what will prove wormwood to him that must swallow it, seems sweeter than honey in the mouth. Yea, the words of which, even though they have "war in the heart," are softer than water, and "smoother than oil," though they "be very order."

The Thompsonian reformer of the Church, like Hannibal of Carthage, in his assault upon the Alps, adopts the "fire and vinegar test." If, unlike Mohammed in this respect, he do not finish his flashing scimitar, and, at one fell swoop, off with the heads of all who differ from him in opinion; he will yet compel them to pass through such an ordeal of Cayenne, Steam, and Lobelia, as to make it questionable whether a death so easy could not be greatly preferable to such active treatment. He gets that, though it be a duty "to speak the truth," it should be done "in love," and is more inclined to esteem him an enemy, who does not conform to his standard of orthodoxy, than disposed to admonish him as a brother.

On the other hand, the Cold-water doctor thinks he has found a medicine which can heal every sickness: or, rather, that, to obtain health, all medicines must be discarded. Where there exists ignorance or prejudice in regard to them, care must be taken to say nothing about the distinctive features of the Church. And thus repose will be procured for the patient; and dangerous excitement attendant upon controversy will be avoided. Such practice, however, is oftener the suggestion of indifference, than of any real solicitude for the welfare of the Church; and does not seem to be conformed to the apostolic model; for we read of one, who hesitated not to say that there was not a whit behind the chiefest apostles, whose glory it was, in looking back upon the past, that he had not shunned to be unto his hearers the whole counsel of God. The name of school suggests another class of persons, whom we will mention in passing, who think "a temperance pledge" a perfect panacea: forgetful that, being by baptism members of the Church, they are members of the only temperance society, which, while it exacts promises of those who are about to be admitted to it, also gives them within itself an assurance of the strength and ability to fulfil them.

Amidst all this diversity of "theory and practice," some think that in sickness the only safety is in a "consultation." But others, who have witnessed the ill consequences of the conflicting opinions and treatment of a multitude of physicians, think it about as well to die of disease, as of the doctors. Yet, notwithstanding this, many among our D. D.'s have prescribed a "General Convention," as affording the Church the only chance of restoration to her former peace, comfort and health. Such a body has more than once been assembled to deliberate upon her condition. At one of these consultations one physician gravely rose in his place, and read a list of some sixty maladies of dreadful names under which, in his opinion, the poor patient was labouring. Well, what was the result? Agreement? No. Another doctor promptly replied, that there were no symptoms to warrant the belief that fifty-nine of these sixty had any existence, save in the imagination of his brother physician; and, that as for the sixtieth, it was no disease; but, wherever it was discovered, one sign of a healthy condition. The desired result, then, is not likely to be produced by legislation.

Once more. Probably most of your readers, Mr. Editor, have, at one time or other, seen in some of the secular papers the flaming capitals of an advertisement of patent medicines, prepared, as represented, by the "College of Health." These, it was promised, even if they did not give sight to the blind, and life to the dead, would work wonders of another sort. The name—"College of Health"—had an imposing sound. And as brother Jonathan is a rather gullible sort of person, the medicines had for a while a pretty brisk sale; until it was discovered, that they were not "just the thing;" and that the "College" edifice was, after all, but a small, rickety, frame building, with but one apartment for its lecture room, shop, and laboratory; which last contained no other "apparatus" than a few pans and kettles, and no other "material" than a minute quantity of inferior and almost worthless drugs. The only "professor" of this school of health was a cute and enterprising yankee, whose knowledge of medicine was indeed in "profession," rather than by practice; his whole library, the immense show-bills with which his shop (we beg his pardon, College) was covered over; and these, together with a few stacks of paper pill-boxes, and a goodly share of assurance, constituted the whole of the remainder of his stock in trade. Well, Mr. Editor, even this appears not to be without its parallel among our D. D.'s. An association has been gotten up recently styled "a society for the promotion of Evangelical knowledge," which promises that it will furnish remedies which shall effect what all others hitherto used have, in their opinion with whom it has originated, failed to accomplish. But to my mind, the title, (like "College of Health,") seems a suspicious one. I have been accustomed to consider the Church a society for the diffusion of Evangelical knowledge; and if this one, as it professes to do, differs from her regular and authorised publications in its teaching, there is great reason to apprehend, that its message, if it can indeed be called "a gospel" at all, will be found to be what is termed by St. Paul "another gospel," which he forbids us to hear; even though himself or an angel from heaven, should preach it. Indeed the principles of the more prominent members of the association are believed (I might add known) to be opposed to those upon which the Reformers, Cranmer, Ridley and Jewell acted, in ascertaining what was Catholic verity; and in detecting Roman additions and corruptions of the primitive faith. And, therefore, I cannot but fear, that, under the specious name of evangelical truth, there is very great danger of their introducing some modern "ism," which, like all which have preceded it, will be found to be but a miserable substitute for Christianity.

An ancient doctor, S. Vincentius Lerinensis, prescribed this method for the detection of heresy, and the preservation or restoration of a sound faith, viz., first, a resort to the Authority of the Law of God; and then, in the next place, to the Tradition of the Catholic Church. By which tradition he meant not the infallible decision of an individual, the representative head of the Church; nor the dictum of the major part of the Church in any one age; to which decision or dictum we must blindly submit our judgment, but "Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus creditum est." A rule which does not dispense with private judgment; but aids it, and protects its exercise from serious error. This is, moreover, the distinctive and declared principle of our own, and our mother Church; as acknowledged in their standards; and defended by their most learned, wise, and holy sons, now and in times gone by.

If, then, this principle be admitted as the test of truth, we would say to the brethren composing this society, show us thereby that what you teach is verity, and we will cheerfully subscribe to it; but if this rule be rejected, and your own notions, or those of any other individual, are to be the touchstone by which to try whether any doctrine be true or false, we have no common ground upon which to stand; and therefore there can be neither controversy nor agreement between us.

In fine, the proverb which stands at the head of this article seems to suggest the safest, best, and most effectual remedy for existing differences. Physician, heal thyself. The Church is a body made up of individual believers. Heal them, and you heal the Church. Let her "lively stones" be squared by the rule of God's commandments—"polished" and "beautified" by the grace of the Spirit—and built upon Christ, the "precious corner-stone," and "sure foundation,"—and the Church shall become indeed "the habitation of God," and be filled once more with his glory.

Begin then, my reader, with thyself. Look first upon thy own life and conversation. Scrutinize thy outward conduct, and inward thoughts and feelings; and see whether these be such as God's word requires. A holy life is one of the best guarantees of a correct judgment; for an INFALLIBLE DOCTOR has said, "If any man will do the will of God, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God."

Wouldst thou remove a mote from thy brother's eye? be careful first to cast out the beam out of thine own eye; then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote, if one be there, from thy brother's eye. Physician, heal first thyself. Condemn not those the correctness of whose teaching you have never fairly tested; but let thy private judgment be taught by Holy Scripture, and informed and guided by the concurrent sense of the Church Catholic; and, then, thou shalt know who hold "the faith once delivered to the saints," for which we are exhorted ever earnestly to contend.

Oh, that men would everywhere adopt as their rule of conduct the proverb, Physician, heal thyself. Then would they find that in healing themselves, they had healed the Church—that seamless robe of the Redeemer which some in our day, more ruthless than the Roman soldier, would scarce hesitate, in order to force their own fancies upon others, with impious hand to rend asunder.

Fewell, or Essays of Opinion for Churchmen.

PUBLISHED BY JOS. ROBINSON, BALTIMORE.

MR. EDITOR:—

I beg leave through the Banner of the Cross, to bespeak for the above work, a calm and careful perusal. It originally appeared in some of the Church Periodicals, in numbers; and upon being re-written it now appears a duodecimo volume.

The merits of Fewell are of a high order—it is written in a nervous, piquant style, and evinces ripeness of judgment and patient, laborious inquiry. It has, though, one grave fault; the author is betrayed by depth of feeling, into the use of bitter invective. Now, it is certain that truth needs not the adventitious aid of this weapon, and the spirit of the Gospel absolutely forbids it. Such terms as "fool," &c., are calculated to raise prejudice in the mind of the serious reader, against the cause which they are intended to uphold; and I must confess, that the pleasure of reading Fewell, was much abated by meeting occasionally with such opprobrious epithets; and it is to be hoped that the author will not allow the work to go through press again without correcting this fault.

It is written in numbers upon different religious subjects, and with some of the essays the present writer was particularly pleased. It attacks dissent in all its subtleties, all its phases, and it were not to praise it too highly, to say it probes it deeply, and exposes the evil; it brings out to view the lurking poison, and points out the antidote. The systems of dissent, although multitudinous, all meet upon a common platform; there is in them all, a similarity, if not identity of sentiment upon the subject of Conversion; and in them all is there a radical error, an error both directly and reflexively ruinous in its operation; it is as old as the days of Martin Luther; it predicated justification upon faith in its most restricted and limited significance, and for proof turns to the text "a man is justified by faith, without the works of the law," "believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved," &c. That St. Paul did not intend an imperative, lifeless principle, it is evident from the whole harmony of his own writings, as well as those of the other evangelists. There must be perfect agreement in the teaching of holy scripture, it is quite evident that there is a faith, that is "devilish counterfeit," as the homilies say; a faith that is dead, as the scriptures say; "faith without works is dead." There is a faith which the devils have; "the devils believe and tremble," and nevertheless, if the position assumed by dissent be true, nothing but faith in its most restricted significance, is necessary to justification. If it be granted, that works are necessary to avouch faith, these persons thereby place themselves by our side in the interpretation of justifying faith; we say with St. Paul, that "we are justified by faith without the works of the law," but we say furthermore, that that is not faith, which lies inert in the mind, producing no fruits; a living faith must needs give out signs of life, as a living man is known to be alive from certain infallible signs.—It were as reasonable to expect that the sun could rise above the horizon, and no evidences of light be perceptible, as for a man to realize a saving, justifying faith, and give no signs in the life; when non-Episcopalians are pressed with these things they seemingly are ready to admit that faith to justify must be an active principle, but from policy, they involve their creed in inexplicable confusion; to admit the necessity of a faith that will take in the whole duty of a Christian, were to confess that they have not a justifying faith; for there are certain pre-requisites in Gospel faith, to which the whole family of dissent has paid no attention; but to admit the necessity of a faith at all operative, were to grant its obligation in all its bearings, for who will undertake to define the metes and bounds of faith; who is authorized to say that to predicate justification of faith, it is only necessary to believe and do a small portion of the duties of Christianity? That a man, provided he believes, may neglect the duty of Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, prayers, fasting, fidelity to the Church, and every thing appertaining to outward order, condemn the unity of the Church; in a settled hostility to the Church planted by Christ and His Apostles, and do only such things as are enjoined by the laws and constitution of the society to which he belongs? There is in this thing, a radical defect, and Fewell will do a good service to the cause of truth, by the judicious manner in which this matter is treated; the revivalism of the age is productive of incalculable evil; to erect impulse into an arbiter of truth, were unphilosophical to say the least; agreeably to the theory of the revivalist, the mind when under conviction for sin, feels deeply depressed, deeply afflicted, it is purposely made to realize a horror of darkness, in order that it may rebound most strongly, when the super-incumbent weight shall have been removed; after being kept in this condition for hours or days, it is taught to look for evidences of conversion in the powerful reaction of feeling. The convicted man is asked how he feels; and if he answers, at length, that his mind is more tranquil, that he feels better, he is told that he has the "witness of the Spirit" that he is born of God. It were not to be wondered at, that he should receive this intelligence with indescribable joy; that he should be frantic with delight; that he should even shout for joy. But it will at once occur, that that this is a very unsafe criterion; and aside from the fact that it is wholly without warrant of Scripture, it is at war with sound philosophy. It is by no means a sure mark of conversion; in the great goodness of God, the mind in its framework is so constituted, that it can not be for a great while deeply depressed; its very organization would be impaired and destroyed, were there not a provision against its permanent depression. Who that has observed the operation of his own mind, does not know that agreeably to this merciful law of the Creator, the mind will react against any depression how great soever? And now to take this reaction as a witness, avouching a change of heart; to say that the man is converted simply because he has felt this revulsion of feeling, were to erect a tribunal for the settlement of religious principle, at which error would of necessity be pronounced truth. Again, it were to erect a standard at war with God's word; this revulsion of feeling is said to be the assurance of pardon or remission. It is not to be wondered at, hence, that all the outward ordinances of religion are despised; that Baptism is neglected, or degraded beneath a sacrament; for if there be remission of sin without Baptism, what were the value of the rite? Hence too Confirmation is neglected; the ministry plays a subordinate part. What the necessity of apostolic ministry, when this assurance of pardon of sins can be obtained, and incorporation into the body of Christ be secured without it? It in fact, makes amends for every defect in organization; it removes every impediment; it gives a title to eternal salvation, without going to God's authorized ministry; it repeals the whole dispensation of apostolical order, and gives authority to men, to minister in holy things not derived from Christ and His apostles. I ask, who can estimate the damage done to divine truth by this unscriptural ruinous doctrine.

COLLEGIATE AND THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY IN TENNESSEE.—We have received a letter from a valued friend, whose name is well known as one of our most popular writers, giving an interesting account of the foundation of an Institution, which if successfully established, will do much for the Church in the South-West. It will be seen also from the correspondence appended, that the Rev. Dr. Wheat has resigned his Parish for the purpose of taking charge of this new Seminary. It will also appear, from this, how high a character Dr. Wheat has won for himself in the pastoral relation. This fact, we regard, as an earnest of his success in the new duties he has assumed. None can be better qualified for such an office than one who, possessed of talents and learning, has approved himself a faithful and efficient Pastor. We think that we cannot better comply with our correspondent's wishes in behalf of Dr. Wheat and the Seminary, than by giving a portion of his own letter. We are sure that an Institution like this will secure the best wishes and prayers of the Church at large, and that churchmen will be ready to further such an effort with something more substantial than "good desires." With this sincere expression of our earnest hopes, we give the following extract from the letter we have received.

"The distinguished reputation of the Rev. Dr. Wheat, both as a clergyman and an elegant scholar, is not unknown to you, and he promises to be an ornament to the University he proposes to take charge of. His resignation was accepted by the Vestry with the greatest reluctance, and they would have urged him to reverse his decision, but for the firmness with which he maintained it. Although accomplishing great good as a pastor, he believed that a wider field lay open before him in the establishment of the College for the preparation of young men for the ministry. Such an institution has long been felt to be a desideratum in this quarter of the Union. There has been much difficulty in obtaining clergy for this State, and the Church suffers from the deficiency. It is the opinion of the Bishop, with whom I have conversed upon the subject, that a College established at Columbia will not only supply Tennessee, but from its central position ultimately be the nursery for the whole south-west.

Columbia is a beautiful village in the bosom of the paradisaical region known as 'the Garden Spot of Tennessee.' It is also the Diocesan residence, and is surrounded by a wealthy and cultivated people. The success of the Female Institute there, would hold out hopes of similar results for a College.

The proposed institution is not to be commenced on a large, showy scale; but modestly at first, according to means, advancing with safety whenever it does advance. About $5000 have already been subscribed, principally by the brothers, Messrs. Polk. With this, a pleasant grove of ten acres will be purchased, and a plain gothic cottage erected upon it, to serve as the nucleus of the college. In this the President will reside, and at first take ten or twelve young men as boarders. As the number increases, a second cottage will be erected, and a professor employed, who will dwell in it with a class. Other cottages and other professors will be added, as funds and patronage will permit. The cottages will enclose a square according to a fixed plan of architectural and landscape arrangement. In the centre will stand the chapel.

This is the outline. At first the enterprise will be only an Academy, out of which will spring quadrennial classes to form the college proper, out of which will be evolved the Theological Seminary. Of course it will take funds and time; but the beginning is prosperous, and with God's blessing its friends here foresee its success. In its main features the Nashotah Mission will form the model, after which it will be organized.

With such a man as Bishop Otey as its able patron and friend, it cannot fail. Whatever has been done for Tennessee by friends of the Church, has always been well given. Failure is a word that has never been coupled with any enterprises having this State for the field; therefore please, my dear sir, not to associate such a thought with our proposed College.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The many warm friends of the Rev. Dr. Wheat, will learn with deep regret by the following correspondence, that he has determined to leave his pastoral charge for a wider field of labor. He will retire with the most earnest wishes for his welfare and happiness: We are permitted to publish the following interesting correspondence between himself and the Vestry of the Church of which he has so long been the honored pastor:

EASTER MONDAY, April 24, 1848.

To Dr. John Shelby, Senior Warden, Francis B. Fogg, Esq., Junior Warden, and other gentlemen of the Vestry of Christ Church, Nashville.

DEAR BRETHREN:

Having determined, with the approbation of the Bishop and under his special appointment, to devote myself to the establishing of a Collegiate and Theological Seminary for the diocese, I beg leave, herewith, most respectfully to resign the rectorship of this parish, from and after the first day of July next.

It has not been without great difficulty, as you can well understand, and after long and anxious deliberation, that I have been brought, by the promise of greater usefulness in a more responsible position, to consent to the severance of the sacred and endearing ties that have bound us together for nearly eleven years past.

During this whole period our official intercourse has been perfectly harmonious, and I thankfully bear witness to your generous care and unwearied kindness to myself and family. For all this, as well as a too favorable estimation of my poor services, I beg you accept my most grateful acknowledgments, accept my best wishes, accept the assurance of my constant benedictions and prayers for your continued prosperity and happiness.

In those best bonds which no separations can sunder,

Yours truly,

J. T. WHEAT.

NASHVILLE, June 15th, 1848.

DEAR SIR:—Owing to the absence of some of the members of the Vestry, it was difficult to convene a sufficient number until yesterday, when your communication addressed, on Easter Monday, to the Wardens and Vestry of Christ Church, Nashville, was laid before them. The undersigned were appointed a committee to inform you of the result of the meeting; that the Vestry had, with deep regret, accepted your resignation of the Rectorship of this Parish, from and after the first day of July next.

The terms used in your letter of resignation seemed to preclude the Vestry from adopting any other course, as you state that you had determined, with the approbation of the Bishop, and under his special appointment, to devote yourself to the establishment of a Collegiate and Theological Seminary for this Diocese, and that you had long and anxiously deliberated upon the measure, and believed there was a prospect of usefulness to the Church in the more responsible position which you had agreed to assume.

After the sacred and endearing connexion which has subsisted for so many years, it is very painful for the Vestry to agree to part with you. They have always entertained the highest respect and admiration for your eminent talents and goodness, and the congregation under your pastoral care has increased greatly in numbers and in true piety. In our official intercourse there has always been the most perfect cordiality, and we have been united in all the measures that were deemed necessary for the good of the Church.

Your unwearied devotion to the interest and welfare of the Church has not been limited to your labors in our congregation, but in the conventions that have been held in this State since your removal here, your exertions and talents have been eminently useful and acknowledged by all.

We have the utmost confidence that, in the more extensive sphere of action and usefulness to which you will be transferred in the superintendence of a Theological and Collegiate Seminary, you will be successful in disseminating the principles of our holy religion, and establishing an institution which will be distinguished for its excellence and an honor to the Church. Your abilities, learning and eloquence well qualify you to be president; and in this new and arduous field of labor, we trust you will receive the reward which you will so richly merit.

With the highest respect and esteem, and with our prayers for your prosperity and welfare, we remain ever your sincere friends,

FRANCIS B. FOGG,
BENJ. LITTON,
JNO. BAIRD.

Committee of Vestry of Christ Church, Nashville.
Rev. Dr. WHEAT, Nashville.

We have received two communications in reference to the article of "Layman," and our remarks thereupon. We give precedence to "C." in defence of his own use of terms. "Layman" shall appear in our next. For ourselves we would rather be tenacious about things than about words, and so it be rightly done, we are little concerned whether "the Ante-Communion Service" be "said," "read," or "performed." We cannot agree with our correspondent that it would be better to stay away from the Morning Service, than to depart without communing, when the Holy Sacrament is administered. Surely, there is greater offence in breaking two Divine commands than in violating one. And upon this principle it would be better for all, who are not communicants, to stay from church on communion Sunday, thus adding to their disobedience of the injunction "Do this in remembrance of Me," the "forsaking the assembling of themselves together as the manner of some is."

MR. EDITOR:—

Your correspondent, "Layman," in the last Banner, has taken exception to the use of the word "performed," as applied to the Ante-Communion Service, "as not suited to the subject, nor warranted in any part of the Prayer Book; and suggests that "said or read" would be much better. In apology for the use of the word, I can only say, that the article to which he refers ("Convention of the Diocese of Delaware") was written in haste and the use of the word entirely overlooked. I think the word "said" would have been more appropriate, as the rubric preceding the Ante-Communion Service, directs that the Minister, standing at the right side of the table, &c.—shall say the Lord's Prayer, &c. Again, "then the Minister may say," &c.—and again, "then shall be said the Collect of the Day"—while the rubric at the close of the Communion Office, directs that "upon the Sundays and other Holy Days, &c., shall be said all that is appointed," &c. These rubrics, I think, would sufficiently designate the most appropriate word. But in looking over a file of the Banner of the Cross, for 1844, I find under date of June 8th, in a report of the proceedings of the Convention of New Jersey, that "the Ante-Communion Service was performed by the Bishop." Again, July 27th, in the Convention of Louisiana, "the Bishop performed" the same service; and October 5th, in the report of the proceedings of the General Convention, it is stated that "the Ante-Communion Service was performed by the Senior Bishop." And again, Oct. 26th, in an account of the consecration of three Bishops, in Christ Church, I see that "the Ante-Communion Service was performed by the Bishop of North Carolina"—and November 2d, in the account of the consecration of three Missionary Bishops in St. Peter's Church, the same service "was performed by the Missionary Bishop of the Northwest." I cite these examples, not to defend the use of the word, but merely to show that I had precedents for its use—while at the same time, I would thank my esteemed friend "Layman," for his correction.

I regret very much, that his article, with your remarks, had not been published a week sooner. Had this only been done, some persons, (communicants of the Church) might have been prevented, not only from staying away from Church, on Trinity Sunday because the Holy Communion was to be administered, but also from turning their backs upon the Altar, upon which were spread the mystic emblems of the broken body and shed blood of their Redeemer—and for the simple reason, that they had partaken of that sacred feast upon the two previous Lord's Days.

Would it not be better to stay away from the Morning Service, than to remain until the Sermon was over, and then deliberately walk out of the Church, as if they had neither part nor lot in the matter? "Consider with yourselves how great is your ingratitude to God, and how sore punishment hangeth over your heads for the same; when ye wilfully abstain from the Lord's table, and separate from your brethren, who come to feed on the banquet of that most heavenly food." C.

Newcastle, St. Peter's Day, 1848.

Convention of Louisiana.

Mr. Editor:—

Having seen no account of the proceedings of the Annual Convention of the Diocese of Louisiana, I take the liberty of sending you the following abstract, hoping our progress may be matter of interest to all who are affectionately devoted to our dear Church.

The services commenced in Grace Church, St. Francisville, in which the Convention was held, on the 3d day of May, ulto., when the Rev. N. O. Preston said the morning services; the Rev. Thomas D. Ozanne read the lessons, and the Rev. Chas. W. Whitall preached a sermon on ordination. The Rev. Wm. John Lynde was ordained to the order of Priesthood, and Mr. Frederick Dean was ordained Deacon, after which the Holy Eucharist was administered to the Clergy, Laity and Congregation.

The Convention came to order at 1½ o'clock, P. M., when the Right Rev. Leonidas Polk, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, took the chair as President, and the Secretary of last year called the roll of clerical and lay delegates entitled to seats in Convention. Twenty-six Clerical and forty-six Lay delegates were found to be entitled to seats. Seventeen of the clerical and seventeen of the lay delegates attended the sittings of the Convention, representing fifteen parishes of the Diocese. The Right Rev. James Harvey Otey, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Tennessee, and the Rev. Samuel C. Kerr, and the Rev. Mr. Giles, of the Diocese of Mississippi, and the Rev. Mr. Benton, of the Diocese of Tennessee, attended and took seats in the Convention, as honorary members.

John L. Lobdell, Esq., was re-elected Secretary and Treasurer of the Convention for the ensuing year.

Three new churches were received into communion with the Convention, viz:

1. Grace Church, New Orleans.
2. Eglise Protestante Francaise, New Orleans.
3. Church of the Holy Trinity, city of Lafayette.

STANDING COMMITTEE.

Rev. Dr. Hawks,	Mr. L. C. Duncan,
" Mr. Preston,	" P. M. Ozanne,
" " Goodrich,	" W. M. Goodrich.

MISSIONARY COMMITTEE.

Rev. Mr. Preston,	Mr. Thomas Dix,
" " Lewis,	" Ozanne,
" " Nicholson.

EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

Rev. Dr. Hawks,	Hon. George S. Guion,
" " Lacey,	" Charles Watts,
Rev. Mr. Lewis,	Mr. L. Matthews,
" " Nicholson,	" B. M. Norman.

John L. Lobdell, Esq., was elected Trustee of the General Theological Seminary, to fill the place of the Hon. Thomas Butler, deceased.

DELEGATES TO THE GENERAL CONVENTION.

Rev. Dr. Lacey,	Hon. George S. Guion,
" " Hawks,	Mr. John L. Lobdell,
Rev. Mr. Guion,	" J. Dale Powell,
" " Lamon,	Dr. J. P. Davidson.

On the second day, 4th May, service was said by the Rev. Mr. Whitall, the lessons were read by the Rev. Charles P. Clark, and a sermon on missions was preached by the Rev. William R. Nicholson, after which a collection was taken in aid of Diocesan Missions. On this day the Bishop read his address to the Convention, and the Parochial reports were laid before the Convention and read. The Bishop's address and the Parochial reports were referred to the committee on the state of the Churches who, through Rev. Dr. Hawks, chairman, made a very interesting and encouraging report of the prosperity and prospects of the Church in Louisiana.

Appropriate resolutions were passed on the deaths of the Rev. Wiley Peck and the Hon. Judge Butler, late a warden of Grace Church, St. Francisville.

On the third day, 5th May, service was said by the Rev. Mr. Giles, of the Diocese of Mississippi, the lessons were read by the Rev. Mr. Kerr of the same Diocese, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. John Sandals; after which the Rev. Spencer Wall, Missionary, and officiating to a colored congregation in the Parish of Lafourche Interior, was ordained to the order of Priesthood, and the religious services were concluded by the administration of the Holy Eucharist to the Clergy, Laity and Congregation.

After the religious services, the Convention came to order, when it was resolved that the next Convention be held in St. John's Church, Thibodeaux, on the 2d Wednesday after Easter, 1849.

The following committee was appointed to revise the present Constitution and Canons of the Diocese of Louisiana, and report to the next Annual Convention, viz:

Rev. Dr. Hawks,	Mr. John L. Lobdell,
" Mr. Goodrich,	" L. C. Duncan,
	" J. Dale Powell.

After singing one of the Hymns in the collection, with the annual prayers, the Convention adjourned.

This was the largest and one of the most interesting conventions ever assembled in Louisiana. Under the happy influence of our beloved Diocesan Church has progressed in a manner which must excite the liveliest gratitude of every faithful member of Christ's flock: and, while many are being added of such as, we humbly trust, shall be saved, the harvest is still plenteous, and from all parts of our wide-extended Diocese the cry comes up to our good Bishop for faithful reapers of this goodly heritage.

St. Francisville, Louisiana, June 19, 1848.

The following article, setting forth an important use of Patience, we copy, for the benefit of the Clergy, from the Protestant Churchman.

Patience in the Pulpit.

1. Be patient towards those loiterers and lingerers who come too late for public worship. They are a trial; for some of them live near the sanctuary, and it would cost but slight exertion to be there in time. Bear with them. They will get in by and by, and then, besides the comfort of having been patient, you can enjoy the pleasure of thankfulness that they are in at last.

2. Bear, too, with that noisy worshipper. The church door rings when he shuts it; he marches to his pew with the tread of a heavy dragoon. A crash announces that his pew door is closed. He has a cough that terrifies the nervous, and a sneeze that annoys many a church slumberer. He snores, too, to the manifest discomfort of the drowsy about him. It is a pity there was not such a modification of all these matters, as that you might have a sacred stillness in the place of prayer. But you must bear with him. He gives you a capital opportunity of improving by exercise in the virtue now recommended.

3. Be patient with the sleepers. Perhaps they have never yet awakened to the fact that the house of God is not the most proper place to take a nap. Perhaps they will wake soon enough to hear the better for their refreshing slumber. It is a moving thought, certainly, that you can look them up during the week, and, taking your sermon in your pocket, you can inquire if they would not like to hear what they so unfortunately lost.

4. The noisy boys in the gallery, and elsewhere, will try your patience. But you will add to your stock of knowledge by learning how poorly they are trained and disciplined at home; and how lovely an affair it is for parents to suffer their children to be beyond their sight and influence in the sanctuary.

5. Show sweet patience also toward that man yonder who demonstrates his interest in the close of the worship, by various timely preparations. Incipient steps are taken during the singing. He buttons on his coat; puts on his gloves; disposes of his spectacles; looks after his hat; grasps his whip or cane, &c., all of this before the benediction. During that he gets his pew ajar, ready for a leap into the aisle, and the benediction sounds are scarcely uttered ere he begins his flight towards home. One would think, from his haste, that his precious life depended on the despatch with which he could leave the sanctuary behind him. Bear with him. It is, indeed, a pity he shoots out of the house of prayer with such unbecoming haste; but be comforted. Time cures many evils. He will not be able to flee the temple of the Lord in such swiftness, when increasing years have laid their burdens upon him. Think of that.

6. If yours is a country congregation, be patient to such worshippers as feel it indispensable to bring their dogs with them to meeting. It shows kindness: for how lonely the poor fellows would be at home! Besides, a goodly group of dogs patrolling the porch—whining after masters—chasing one another up and down the aisles, and anon up the pulpit stairs, and making all the children giggle, and starting church officers in pursuit—all this will help to keep people awake—will show that the sanctuary is a place not altogether destitute of excitement, and will give an excellent opportunity for patience in the pulpit.—N. Y. Evan.

Foreign Intelligence.

"The state and prospects of Europe seem to get darker every hour. In Spain, civil war is breaking out; and, as the Queen is said to be en route, it is evident that Don Carlos will no longer restrain his followers from action.

Every day proves the impossibility of constructing a Republic in France. Their Government at present is chaos, and the country is divided into three parties—the Legitimists, Republicans, and Bonapartists. Of these, the latter will most likely succeed in making Louis Napoleon President, and afterwards Emperor of France. Henri V. must bide his time; the pear is not yet ripe enough for him.

In Italy, Charles Albert is rapidly forming a Lombardo-Sardinian kingdom; and, if the French do not interfere, will perhaps succeed in making himself King of all Italy.

Austria and Prussia are hopelessly disorganized. It has been proposed to form Prussia into a Northern Germanic kingdom, and Bavaria into a Southern one, leaving Austria to become Slavonic, and to follow her natural development towards the mouth of the Danube. If the latter power is wise, she will adopt that course, which will give her a chance of getting to Constantinople before the Czar; but nothing, we fear, will solve the difficulties of Germany but a Republic.

The Danes are fighting away bravely; and, as they are supported earnestly by the Russians and Swedes, there is no doubt of their success.

In the meanwhile, although we are mercifully spared from many of the evils which afflict the rest of Europe, we are by no means in a healthy and satisfactory state. Ireland, is silently, but rapidly, getting worse and worse—our revenue is rapidly falling off—trade is, in many places, in a wretched state: agriculture, though happily an exception, must be sooner or later depressed, unless energetic means are employed to prevent it. But there appears everywhere—whether we look at Ecclesiastical or civil matters—a sad lack of energy and public spirit. There are no leading minds and hearts.

Listlessness, apathy, indifference, and stagnation, are the order of the day. Where shall we look for a master-mind, or a master-spirit, to move over the surface of our half-paralyzed country, to awake it from its lethargy, to rekindle its zeal, reanimate its hopes and aspirations, and set its machinery (civil and Ecclesiastical) in full and orderly motion?

We almost despair of finding such a master mind in these days of mediocrity and "small things." But why should they who have received, and have not yet altogether lost, the Spirit which dwells in Christ's Holy Catholic Church—why should they wait for mere human inspiration and guidance? Why should the "Priests and Kings" of a Heavenly Country allow their powers and their privileges to lie dormant, or only half-employed, and their responsibilities only partially fulfilled? Apathy, despair, and inactivity are treason in such persons, especially at such a time as this. Let every man and woman realize their individual responsibility towards the Church and the nations, and forthwith act upon it, using all the means, powers, and influences which they possess, and they may win such a blessing for themselves and their country as, in their present sleep, they dream not of."

This paper also contains a long and able charge from the Bishop of Exeter at the Triennial Visitation. The subject of this important charge is "the Church Discipline Act." As this is a measure of great consequence, our readers will be interested in the following account of the change proposed by this Bill, as given by the Bishop. We have no room at present to give the views which this able Prelate expresses concerning the propriety of the most important change which makes "the Thirty-nine Articles to be the sole Test of Heresy."

"I will Proceed to state the most important of the changes which the Bill contemplates.

The first relates to the Commission which the Bishop is now required to issue, in every case of complaint, for the purpose of ascertaining, whether there be "a prima facie ground for instituting further proceedings."

This provision of the present law was intended to give to the accused both the benefit of an inquiry, analogous to that which is made by a grand jury, and also an opportunity of preventing a long and costly suit by his making an early submission, and thus, too, obtaining a lighter sentence (should the circumstances admit), than would be possible, in many cases, if the suit were prosecuted to a full hearing. These benefits it has, in fact, afforded, as my own experience enables me to state; but it has elsewhere been found to introduce the greatest inconveniences, through the publicity of the proceedings, which thus constituted, in effect, a trial, without some of the main securities for the right administration of Justice, which a more formal trial would give.

Instead of this commission—which has been thus found to work very questionably—the new bill substitutes a "private preliminary inquiry" by the Bishop, (or by some one Clergyman, or more, deputed by him) but only in case the accused shall give his written consent to such inquiry. The witnesses are to be examined and cross-examined upon oath, but no lawyers to be admitted; and if the accused confess the charge, and submit to sentence being forthwith pronounced, it may be so pronounced, and so all further proceedings stayed.

But, there is one class of offences altogether excepted from this summary proceeding before the Bishop; and the law is brought back to that, which prevailed before the passing of the late statute. In other words, the case must be heard in the Consistorial Court, whenever the offence alleged is Heresy, false Doctrine, Blasphemy, or Schism.

Now, this is a change, at which we shall, I think, all rejoice: the Bishops, because they will thus be saved from the exercise of a power often viewed with a very invidious eye; the Clergy, because they will have a tribunal restored, to which it is probable, that in cases of Doctrine, many would go with greater confidence.

Whatever the value may be of this part of the measure, the greatest advantage which, in these cases, will be secured by the proposed Bill, is the establishment of a New Court of Appeal in all cases of Heresy and Unsound Doctrine. At present, I need not tell you, that the Appeal is to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to which only those Bishops who are members of the Privy Council can belong. I will not enlarge on the great inconveniences which have been found to arise from this state of the Law. Suffice it to say, that the new court will consist of the two Archbishops, and three Bishops, to be named by the Crown, the Regius and Margaret Professors of Divinity in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge—the Dean of the Court of Arches—the Chancellor of the Diocese of London—the Lord Chancellor—the Master of the Rolls, and the three senior Puisne Judges,—in other words of Five Episcopal members, four Divines occupying the highest chairs of Theology in our two chief Universities—two Ecclesiastical Judges—the two highest Equity Judges—and three of the most eminent Judges of the Common Law Courts. Of these sixteen persons, nine are Spiritual, two others are Spiritual Judges, and the remaining five, Temporal Judges. A Quorum will consist of three Bishops, two Professors, one Ecclesiastical Judge, one Equity Judge, and two of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer.

I hesitate not to avow my own opinion, and to anticipate the concurrence of yours, in saying that I think the composition of such a Court of Appeal, in such cases, is free from all reasonable exceptions.

So much for causes which relate to Doctrines. Other cases of alleged Delinquency, when Articles are filed, are to be heard by the Bishop, either in person, having as his Assessor an Advocate of Doctors' Commons of not less than seven years standing, or a Barrister at Law of not less than ten years; or if the Bishop do not sit in person, then by his Vicar General, if qualified as above, or by a commissary so qualified and specially appointed for the occasion.

But by far the most important change in the mode of proceeding, is that which will give both to the Bishops, and to the accused, the assistance of a Jury of four Beneficed Clergymen of the Archdeaconry, to be appointed by lot out of twelve, who shall be elected in every third year from among the Incumbents of the Archdeaconry.

This Jury will pronounce on the facts; and the Bishop, or his Commissary, on the law.

I should despair of seeing any scheme less open to valid objections, and therefore, I heartily hope it will hereafter pass into law.

I dwell not on the minuter particulars, which may, or may not, be more liable to criticism.

From this subject, I turn to another, which has deeply interested you, and the whole Church—I mean, the avowed intention of introducing in the House of Commons, a clause into the New Bill, making the "Thirty-nine Articles to be the sole Test of Heresy, or false or unsound doctrine, on any points treated of therein."

And here let me, in the outset, express the great gratification which I have felt, and which I believe a very large portion of the most faithful members of the Church, in witnessing the strenuous resistance declared by you to this most dangerous measure. Rarely, if ever, has any occurrence called forth so general, and so zealous a demonstration, at once of your feelings, and of your judgment; for rarely, indeed, if ever, has any occasion so loudly demanded such a demonstration.

It painfully reminds us of the unhappy contest, which, two hundred years ago, filled our land with violence, made desolate our Zion, and threw down our Altars. Then, as now, the Prayer Book was the great object of attack; then, as now, many who were content, reluctantly to use it, reclaimed against the profession of its precious truths, as a burthen, which their conscience found too heavy to be borne."

SCOTLAND.—Bishopric of Glasgow.—At a Special Synod of the Diocese of Glasgow and Galloway, held within St. Mary's Church, Glasgow, on Wednesday, the 7th inst., it was resolved to petition the College of Bishops for an extension of the time allowed to the Presbyters for the election of a Bishop, in the hope that, with additional opportunities for consultation, they might be able to arrive at an entirely unanimous decision.—Glasgow Constitutional.

The Archbishop of York is so far recovered from his recent severe accident as to have been able to leave town on Friday last for Bishopsthorpe.

Dr. Graham, Bishop of Chester, was enthroned in the Cathedral on Friday last.

The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department has acknowledged the receipt of an address to the Queen from three hundred clergymen praying for the restoration of Convocation.

The Bishop of Manchester consecrated Christ church, Ashton-under-Lyne, on Saturday.

Christ church, Bermondsey, was, on Monday consecrated by the Bishop of Winchester. It contains nine hundred and eighty sittings, of which number six hundred are to be free. This is the fourth new church erected in the district of Bermondsey.

The Bishop of Oxford the same day opened the new schools at Headington, near Oxford, with prayers and addresses. From the schools his lordship went in procession to Headington Quarry, a populous and rather distant part of the parish, where he performed the ceremony of laying the first stone of a new church intended to be built there. His lordship was attended by a large body of the clergy and gentry from Oxford and the neighbourhood.

The Rev. Henry Mackenzie, who succeeds Sir Henry Dunksfield as Vicar of St. Martin's, was for some years a clergyman of the diocese of London, and was well known for his exertions as secretary to the fund for the erection of ten additional churches in Bethnal-Green. He was selected by the Dean and Chapter of Norwich for the important office of Vicar of Great Yarmouth, in consequence of the great ability, zeal, and discretion, which he had shown as incumbent of a district church in the neighbourhood of London.

The Rev. Earnest Hawkins, B.D., Secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, has just issued a circular to the members, with reference to its condition—

"During the last four years, it appears, the annual expenditure has been reduced from 80,000*l.* to little more than 60,000*l.* This reduction has been effected without recalling or diminishing the salary of a single missionary. First, by the cessation of payments which had been guaranteed for a limited time; second, by the discontinuance of grants towards the building of churches and schools; third, by withdrawing from the support of schools and schoolmasters, more especially in the West Indies."

The London Diocesan Board of Education held its annual meeting on Wednesday, at 79, Pall-mall, the Bishop of London in the chair. His lordship, in his opening remarks, spoke with great interest of the schools recently established under the name of ragged schools. He was most anxious to bring these schools within the scope of the London Diocesan Board; they had not been quite as successful as might have been hoped in procuring funds, but he hoped that the result of the united efforts of the clergy of his diocese would be to increase the means of affording Church of England education. The following resolution was unanimously adopted—

"That, as the objects for which the Metropolitan School Fund was established still call for the most strenuous exertions of every member of the Church, especially with a view of taking advantage of the offer of assistance made by Government, it is highly necessary that every endeavour be made to increase that fund, and enable the committee to meet the numerous applications for aid in educating poor children in London."

A question having been raised as to the expediency of compelling teachers in ragged schools to adopt the Church of England Catechism, in their teaching before any grant of money in aid of those schools could be made by the London Diocesan Board, the Bishop of London said that the propriety of introducing the Church Catechism into the ragged schools must be left entirely to the judgment of the parochial clergy in the parishes where aid was solicited from the board on behalf of ragged schools.

THE STEWARDSHIP OF THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY. A Charge to the Clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Rhode Island, delivered at the Annual Convention, in Grace church, Providence, June 13, 1848. [Published by request of the Convention]. By J. P. K. Henshaw, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese.

The subject of this admirable Charge, is THE STEWARDSHIP OF THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY, as presented by St. Paul in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, 4th chapter, 1st and 2d verses.

After setting forth in a clear and forcible manner the nature and trust of the ministerial Office—A STEWARDSHIP—a Stewardship of THE MYSTERIES OF GOD—the Bishop concludes with an earnest exhortation to those who were about to take upon them, in ordination, this high and responsible duty.

In this connection we would quote the following rules, as given by the learned and judicious editor of the "True Catholic." A practice like this is worthy of the high principles of sound churchmanship.

The rules which we have long ago laid down for our conduct, and announced to the world, preclude us from making so much as a single remark upon an episcopal charge. We can, therefore, only express our thanks for the courtesy to which we are indebted for a copy.* In doing so, however, we think it best to state again the precise rule by which we are governed, and which we have reason to believe, is not understood. We have been told in various tones and from various quarters, that we have established a rule which precludes us from reviewing any work of a bishop. It is not so. Our rule is not to review an official act of a bishop. It is founded on the great distinction between a bishop and the bishop. A bishop is only a man, a learned and pious man, occupying a distinguished and honored station in the Church; but when he descends into the arena of literature, although entitled to the respect due to his station, his learning, and his piety, is substantially on a par with any other author. But the Bishop of a diocese is the Divinely appointed ruler of that diocese, and when he speaks to it officially, no periodical writer can have a right to say any thing which may diminish in a single mind the weight of his admonitions. It follows that he cannot speak of them at all, for if he has, and exercises occasionally, the right of praise, the withholding praise becomes equivalent to blame. We therefore feel bound to abstain from all comment on the official acts of the Right Reverend Fathers, to whom the care of dioceses has in the course of Divine Providence been committed.

THE CHURCH REVIEW, AND ECCLESIASTICAL REGISTER.—Volume 1. No. 2, July, 1848, New Haven, Conn. Published by Bassett & Bradley, 115 Chapel Street.

This number of the Church Review, in our judgment, fully sustains the high opinion before expressed of it. "The Ecclesiastical Register" is a most important part of the work, and evidences great care and industry in its compilation. In the valuable "Summary of Home Intelligence," the "Standing Committee," "Deputies to General Convention," &c., of New Jersey, are inadvertently placed under the head of Pennsylvania. Editorial.

The first and leading article, in every sense, is the first named. The author is well known, though his name is not given. In our esteem, it would add much to the interest of this Review if the names of the writers were given. Why they should be withheld we know not. Though our weekly contributors are not willing that their names should appear, we think no article should be admitted into a Journal, seeking the high repute aimed at by the Church Review, with which the writer was not willing to associate his name and character.—The public generally like to know whom as well as what they are reading. Though as some profound critic once observed, "Anon. is the most voluminous writer in Literature," yet an article or a book without the writer's name, is often regarded with as little favor as the man who suffered so much from the loss of his shadow!

But for all this, an article from the author of the Review of "Kenrick on the Primacy," needs no name to tell whose it is. We are not therefore betraying any secret when we say, that Dr. Jarvis, in this article, has brought his extensive historical knowledge, and his learned and able mind to bear upon one of the strong holds of error.

Never was there a more opportune time for pressing such arguments upon the public mind. The temporal power of the Papacy, established upon the ruins of fallen Rome, is passing away. The Romans have held the Pope a prisoner in the Vatican! This fact has shown that the bonds of his spiritual despotism have been weakened, the fetters and chains hang loosely upon the captives! An age which can take from the Pope his temporal power is prepared to deny him the keys of his usurped spiritual kingdom. We therefore consider the subject of Dr. Jarvis's article as most appropriate for the times. The power, and just reasoning which mark this discussion of a most important topic, we shall endeavor to show in our next paper, wherein we may have room for extracts, with at least a digest of the arguments by which the learned writer conclusively answers the important question, "WHETHER HE (St. Peter) EVER DID SIT THERE, (at Rome) AS BISHOP OF THAT SEE?"

A SERMON PREACHED AT THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE P. E. MISSIONARY SOCIETY FOR SEAMEN IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK. By ALEXANDER H. VINTON, Rector of St. Paul's church, Boston.

This Sermon (the text is from Psalm cvii. 23,) is a very interesting and striking one. It gives powerful and vivid descriptions of the various dangers, physical, moral, and spiritual, besetting seamen, and is well suited to awaken an interest in this much neglected class of our fellow men. It is sold for the benefit of the Society.

A PILGRIMAGE TO THE HOLY LAND; comprising Recollections, Sketches, and Reflections, made during a Tour in the East. By Alphonse De Lamartine, Member of the Provisional Government of France, &c. &c. New York and Philadelphia, D. & G. S. Appleton & Co.

This book hardly needs the name of Lamartine, one of almost romantic interest, to give it extensive circulation. Few will begin to read without desiring to continue to the end. Whatever may be the fate of its distinguished author in his wonderful political history, he has a popularity which depends not upon the fickle-minded mob. If our readers desire an interesting and instructive work at once suited to the coolest and hottest weather, if they wish a book for a companion of their summer travels, one to think over in the shady groves of the country, or to dream over by the sea shore: let them not forget to take with them a copy of this work.

The notice of some other works received, and for which we thank those who sent them, we are obliged to defer.

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

DIED.—On the 11th day of May, 1848, in Smithfield, Isle of Wight County, Virginia, in the 75th year of her age, Mrs. SUSAN E. BENHAM, relict of the late Capt. E. BENHAM, of Connecticut. Mrs. Benham was a native of New Haven, Conn. Nearly forty years ago she received at the hands of the Venerable Seabury, the first Bishop of Connecticut, the apostolic rite of confirmation, was long a member of Trinity Church, New Haven, but for the last fifteen years a resident of Smithfield. The whole life of this venerable mother in Israel, was a beautiful comment upon the peacefulness and the purity of our most holy faith. Religion with her was a principle, not an impulse; and her attachment to the worship, doctrines, and discipline of the Protestant Episcopal Church, being not the result of a blind preference, but of deep and prayerful investigation; and the conclusion at which she arrived, that it was both primitive and apostolic. She was enabled at all times to give a reason for the hope within her. Her Bible and her prayer book, the one an admirable exponent of the other, were ever precious in her sight,—and were resorted to in the dark hours of her afflictions, while her heart humble and trusting before and in its God, was there directed, as were the inquiring ones of old, who asked, "Lord teach us how to pray." She had been sorely tried in the furnace of affliction. "Her more than Brother, and her next to God," had fallen far away from home in a foreign land, and when she, then the young wife, looked out for his coming—the tidings were brought that he was no more! One by one, three children, the links which bound her heart to the memories of the past and the dead, were stricken in death—she bowed to these bereavements—but her cry at each stroke was, "I know oh Lord that thy judgments are right, and that in faithfulness hast thou afflicted me."

During her illness, the writer of this hasty notice visited the aged saint, and was privileged to pray beside her death couch. Death came to her not as the unwelcome and the unbidden guest—she awaited his call, as that of a welcome friend, and but one brief hour before her spirit winged its flight—she requested those who were surrounding her bed, to sing

"I would not live away!—No, welcome the tomb,
Since Jesus hath lain there I dread not its gloom;
There sweet be my rest till he bid me arise
To hail him in triumph descending the skies."

In compliance with her desire we proceeded to consecrate the elements of the Lord's Supper—but while repeating the Lord's prayer, herself joining audibly in it, she fell asleep in Jesus, murmuring, "hallowed be thy name!"

"The smile of the Lord was the feast of her soul" in heaven. She was there to drink no more of the fruit of the vine on earth—and those of us who were privileged to see her calm exit from this to a better world, felt that, that death-chamber was "quite on the verge of heaven." It was good for us to be there.

In obedience to her request, her funeral sermon was preached from the cxix. Psalm, 75.—"I know, oh Lord, that thy judgments are right, and that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me." We thought as the text was handed to us as we left the house of sanctified affliction, of the preceding verse of the same Psalm.—"They that fear thee will be glad when they see me, because I have hoped in thy word." Her request was complied with, and amid the tears of the young and the old, who followed her to the grave, and the solemn tolling of the muffled bell of our little village church, her coffin, adorned with white roses from a bush she had planted and tended, was laid in the grave beside a granddaughter, who young and beautiful, had preceded her to the vision of God, prepared for the pure in heart. She sleeps beneath the shadows of a primeval grove, through which, even while we write the soft winds are playing, and the wild birds hymning their morning lay—but thy spirit, oh mother in Israel, hath now its home on high. We thought as we laid her in the grave, of these beautiful words of Bryant:—

"Why weep we then for her, who having won
The bound of her appointed years at last,
Life's blessings all enjoyed, life's trials done,
Serenely to her final rest has passed?
While the soft memory of her virtues yet,
Lingers like twilight hues when the bright sun is set.

Her youth was innocent, her riper age,
Marked by some act of goodness, every day;
And watch'd by eyes that loved her—calm and sage Faded her last declining years away—
Cheerful she gave her being up, and went
To share the holy rest that waits a life well spent.

And I am glad that she has lived thus long,
And I am glad that she has gone to her reward!
Nor can I deem that Nature did her wrong,
Softly to disengage the vital cord.
For when her hand grew feeble, and her eye
Dark with the mists of age, it was her time to die."

Smithfield, Va., June 30, 1848.

Diocesan Intelligence.

Pennsylvania.—At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, held on July 4th, Testimonials were signed on behalf of Messrs. Archibald Beatty and Jacob Rambo, applying to be recommended for admission to the Holy Order of Deacons. Also, on behalf of Mr. J. Dunlin Parkinson, applying to be recommended for admission as a Candidate for Holy Orders. M. A. DEWOLFE HOWE, Secretary. Philadelphia, July 5th, 1848.

New Jersey.—The Rev. Andrew Mackie, A. B., an Alumnus of the General Theological Seminary, was admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons, on the 2d Sunday after Trinity, in St. Mary's Church, Burlington, by the Bishop of New Jersey.

CLERICAL REMOVAL.—The Rev. Dexter Potter has been received, on letters dimissory from the Diocese of Connecticut, and is the Minister of St. Thomas' Church, Vernon, officiating at Montague.

LAYING OF CORNER-STONE.—The corner-stone of the Church of the Ascension, Gloucester Point, was laid June 6, at 5 o'clock, P. M., by the Rev. J. L. Labagh, who performed the ceremony at the request of the Bishop, who was unable to attend. The Rev. Mr. Harrold of St. John's Church, Berkeley, was present, and assisted in the services. A Bible and Prayer Book, enclosed in a tin box, were deposited in the stone: after the laying of which—according to the prescribed form—an address was delivered by the Rector, stating the encouraging circumstances under which the enterprise was commenced, and the favourable prospects of the parish.—Missionary.

The above is indeed an important enterprise for the Church in New Jersey. The proposed edifice is to be erected in a thriving and fast growing manufacturing town, destined undoubtedly soon to become a place of commercial importance. The lot has been given with the condition that the Church shall be built upon it within two years. Of course under such circumstances they will need assistance. And we trust when the case is fairly presented ready hands will be found to aid in the good work.

GENERAL PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—Annual Meeting of the Board of Managers.—Pursuant to notice the Board met on Wednesday afternoon, in the Sunday School Room of St. John's Chapel. The Bishops of New Jersey, Maryland, and Western New York were present. The Annual Report of the Executive Committee was read, and ordered to be published. The following gentlemen were elected the Executive Committee for the ensuing year. The Rev. Drs. Berrian, Henry and Haight. Rev. Messrs. Pardee, Eigenbrodt, Evans, Southard, and DeKoven, and Messrs. Mitchell, Morgan, Herrick and Duncan.

New York.—EPISCOPAL ACTS BY THE BISHOP OF WESTERN NEW YORK, ACTING BY REQUEST OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE OF THE DIOCESE:

27th. In St. Cornelius's Church, Governor's Island, in the afternoon, preached and confirmed nineteen persons; and also confirmed one sick person in private at Brooklyn—as member of St. Paul's Church, Albany.

27th. In St. Mark's Church, Williamsburgh, in the evening, preached and confirmed twenty persons, including four from Immanuel Church, Brooklyn, and one from St. Paul's College.

28th. Consecrated St. Saviour's Church, Maspeth, Long Island, and preached and administered the Holy Communion on the occasion.

29th. Consecrated Christ Protestant Episcopal Church, New York, and administered the Holy Communion.

30th. Presided at the Commencement of the General Theological Seminary in St. John's Church; delivered a Charge, and administered the Holy Communion.

At the Church of the Crucifixion, in the evening, preached and confirmed eighteen persons.

July 2d. In Grace Church, New York, held an ordination, in the morning, and admitted Messrs. Theodore Augustus Eaton, Horace Hall Reid, Gurdon Huntington, James Francis Le Baron, Thomas Stafford Drowne, of the Diocese of New York, Josiah Phelps, of Indiana, and Sylvanus Reed, and Rufus Doane Stearns, of Western New York, to the Holy Order of Deacons, and the Rev. James Wells Coe, and Rev. Henry Erskine Duncan, to the Holy Order of Priests.

In the afternoon, in the Seamen's Church of the Holy Comforter, preached and confirmed nine persons, including one from St. Luke's Church.

CONSECRATION OF ST. SAVIOUR'S CHURCH, MASPEETH, L. I.—This Church, recently completed, was consecrated to the service of Almighty God by Bishop DeLancey on Wednesday, the 28th of June.

The Bishop and the Clergy, habited in surplices, accompanied by the surviving Warden and the Vestrymen of the Parish, moved in procession from the Maspeth Hotel, and entered the Church by the West door.

The Rev. Mr. Clapp read the Request to Consecrate, and after the consecration by the Bishop, the Sentence of Consecration was read by the Rector.

The Ante-communion was said by the Bishop, who also preached the Sermon—consecrated and administered the Holy Eucharist to the clergy, and a part of the lay communicants, being assisted by the Rector; and the Rev. Dr. Brown and the Rector administering to the remaining communicants.

CONSECRATION OF CHRIST CHURCH, NEW YORK.—This Church, which was destroyed by fire last summer, having been rebuilt upon the former site, in Anthony street, Broadway, was consecrated on Thursday last by the Feast of St. Peter, the Apostle, by the Rt. Rev. Dr. DeLancey.

The day was propitious, and the attendance of the clergy numerous, though not so numerous as it would have been, had it not been for the session of the Board of Trustees of the General Theological Seminary, which was then being held.

Much interest, of course, was felt in the consecration of this Church from its connection with the venerable and respected Dr. Lyell, whose desire it was to see this Church rebuilt, but which was denied him by a wise and overruling Providence. The building is commodious, and is an improvement on the edifice which formerly stood on the present site.

The clergy in attendance were habited in surplices.—Churchman.

Western New York.—CORNER-STONE LAID AT CLAYVILLE.—It was with much regret that we had to forego the pleasure of accompanying our beloved Diocesan and the brethren by whom he was attended, on Wednesday, the 21st. God in his providence, evidently intimated that our duty was to remain quietly at home. From a Rev. brother, we have received such items of the exercises on the occasion, as to enable us to prepare the following account.

The day was fine, and the sun, just so much obscured as to render the services perfectly interesting in the open air, on a platform where a temporary desk had been erected. Evening prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Hull, of New Berlin, assisted in the lessons by the Rev. A. P. Smith, of Camden. The Bishop preached to an audience of more than 2000, some said 3000, and was easily heard by the whole concourse. At the close of this service a procession was formed, consisting of the Bishop and the Clergy present, in their gowns; which moved to the site of the contemplated edifice, where the corner-stone was laid by the Bishop, with the usual solemnities, according to the prescribed order of the Diocesan. An address was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Proal, Rector of Trinity Church, in this city.

This is one of the most interesting enterprises for good, that we have seen put forward in this vicinity, and we offer our most earnest prayers for the blessing of God, by his Grace through Jesus Christ our Lord, upon all who have put their hands to this noble work.

Clayville is a new manufacturing village, in the Sauquoit valley, about twelve miles from this city. It has been commenced within the last three or four years, and numbers now a population of some 1,500, and is rapidly increasing, and yet there has been no effort to erect a house of worship before the present attempt.

Great credit is due to the Hon. F. Hollister, of Utica, for the exertion he has, and is making to carry forward this enterprise; not only for his exertion, but for his liberality, and at the same time much credit must be bestowed upon those gentlemen, here and elsewhere, who have sustained Mr. Hollister in this generous work. They have well judged in the effort to erect a Temple to the Lord.

We would not offer the sordid motive of money-making, on such an occasion, and yet we are very free to say that if money men, manufacturers, and dealers of all sorts, knew what their best interests were, they would promote the erection of Free Churches, and have stated worship in all their establishments. The Woolen and Cotton Mills should have their houses of prayer, their hours for prayer, and their Pastors to conduct them, in all these appliances.

Our monied men, our great dealers, should be speedy in the work of providing religious training for the hundreds and thousands of those young people who are now under their employ, and we say to them in all respect and kindness, you must see to this in due season. The Master will soon call for the account of your stewardship, and you must answer to the question, not whether your profits have been one or two hundred per cent, but whether you have paid any regard to the teaching of the Young who turn your wheels and draw out your threads. You must look well to this if you have any thought of that day, when he that holds the nations in the hollow of his hand, shall make inquisition for blood. We would hold up the example of Clayville and its proprietors as well worthy of imitation.

BISHOP DELANCEY'S VISITATION.—On Tuesday afternoon, June 20th, Bishop DeLancey visited Christ Church, Manlius. The Bishop confirmed thirteen persons, (including one sick person in private,) and preached. Other Clergy present were the Rev. D. Pise, of Fayetteville, the Rev. A. Gregory, of Rome, the Rev. Mr. Wardwell, of Syracuse.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. N. P. Tillinghast has accepted a call to the Rectorship of St. John's, Georgetown, D. C., and entered upon the duties of the parish.

The Rev. Carter Page has taken letters dimissory from the Diocese of Maryland, to the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Virginia.

The Rev. Henry H. Bean has taken letters dimissory from the same diocese to the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Pennsylvania.

The Rev. R. H. Bourne has received and accepted a call to the Rectorship of St. Thomas's Church, Brooklyn, L. I., and requests all letters and papers directed accordingly.

The Rev. Henry Townsend has resigned the Rectorship of the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Stockport, N. Y., and returned to his former cure, the Rectorship of St. James's Church, Westville, Ct. Post office address, New Haven, Ct.

The Rev. Geo. P. Hopkins, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Doylestown, Pa., having taken up his residence in that place, requests that papers and letters be directed accordingly.

The Rev. Wm. A. Matson, having resigned the charge of Grace Church, Waterville, has accepted that of St. Peter's Church, Oriskany, and St. John's Whitesboro. His letters and papers should be directed to the last named place.

Rev. T. B. Fairchild, of Logansport, Cass co., Indiana, has received and accepted a unanimous call to the rectorship of Christ Church, Hudson, Summit co., Ohio. All letters and papers, &c., to be directed accordingly.

my mother came in hopes of getting fine work from the gentry; and here's a certificate from a kind gentleman, the vicar of our parish; I used to run errands for him, and he said it might be useful to me."

"This is to certify that Ralph Allen is a sensible, honest, industrious boy, and I hope will continue to be so. WM. WARBURTON," said the Postmaster, reading loud. "Well, that's a good certificate, though the writer is unknown to me; but we will let it pass for this time, and take you on trial."

After several exhortations to be careful of the mail, and walk fast, that he might arrive in time, Ralph Allen was duly equipped with a leathren bag, suspended by a strap over his shoulder, containing all the letters and newspapers in those days transmitted to Marlborough, and sent forth to earn the half-penny per mile.

Day after day he performed that appointed journey, through sun and shower, going and coming to the entire satisfaction of the Postmasters of Bath and Marlborough. Roads were not then so convenient for travellers, nor time so precious with the public, as at present; but Ralph was never known to loiter by the way, nor arrive an hour too late, which could seldom be said of other post boys. Travellers between the towns soon began to know him on the road, and remarked from stage-coach, wagon, or saddle—the only modes of conveyance in those days—that his conduct was always careful and steady; and people who did not travel trusted him with small messages in consequence of their reports. If a lady wanted a fashionable cap from Bath, or a notable housekeeper some trifle which could be bought cheaper in Marlborough, Ralph Allen was known to be a sober and less exorbitant carrier than either the coachman or wagoner, and he was preferred accordingly. This was a source of additional gain, which increased every day, till the boy generally reached his destination in either town laden with parcels of all sorts and sizes, for the carriage of which he received from two-pence to a farthing, as the case might be, or the liberality of his employers dictated. How the short time allowed between the close of his daily duty and his nightly rest was usually spent in his mother's poor, but clean garret, nobody could tell; till Mr. Leatham, who had by this time a very high opinion of his most boy for general good conduct and correctness in his station,

"It is upon the rock of this immovable and supreme authority, that we feel it necessary to place ourselves, whenever we are called upon to exercise our powers as rulers, as powers that are ordained of God for the well-being of human society; and which, therefore, men cannot resist, without resisting and fighting against the ordinance of God. Such is the odium which is now attached to the name of authority, such is the almost universal hatred of authority, and obedience, as if it implied some kind of injustice or oppression; such is the impatience of restraint, and the Babelian confusion for liberty in the world, that the minister of truth lacks the courage to lift up his voice to preach submission to authority, to speak of the sacredness of the civil power, of the power ordained of God, were it not, that in the volume of his authority, he can point to numberless emphatic declarations, not only warrant him in thus speaking, but make it his duty so to speak.

"What a contrast, my brethren, between the spirit of the world, and the spirit of the Bible! In the world, I see rebellion, egoism, and patriotism and public virtue. In the Bible, I see every where honoring of rulers, and the patient obedience of the subject, enjoined in the most solemn manner, as an essential part of the duty which we owe to God. In the world, we are governed struggling to abridge the authority of the ruler, making pretended or real abuses, an excuse for striking at the power that is set over them, and winning applause from a multitude, just in proportion as they are forward to the position to the government, under which they live. In the Bible, we are enjoined to contend for the removal of all established authority, to contend for the removal of the power, for the transfer of power from the ruler to the subject."

"And I, making pretended or real abuses, an excuse for striking at the power that is set over them, and winning applause from a multitude, just in proportion as they are forward to the position to the government, under which they live. In the Bible, we are enjoined to contend for the removal of all established authority, to contend for the removal of the power, for the transfer of power from the ruler to the subject. This is the duty of a patriot, and a benefactor. I look into the Bible, and I see that to be meek and lowly, to take it patiently, to do well and suffer for it; to be obedient, not only to the law, but also to the froward; to deny our own wills, and interest; to be clothed with humility, to be subject, all of us, one to another, and to every ordinance of the Lord's sake; to be living on the earth as strangers and pilgrims, thinking ever more of our duties, than of our rights, ever more of our heavenly hopes, than of our earthly losses and trials; that this is to be a follower of Christ, and to be acceptable with God.

"Ralph Allen, and gentle, but also to the froward; to deny our own wills, and interest; to be clothed with humility, to be subject, all of us, one to another, and to every ordinance of the Lord's sake; to be living on the earth as strangers and pilgrims, thinking ever more of our duties, than of our rights, ever more of our heavenly hopes, than of our earthly losses and trials; that this is to be a follower of Christ, and to be acceptable with God.

It is the Providence of God, and not my own choice, which has thrown this subject before me this morning, by causing, that, in the order of the Church, those pointed words of the holy Apostle St. Peter, should be read as an important part of the will of God, in the Epistle for this day. "Dearly beloved, I beseech you, as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul;" i. e. from inordinate and sinful affections, from the passionate and turbulent pursuit of the objects of this world, the objects of pride, of ambition, of sensual desire; abstain from these, "having your conversation honest among the Gentiles: that whereas they speak against you, as evil-doers, they may by your good works, which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation;" i. e. have their minds so conciliated to Christianity by the meek and blameless lives of its professors, that when the grace of God shall open the door for their conversion they may be predisposed to receive the truth, and to glorify God by their sudden transformation from darkness to light, from unrighteousness to holiness. "Submit yourselves," continues the Apostle, "to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether it be to kings as supreme; or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him, for the punishment of evil-doers and for the praise of them that do well. For so is the will of God, that with well-doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men: as free, and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness; but as the servants of God. Honor all men: love the brotherhood; fear God; honor the king."

These words, as they were spoken from the altar in reading the Epistle for the day, would have sounded strangely in the ears of this generation, had they been the words of man, instead of being, as they are, the words of God. It would have been considered, by not a few, that the preacher was reviving obsolete notions, and setting himself, somewhat presumptuously and offensively, against the popular cause of human freedom. But forasmuch as they are not the cogitations of his own mind that he is uttering, but only the words of Holy Scriptures, which the minister is reading as a part of the appointed service of the Church, the case is widely different. People have a way of listening to the gravest teachings of Holy Scriptures, when thus presented, as if they were something unreal, or something, which, however beautiful and true, when uttered, refer to a different state of society, and have little application to them. They say it is the minister reading the Lesson or the Epistle for the day: and so never consider deeply what it is that is read; or how far their duty, or their interests are concerned in the things delivered. They are not very far removed from the case of those gross minded persons to whom God sent His prophets, and the teachings of His written word; and who, having eyes to see, saw not; and having ears to hear, understood not the things which belonged to their peace.

But it seems to me, my brethren, that when the holy Apostle enjoined it so emphatically upon Christians, to be "subject to every ordinance of man, for the Lord's sake," he spake, not for one country, or for one age, but for all countries, and all ages; it seems to me, that when he addressed these, and many other similar words, to Christians living under an usurped authority, under kings and governors, who reigned only as conquerors and governed with a peculiarly despotic power; (for all Judea and Asia Minor, was at that time subjugated to the Roman obedience, and the Proconsular Rule, was not famed for its justice or moderation,) I say, when the Apostle enjoined upon Christians, in such circumstances, scrupulous submission to every ordinance of man, for the Lord's sake, to kings, and to the governors sent by them, saying not one word about the duty of struggling for supposed rights, but a great many words about the blessedness and the glory of persevering in obedience, meekly and patiently, even when maligned and oppressed; it seems to me, he meant to lay down that line of conduct, which, under all changes, would be most meet for the elect of God, and the heirs of Heaven. Their kingdom is not of this world. If they are not to take overmuch thought or care, "what they shall eat," or "wherewithal they shall be clothed," so neither are they to be forever distracted with jealousy and strife, about the kind of government under which they spend their few earthly days, about the amount of temporal honor or advantage which shall accrue to them from the constitution of the civil state, through which they pass like the flitting of a shadow. If it may sometimes be their duty to bear weighty charges connected with the state, they are to do it meekly and faithfully, in the fear of God; if it may sometimes be permitted to them, to cast their influence on the side of good government, in preference to that which is bad, when the means of doing so legitimately are providentially placed in their hands, yet they are not to give up their lives to political agitation and strife; they are not to meddle with those turbulent spirits who are given to change, they are not to be forward to bring railing accusations against those who are in authority; but rather to incline to the opposite extreme; to honor the civil magistrate, to uphold his hands where it is possible to do so conscientiously; to go far in the way of uncomplaining obedience; to be unearthly in their tempers, holy and harmless in their demeanor, remembering ever that they are to be here but for a little while; that the fashion of this world passeth away; that, as sinners, subjection and obedience, are what they need, as a chastening discipline, rather than unbridled liberty; that the example which a sinful world needs, is an example of patient submission to authority, rather than of self-will and strife for power and license.

This seems to me to be the general tenor of the teaching of Holy Scripture, in regard to the duty of the Christian citizen; and believing it to be so, I venture to presume, that while the million are crying out against the various forms of civil power, and exulting at the overthrow of established governments, it will be permitted to one humble minister of God's Church to set forth, according to His Word, the duty of submitting to every ordinance of man, for the Lord's sake. And in doing so, I confess that I speak for the most part, to those who are in humble circumstances. I could wish, that on the present occasion at least, my whole congregation were of that class. I have little hope that my words will make much impression on those who are accustomed to the excitement of political agitation; but I have persuaded myself, that perhaps here and there, a humble individual might be taught to see how very wrong it is to be indulging in jealousies and suspicions, against those who happen to be in authority, to be sympathising with those who are rejoicing at the overthrow of well settled governments; how very wrong and how very unwise it is, to allow themselves to be drawn into the distractions of political strife, when they can scarcely possess the means of forming a clear judgment of the questions at issue, and when they are almost certain to be at once deceived and despised.

I have spoken generally of the duty of submitting to every ordinance of man, for the Lord's sake. Indeed subjection and obedience to a law and an authority external to himself, the submission of his will to a will higher than his own, is of the very essence of Christian Holiness. The very first dawnings of Christian virtue, appear in the form of reverential and loving submission to parental authority, involving the sacrifice of present gratification, the abnegation of self, the renunciation of liberty and a generous trust and confidence, even where reasons are unintelligible and appearances startling. And all through this mortal life Christian virtue is the same thing: it is obedience in the family, obedience in the state, obedience in things spiritual; it is the very reverse of unbridled liberty and self-will; it is the abnegation of self; it is reverence for something which is above us; it is a readiness to forego our own preferences, and our own gratification, for the gratification or good of others. It is the being subject, all of us, one to another; neither envy, nor variance, nor hatred, nor strife, nor discontent, nor pride, nor insubordination is any part of Christian holiness. To obey them that have the rule over us, and to submit ourselves, to do this in spite of hardship and injustice, so long as the authority re-

Submission to Government, the Christian's Duty.

A Sermon for the third Sunday after Easter. By the Rev. Horatio Potter, D.D., Rector of St. Peter's, Albany, a Brother of Bishop of Pennsylvania

"Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake." 1 ST. PETER II. 13.

There are some truths, which have obtained so general an acceptance in the world, and are so grateful to the natural sentiments of the human heart, that we can refer to them, without feeling the need of vindicating and protecting ourselves in the assertion of them, by any formal appeal to argument or authority. They may be derived originally from the word of God: they may find in that word, the only sure evidence, by which they can be fully authenticated, when seriously called in question; nevertheless they have gained so wide a recognition as welcome truths among all classes of men: they have become so incorporated with the common sentiments of mankind, that they have come to be regarded, less as a part of the teaching of revelation, than as the obvious dictate of natural reason and conscience. We often assume them to be true, therefore, and weave them into our practical instructions, with but a slight feeling of our dependence for support upon the mere authoritative declarations of Holy Writ. Such are many of the precepts contained in the Decalogue, and in the sermon on the mount. Whether fully obedient to them ourselves, or not, there are many of them, which we never think of calling in question.

But there are other doctrines, in the inculcation of which, we feel at once, and very deeply, our absolute dependence upon the authority of the Divine Word, the need we have to plant ourselves, in the very outset, even before we have fully developed our ideas, or employed any reasoning, upon that Rock of Adamant, that immovable foundation of all moral truth, the Bible, the unchangeable Word of the all-holy and eternal God! It is consolatory that there is one thing in the wide world which does not change. In a day of trouble and rebuke, when thrones and dominions are shaken, when governments and laws are changed in a hour, at the bidding of the vehement and inconstant million, are made the sport and spoil, or the weapons of contending factions—when opinions are growing unsettled, and when no truth is so venerable, or so well established, as to pass unquestioned; at such a time it is consoling to reflect, that there is one thing on earth which is staple, one authority which cannot be dethroned, one code of law which cannot be revised by human hands, one infallible standard of truth which, however much its meaning may be perverted, or despised, or forgotten, in times of excitement and delusion, will be sure to make its voice heard in the pauses of the tempest, and to become the central rallying point of all the wise and good that are left on the earth.

It is by the side of this infallible and immutable standard of mains; to honor all men, to love the brotherhood, to fear God, to honor the King, or the Civil Magistrate, whoever he may be, to abstain as strangers and pilgrims, from all those turbulent and covetous passions, which war against the soul; this is virtue in God's sight, this is to walk as Christian men, and heirs of heaven.

It is worthy of remark, that while the word of God enjoins obedience, submission to every ordinance of man, for the Lord's sake, in the most emphatic terms, as if in it were included all excellence and all safety; not one word is said concerning limitations and exceptions. That which self-willed men are so eagerly inquiring after, and disputing about—in what cases obedience may be withheld, and authority resisted—how far it is permitted to abridge the power of the ruler, and to enlarge the freedom of the subject—these are questions, which the Holy Scriptures will not so much as mention. They lay down obedience as the rule; they inculcate obedience as the only reality; they insist upon submission, even where authority had been usurped, even where there was hardship and wrong: they tell us that an inoffensive temper, a faithful and patient spirit, when we do well and suffer for it; that this, and not anger or turbulence, is acceptable with God. But whether cases can arise, in which we shall be justified in resisting the power, or how much wrong will justify resistance, or who is to judge whether the supposed wrong be real or imaginary, these are questions with which the Divine Word will have nothing to do. It will not so much as recognize the notion that there need be, or ought to be, any exception to the rule of obedience. And what are we to infer from this? Why, that the danger of sinful man is all on the side of pride, and rebellion, and self-will, and not at all on the side of too much reverence for authority. The inference is, that if we mean to be holy as God is holy, we must not only honor our father and our mother, but we must, in like manner, for the language of Scripture is the same, honor the Civil Magistrate, and all, who in the order of Providence, have the rule over us, making respect for their authority a principle of conscience, regarding obedience as our great duty and our chief security, forgetting almost that such a thing as resistance can ever be proper for us, or if such a necessity should ever seem to be imposed on us, meeting it as the direst of evils, and the heaviest of responsibilities.

I am not here to inquire how governments are to be improved, or what are the just limitations of power on the one side, or of personal liberty and privilege on the other. For an answer to these questions Christians must be referred to the constitutions, and usages, and laws of their respective states. That which the law of holiness, the word of Almighty God enjoins upon them, is not excessive anxiety, or jealousy, or strife, about their rights, but very scrupulous care about their duties, and especially the duty under all ordinary, and under many extraordinary circumstances, of rendering obedience to all in authority. No doubt there are conceivable cases in which the withholding of obedience may become an imperative duty. Were a child commanded by his parent to commit a crime he would of course be bound to disobey. Similar cases may occur in the relations between the magistrate and the citizen; yet the fact that these exceptions are never anticipated in the Scriptures, the duty of obedience being laid down in the most absolute form, without limitation or exception, as "children obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right;" this fact, I say, may serve to show us, that for us, sinners as we are, living in a sinful world, subjection and obedience are the great necessity, that all our thoughts and efforts need to be drawn that way, and that all else, the love of independence, the questionings of pride and self-will, are but vanity and folly.

Surely we need not ask, why obedience and subjection should be so very necessary. If man in a state of innocence was subject to law, if even the angels are not free, but obedient to the will of the All-Merciful, finding in obedience all their joy, then we may be sure, that for those who have corrupted themselves and fallen through disobedience, there can be no hope of being purified, and disciplined, and raised up, and restored to holiness, but through the same way of subjection and obedience; subjection and obedience in the family, subjection and obedience in the state, subjection and obedience in things spiritual. Obedience mortifies the corrupt inclinations and passions, subdues unholy pride and self-will, represses and destroys what is evil in man, and causes to spring up in the heart, peace and self-devotion, and the joy of a good conscience, and whatsoever things are pure, and amiable, and lovely, and of good report. And on the other hand, it is but too certain, that self-will never triumphs over authority, in the family, or in the state, without awakening pride and selfishness, and unfettering all the evil passions of the human heart. The child which has begun by successfully defying the mild authority of the parent, quickly learns to tyrannise over the younger inmates of the same nursery; having ceased to be a loyal and contented subject himself, he speedily swells into a heartless and capricious despot, whose domineering over brothers, and sisters, and nurses is as much worse than the gentle rule of the rightful head, as the sway of the Dantons, and Robespierres, and Bonapartes, men of the people, was more ruthless and unprincipled than the reign of the monarch, whom they had deposed, and murdered, in pretended devotion to the happiness of the people.

So long as the legitimate government in the state, whatever it be, remains in its place, maintaining its authority, the evil passions of men are kept down, are kept inactive and invisible, from the lack of stimulus, and the lack of opportunity to display themselves: the lust of power and pre-eminence, so natural to man, slumbers in the soul, or contents itself with inferior triumphs, with legitimate rewards, when it sees that order is established in the state, and that no place or power can be won, save by orderly means. But when once the supreme power, whatever it be, has been deposed, when once the high places have been made vacant, and the way of filling them thrown open to popular caprice, or individual enterprise, then is the time for ambition to swell into a monster passion; then is the time for crafty and selfish men to play upon the passions of the people, to flatter their pride, to work upon their envies and jealousies, to win their confidence by feeding them with professions and promises, and at last, while pretending to establish universal liberty, to sweep all the precious things of the state into the grasp of their own power. The end of obedience and order in the state, is the signal for the rising up of all base passions, to scheme and plot for selfish ends, to cajole the people, in order that they may be the more effectually plundered and devoured. Then the visionary enthusiast prospers; his wild and fatal counsels are preferred to the experience and wisdom of ages, are hailed as new revelations in political science, and he is called to occupy places, which were sufficiently delicate and difficult for the profoundest practical statesman. And so it usually happens, that the people who began by insubordination and rebellion, for the sake of enlarging their freedom and improving their social condition, end by being whelmed in ruin, by the folly and presumption of the theorists whom they have been persuaded to elevate, or by being made the sport of demagogues, or the slaves of some bold and cunning usurper. The great law of obedience, then, of obedience even where hardships exist, is necessary to the conservation of human society;—is necessary as a safe-guard against the outbreak of wicked and destructive passions, necessary as the only means of supplying that condition of strain and discipline, by which alone sinful men can be prevented from growing worse, can be in a state to be chastened, aured to self-control, and purified for a better world. Truly reason enough visible to us, why in Holy Scripture mission to the civil power, as to a power ordained of God, should be so solemnly enjoined upon us, and why we should be treated as the greatest of evils and the greatest of crimes.

But I have said, that on this occasion, I am addressing myself to the humbler portion of my charge, to that class of people who, in all times of commotion are apt to be appeased and excited to discontent and insubordination, under the plea that they are treated with peculiar injustice, and that they especially are to be benefitted by change, if need be by revolution. That such appeals, even when entirely groundless, should prove successful, is no ways strange. When people are that they are not well governed, in plausible language, who professes to be their friend, they must be possessed than ordinary intelligence, and moderation, and principle, be carried away with passion, not to be moved to discretion. Then come tumults, and rebellions, and revolutions. Tranquil fields of industry are forsaken, and peaceable violence, and cunning men rise into power; and by crime, and poverty, cover the land, which, but lately, was ling with innocence and plenty. Permit me to tell you, brethren, that in all such convulsions, the poor man, the very persons who are flattered with the promise of advantages, are the first to suffer, and that in such cases they suffer evils, compared with which every thing of which had been excited to complain, was the fullness of prosperity, the very perfection of good government. The French Revolution was a notable example to the world; it was only a true development of human nature. The people were excited by artful men, to rise up against their rulers; they dethroned him; they broke up the very foundations of government, and of society. All order and all security, and what was the consequence? They fell into the hands of bloody and remorseless demagogues, men, who, with the cry of liberty and love for the people forever on their lips, were forever trampling on the necks of the people, and in their blood; men, who spent their days and nights in plotting against each other for power, and in sending to the scaffold, whatever in the kingdom was most heroic and virtuous. The people were flattered and promised; their splendid capitol was converted into a great slaughter house: the gentle and virtuous monarch was murdered with every aggravation of cruelty, between contending factions; the nations were involved in war. But it began to be perceived, by and by, that virtue and plenty were not inevitable fruits of convulsions, which sent men from quiet industry to scenes of agitation and rapine. When the nation was sick of blood, and weary of being cheated and cajoled by its five hundred Despots, then it fell an easy prey to that Arch Deceiver and Tyrant, who with liberty and the people still on his lips, rolled up an unexampled power, and ruled with an iron sceptre, and bound the people to his chariot wheels, and sacrificed them by hundreds of thousands to his pride and ambition. Their property went to provide munitions of war for his millions; their young men to suffer and to perish on the plains of Italy, or amid the snows of Russia. After being for twenty years cheated, and oppressed, and devoured, they were glad to take refuge, once more, under the self-same dynasty, which they had been excited to overthrow, by the promise of a blessed political millennium. Through all these changes they who were to have gained, were ever the very ones to be thrust forward into the front ranks of poverty, and suffering, and death.

And what is it that is passing in France now? Again, and

* The reader of Hooker will recall to mind the pregnant words of that great thinker. They will bear a repetition here:—"He that goeth about to persuade a multitude that they are not so well-governed as they ought to be, shall never want attentive and favourable hearers; because they know the manifold defects whereunto every kind of regiment is subject, but the secret lets and difficulties, which in public proceedings are innumerable and inevitable, they have not ordinarily the judgment to consider. And because such as openly reprove supposed disorders of state are taken for principal friends to the common benefit of all, and for men that carry singular freedom of mind; under this fair and plausible colour whatsoever they utter passeth for good and current. That which wanteth in the weight of their speech, is supplied by the aptness of men's minds to accept and believe it. Whereas on the other side, if we maintain things that are established, we have not only to strive with a number of heavy prejudices deeply rooted in the hearts of men, who think that herein we serve the time, and speak in favor of the present state, because thereby we either hold or seek preferment; but also to bear such exceptions as minds so averted beforehand usually take against that which they are loth should be poured into them."

for the third time, a government has been overthrown; and all for liberty, and for the pretended benefit of the people. Yet here again, liberty is seen perishing under the despotism of mobs, and the caprice of self-constituted and an irresponsible government; the people are starving and frantic, under the loss of employment and of bread; and visionary and presumptuous men, by their wild and fatal schemes, are exciting the astonishment if not the contempt, of the sober part of the world. If these schemes do not bring confusion, and ruin upon that kingdom, far beyond what it is now experiencing, then all history and all political science have spoken to us in vain. When all this shall be past, a whole generation will be required to bring back the mass of the people to the rational views, and the simple virtuous sentiments, which have been corrupted and destroyed in this revolution. The poor have been excited to jealousy against the rich; the laborer has been filled with extravagant expectations: their best friends have been represented as traitors to the cause. The terms will be indefinite. Parents intending to place their daughters under its fostering care are referred for further information to the Bishop, or to the Rev. J. A. Vaughan, D.D., Rector of the Institute, Oak street, or to either of the following gentlemen, Trustees, viz: Jas. C. Booth, Joseph Cabot, Samuel V. Merrick, Caspar Morris, M. D., William Welsh.

It is important that, prior to Aug. 1, notice should be given to the Rector of those pupils who expect to enter at the opening of the Institute.

TERMS, (including French, Latin, Drawing, Stationery, &c.) viz: For pupils from 9 to 13 years of age, $25 per session. Over 13 years, $40. Primary Department, $12.

N. B. Payment to be made in advance.

day, a thin, muscular, intelligent-looking boy, dressed in habiliments of earlier years, which he had evidently outgrown, made his appearance, cap in hand, before Mr. Burton the senior clerk and inquired, "Sir, if you please, would I be old enough to carry the Marlborough bag? I'm only fourteen yet, but I'll always be growing older and wiser I hope."

"And may be worse!" muttered the clerk, who happened to be out of temper that morning. "But step in here," he contin-

* Perhaps no year in the reign of Bonaparte witnessed a more unmitigated despotism over opinion and over property than has existed in France for three months under the sway of the great Apostles of Liberty, Equality and Fraternity! The public Press seems to be completely overawed; all dissent is silenced, not by the people, but by the mob, while the banks, and railways, and men of property generally appear to submit to spoliation, (for the acts of the governments amount to nothing less,) without an audible murmur!

† It is estimated, that nearly 100,000 laborers in Paris alone, have been thrown out of employment, who, with their families, amounting in all to more than 200,000 persons, are dependent upon the government for support. These things would be less significant, (though deplorable enough,) were it not, that there is a direct tendency in the measures of the government to produce such results.

‡ The Edinburgh Review, (no great authority with the present writer on many subjects,) may be considered, he supposes, as not a very unfriendly observer of events on the continent. In the April Number, the following passage has been read since the Sermon was written: "The Republicans have decided, that every workman shall have constant employment, fair wages, and reasonable recreation; and we shall now see how far these conditions of labor are in the command of a government. The Republicans of an earlier day decreed that every citizen should be furnished with so much bread for so many sous; but the people were starved notwithstanding. The government have ordained that the master shall pay the workmen so much money for so much work, and the workmen have further ordained that no master shall reduce the number of his men. It only remains, and this seems obviously necessary, that the master shall also be secured in the ability to carry on the business. When the experiment shall be thus completed, we shall most gladly accept it as eminently worthy of imitation. But as yet the sole suggestion offered towards this end by the provisional minister of labor is, the 'substitution of the principle of association for that of competition,'—a suggestion on which we will say more when it has been more intelligibly expounded. Competition appeals to hope, and expectation; association, to indolence, improvidence, and suspicion."

§ The writer wishes he could say, that a perusal of M. Lamartine's History of the Girondists, had raised that brilliant genius in his estimation, as a man of judgment and principle.

ued, pointing to another room, "and Mr. Leatham will see what you're fit for."

Mr. Leatham was a quiet, elderly gentleman, who had kept the Post Office for several years in the rich and gay City of Bath, which was, at the period of our story, the resort of all the fashionables of Britain, especially in the Summer season, resembling, in that respect, what Brighton has since become. He spoke to the boy more civilly than his clerk had done; said he considered him tall enough for the business; and then he inquired what was his name, where his parents lived, and if he knew any respectable person who would give him a character for honesty and sobriety, as without such a certificate the Post Office could not employ him? The boy answered that his name was Ralph Allen; that his father had been a poor tradesman, but he was dead, and his mother supported herself by taking in washing; and "I was'n't brought up here, sir; but my mother came in hopes of getting fine work from the gentry; and here's a certificate from a kind gentleman, the vicar of our parish; I used to run errands for him, and he said it might be useful to me."

"This is to certify that Ralph Allen is a sensible, honest, industrious boy, and I hope will continue to be so. WM. WARBURTON," said the Postmaster, reading loud. "Well, that's a good certificate, though the writer is unknown to me; but we will let it pass for this time, and take you on trial."

After several exhortations to be careful of the mail, and walk fast, that he might arrive in time, Ralph Allen was duly equipped with a leathren bag, suspended by a strap over his shoulder, containing all the letters and newspapers in those days transmitted to Marlborough, and sent forth to earn the half-penny per mile.

Day after day he performed that appointed journey, through sun and shower, going and coming to the entire satisfaction of the Postmasters of Bath and Marlborough. Roads were not then so convenient for travellers, nor time so precious with the public, as at present; but Ralph was never known to loiter by the way, nor arrive an hour too late, which could seldom be said of other post boys. Travellers between the towns soon began to know him on the road, and remarked from stage-coach, wagon, or saddle—the only modes of conveyance in those days—that his conduct was always careful and steady; and people who did not travel trusted him with small messages in consequence of their reports. If a lady wanted a fashionable cap from Bath, or a notable housekeeper some trifle which could be bought cheaper in Marlborough, Ralph Allen was known to be a sober and less exorbitant carrier than either the coachman or wagoner, and he was preferred accordingly. This was a source of additional gain, which increased every day, till the boy generally reached his destination in either town laden with parcels of all sorts and sizes, for the carriage of which he received from two-pence to a farthing, as the case might be, or the liberality of his employers dictated. How the short time allowed between the close of his daily duty and his nightly rest was usually spent in his mother's poor, but clean garret, nobody could tell; till Mr. Leatham, who had by this time a very high opinion of his post boy for general good conduct and correctness in his station, inquired one morning, while Ralph was waiting for the mail, what book was that protruding from his pocket?

"It's the 'Universal Spelling Book,' sir," said Ralph, reddening as he pulled out the well-worn volume. "I try to learn at home in the little time I have, and can now nearly read."

"That's well my boy," said Mr. Leatham: "I wish the rest of our boys would spend their leisure time so."

"And sir," continued Ralph, now encouraged to speak out, "I'm trying to write, too, and have got the master of the Blue Coat School to give me a lesson sometimes for doing his messages, sir."

"You'll be a clerk yet, Ralph," said the Postmaster laughing. But it is a good endeavor, and I hope you'll succeed; but mind be careful of the mail."

His employer's words turned out true, though spoken half in jest. Ralph continued to earn, by every honest, though small way within his reach: his earnings were saved to purchase an old book when he could not borrow it, or supply himself pens, ink, and paper, by which he at once amused and improved his few leisure hours in reading, or even spelling, to his mother, when her day's toil was also done, and practicing the chance lessons he could obtain, from the school-master. Reading was at that period a rare thing in his class, and cheap books of instruction were equally so; but from the Spelling Book, Ralph Allen advanced to the Dictionary and Grammar; from 'strokes,' to writing a good hand. His savings also increased by slow degrees, for both he and his mother were prudent; and Ralph only wished for the time when he might aspire to some better situation, and be enabled to add to her rest and comfort. Five years had thus passed away; Ralph Allen had grown almost a man, when all the message-senders of Bath, among whom he was well-known, rejoiced even amid their regrets that they must look out for another carrier, to hear that Ralph Allen had been promoted, through the kindness of Mr. Leatham, to a clerkship in the Bath Post Office, and was actually seen in a new suit of clothes performing his new duties at the Post Office window. After this his mother washed nothing but lace and cambric, and Ralph was as steady and obliging in the Post Office as he had been with the mail on his back. His salary was comparatively small, but his prudence was great, and in another year or two, people discovered that Ralph had something in the bank. His habits of reading and thought also gave him an ability to invent needful improvements in the Post Office, which was then very imperfectly managed. These were modestly proposed; and as their necessity was seen, they obtained the sanction of the superior authorities, and raised the young clerk, not only in their estimation, but in office also, as in three years after his entrance he succeeded the senior clerk, Mr. Burton, by whom his application for the carriage of the Marlborough bag had been so ungraciously received, and who now retired to a small property he had purchased in the country. Two years more, and Ralph himself began to think of purchasing property also. There was a large sterile farm called Coome, down in the neighbourhood of the city, which the last three tenants had successively left in disgust and weariness, declaring that their labor and money were both lost on such an unprofitable spot, and the landlord offered it for sheep grazing on the very lowest terms. Great was the astonishment of all who knew him when Ralph Allen became the purchaser of these poor and barren acres. Some said the young man's brains were turned with the books he read, and even his mother shook her head, and hoped it would turn out for the best; but Ralph gave up his situation at the Post Office, collected round him workmen and tools, and commenced, not without creating much wonder and many surmises, to break up the ground in all directions, as in search of a mine.

"Neighbor, do you expect to find a pot of gold in that farm?" said an old farmer to him over the fence one morning, where he and his men were delving at a rocky spot that never could be cultivated.

"No," said Ralph, "but I expected, and, thank Providence, I have found; a good stone quarry, which will repay me, and be useful to yon good town," and he pointed to the spires of Bath.

"My stars!" cried the farmer, "he's not mad after all!" And so thought Ralph's neighbors, when buyers came and workmen thronged to the new quarry; and scarcely a gentleman's house or public building of any description could be commenced in Bath without a supply of stone from it. Mr. Allen, as the Bath postboy was now deservedly called.

Mrs. Allen had long given up washing, and gone to reside in a neat cottage which her son built out of the first produce of his quarry;—and many of her former employers saluted the good woman as she passed to St. Mary's church in her black sarsenet sack, high-heeled shoes, and velvet hood, like a respectable old lady of the period. About this time the works of the great Dr. Warburton were attracting public attention, and much talked of in the best society of Bath. Ralph Allen brought the latest published volume home one day, and found his mother seated in the small parlour with his old friend Mr. Leatham, who was about to retire from public business, and had called to see him. "What books you do buy, Ralph?" said the old woman, who had always a suspicion of her son's extravagance on this point; and she pointed to a large book case, where Dryden, Tillotson, and all the best authors of the preceding age might be seen in their works closely ranged together. "It was only last week," continued the good dame, "that you brought home that book about Fame, written by one Mr. Pope."

"And don't you know, mother, who is the writer of this volume?" said Ralph. "Don't you remember Mr. Warburton the parson of our own Greasley, in Nottinghamshire, who gave me the certificate which I presented to you, Mr. Leatham, ten years ago, when I wished to be postboy to Marlborough?"

This was true; the vicar of Greasley became the celebrated Dr. Warburton, afterward Bishop of Gloucester; and it was said Mr. Leatham's family kept that certificate like a sort of relic.

"Ralph Allen's making his fortune," was the usual remark of every body about Bath, when the quarry was mentioned; and it had now grown an important matter, as the whole property of Coome Down, which so many farmers had called a dead loss, was found to be one vast bed of the best building-stone.

Ralph was making money fast, and his deposits in the bank increased every year; but his aims did not end there—the experience of his former situation in the Post Office was at length employed to some purpose. Sundry useful arrangements and inventions had long ago made his name and abilities known to the authorities of that Department. At the period of our story, the Post Office in almost every county was farmed by some wealthy or enterprising person, who took its whole revenue and expenses in his own hands, paying to the Government a certain sum annually, according to his contract. Ralph, who had acquired a considerable acquaintance with all the details of the business, and had, beside, the good opinion of the most influential functionaries, proposed to vest the small fortune already gained by the Coome Down quarry in a Post Office contract for all England; and his proposal was accepted. From this period the career of Ralph Allen was one of uninterrupted prosperity. Under his administration, the Post Office revenue, even in that age of comparatively little letter-writing, was almost doubled in a few years, owing to the better arrangements introduced by him in the transmission of mails, and various postage regulations, which have made his name celebrated as one of the few who have conferred benefits of a lasting kind on their native country. But Ralph Allen was destined to become, if possible, still more honorably known to fame. From his earliest youth he had cultivated his mind, as well as improved his fortune; as without the former endeavor, the latter would have been but half success, though wealth had been gathered like the sand. His Post Office contract in a short time realized such an income as made the proprietor one of the richest men in the neighborhood of Bath.

Mrs. Allen had lived to see her son's prudent conduct and perseverance rewarded to an extent of which she had never dreamed; and the good dame closed her days in peace and comfort in the pleasant cottage at Coome Down, having nothing to regret, and no annoyance, but a shadowy fear, which at times slightly agitated the calm current of her latter-day thoughts, that Ralph was buying too many books. But having gained the summit of his early ambition—a well and honorably-won fortune—determined to enjoy it agreeably to his refined taste, in the munificent encouragement of Arts and Literature. He had acquired general respect as well as riches; and as his fortune raised him gradually in the scale of society, he had won the esteem, and formed the acquaintance of men celebrated for their talents, and still famous through their works. Pope, Fielding, Swift and Goldsmith, were among the number of his friends: and the titled and fashionable paid a natural tribute to merit and success, by including Mr. Allen in their most select society.

The country round Bath is one of the finest districts in England, being diversified with beautiful wood-crowned hills and broad green meadows. One property, in particular, popularly called Prior Park, had long attracted Ralph Allen's eye from the barren slopes of Coome Down, and there, he often said, he should wish, if fortune permitted him, to build a mansion worthy of the scene. This project was at last put in execution. The possessor of the estate ruined his affairs by carelessness and extravagance in London; it was in consequence, offered for sale, and Ralph Allen, Esq. became the purchaser of Prior Park. Here on the slope of one of those wood-covered hills which he had often admired, a splendid mansion was erected under his own superintendence, whose beautiful Corinthian portico and tasteful decorations were the theme of praise among all the lovers of art; the former especially being still regarded as unrivalled in English architecture. Here Ralph retired about middle life, leaving the field of active industry to younger and more needy aspirants; here also, he gathered round him the most polished society of that fashionable neighbourhood, and many of the authors, the purchase of whose works had once astonished his mother.* Mr. Allen is well known to all conversant with the literature of those times, as its judicious and munificent patron, and, in particular, as the attached friend of the somewhat irritable poet, Alexander Pope, and the philosophic Bishop Warburton.

The fact of this story, though not so generally known, belong to real life, and are verified by his contemporaries. Prior Park has now become a Catholic College; but its romantic situation and fine Corinthian columns are still reckoned among the attractions of the district: and they offer a lesson of how much may be achieved by well directed energy and persevering prudence.

Christians can Reject Christ.

We Christians cannot, indeed, be guilty of the very same offence in crucifying the Lord of Glory; but it behoves us to consider, whether we may not be guilty in the same kind, and, by our sins and iniquities, "Crucify the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame;" and therefore whether, being like the Jews in their crime, we may not also resemble them in their punishment. They rejected the Messiah, and we indeed have received Him; but have our lives been at all agreeable to our holy profession; or rather, as we have had opportunities of knowing Christ more, have we not obeyed Him less than other Christians, and "trodden under foot the Son of God, and counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith we are sanctified, an unholy thing, and done despite unto the spirit of grace?"—The flagrant crimes of the Jews, and the principal sources of their calamities, in the opinion of Josephus, were their trampling upon all human laws, deriding divine things, and making a jest of the oracles of the prophets as so many dreams and fables; and how hath the same spirit of licentiousness and infidelity prevailed likewise among us! How have the laws and lawful authority been insulted with equal insolence and impunity!—How have the Holy Scriptures, those treasures of Divine Wisdom, not only been neglected, but despised, denied, and abused to the worst purposes! How have the principal articles of our faith been denied, the prophecies and miracles of Moses and the prophets, of Christ and his Apostles been ridiculed, and impiety and blasphemy, not only been whispered in the ear, but proclaimed from the press! How hath all public worship and religion, and the administration of the sacraments, been slighted and condemned, and the Sabbath profaned by those chiefly who ought to set a better example, to whom much is given, and of whom therefore much will be required! And if for their sins and provocations "God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest He also spare not thee; because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not high-minded, but fear."—Bishop Newton.

The Fallen Brother.

A man possesses an extremely low and grovelling mind, who rejoices at the downfall of another. A noble heart, instead of denouncing as a consummate scoundrel, one who has erred, will throw around him the mantle of charity and the arms of love, and labor to bring him back to duty and to God. We are not our own keepers. Who knows when we shall so far forget ourselves as to put forth a right hand and sin? Heaven keeps in the narrow path. But if we should fall, where would be the end of our course, if in every face we saw a frown, and on every brow we read revenge? Deeper and deeper would we descend in the path of infamy; when if a different course were pursued, and a different spirit were manifested towards us, we might have stayed our career of sin, and died an upright and honest man.

Deal gently with those who stray. Draw them back by love and persuasion. A kiss is worth a thousand kicks. A kind word is more valuable to the lost than a mine of gold. Think of this and be on your guard, ye who would chase to the confines of the grave an erring brother.—Portland Tribune.

A WORD.—Say not a word you had better leave unsaid. A word is a little thing, we know, but it has stirred up a world of strife. Suppressing a word has saved many a character—many a life. A word unuttered, and Hamilton would long have lived, a pride of his country. Who can tell the good or bad effects of a single word? Be careful what you say. Think before you speak, and you will never be mortified with yourself, or cause a thrill of pain to flash through the heart of a friend.

* Prior Park looks down a beautiful valley with the City of Bath, reposing on the lower ground and rising slopes. On the right hand slope, (Bathwick, if we remember rightly,) stands a very handsome house of the style of the seventeenth century, with tall rails and gate enclosing the front garden, and looking toward the noble mansion of Prior Park. Enjoying the scenery there one day with a clerical friend, he informed us that in that house Fielding wrote his celebrated novel, "Tom Jones," and that the character of "Squire Allworthy" was no other than his friend Mr. Allen.—[Eds. Liverpool Mercury.]

[Prior Park was the residence thirty years ago, of John Thomas, a wealthy, public-spirited Quaker.—[Eds. N. Y. Tribune.]

DR. POTTER'S SERMON.—This admirable and well timed discourse having attracted much attention, and become the subject of various criticism, we have transferred it to our columns, and it will be found on our first page. We have done so not merely as an act of justice to its author, but in discharge of our duty to the readers of the Banner. We ask them to read it carefully, and to reflect calmly upon its faithful exhibition of the duty of Christian citizens, as revealed in the light of God's most Holy Truth.

The peculiar excellence of this Sermon is found in its fearless and faithful assertion of scriptural Truth. It rests nothing upon human reason; all its exhibitions of duty rest upon divine precepts. It is a strange inconsistency that many, who are most noisy in proclaiming their love of the pure Word of God, are the least ready to yield their unqualified submission to its dictates. Where God has seen fit to command, man must submit, not argue.

We consider this sermon important in another point of view. Christian ministers, because such themes are thought to be very delicate, are inclined to avoid the discussion of the duties which Christian citizens owe to the Government under which they live. Our Church has carefully provided that the will of God concerning us, in these respects, shall be heard. And it is her plain intention that these duties shall be enforced in the preaching of the Word. The pulpit is not indeed the place for partizan politics, but from its vantage ground should faithfully be sounded the voice of Eternal Truth as it bears upon all the relations of our present life. And surely our duty to our country is not the least important of these relations.

This sermon is also well timed, and a portion of it is almost prophetic concerning France. An awful warning comes to us from that unhappy country, to enforce the duty which this discourse exhibits. May every Christian nation profit by the lesson and learn, without fatal experience, the ruin and misery which result, in this world as well as in the world to come, from a forgetfulness of the Divine commands, and an attempt to establish a Government which is not overruled by the constraining influence of Divine Truth!

With these brief remarks, we refer our readers to the discourse to which is prefixed the following "Preface."

"The following Sermon is rather an appeal to unquestionable but slighted truths, than a formal argument in support of a debatable proposition. The considerations which prompted the writer to utter such words from the pulpit now induce him to send them to the press. It is easy to anticipate the objections which will be likely to be urged to the observations here presented; and, as the writer thinks, it is equally easy to answer them. But it seemed preferable, in a simple practical discourse of this kind, to put forth the truth in the way of direct statement, and then to leave the subject, without any consideration of difficulties or exceptions, precisely where the Holy Scriptures have left it. The child will do well to fill and occupy his mind with the thought that his duty is obedience, without raising curious questions beforehand, as to whether a case is likely to arise, which will necessitate or justify disobedience. And this, the writer ventures to think, is the only just and healthy state of mind, for the Christian citizen. No doubt those same views of Divine Truth, which lead to such an exposition of the duty of obedience as is here presented, require also, that Rulers, on their part, should look upon the Power with which they are entrusted, as something very awful; as something which must not be received or approached, but with humility and disinterestedness, nor exercised but in a spirit of earnest reverence and love. But these considerations belonged to another subject, and to another occasion."

RESIGNATION OF THE GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA.—The following Document, conveying the resignation of the Chief Magistrate of this Commonwealth, is written in a spirit worthy of such an occasion. Warned by the rapid progress of a mortal disease, the Governor lays aside the robes of office to prepare for that world wherein, we trust, brighter and less perishable glories await him. It is indeed, a solemn event, and we think, is announced in a manner becoming a Christian Ruler addressing a Christian people.

To the People of Pennsylvania.—It having pleased divine Providence to deprive me of the strength necessary to the further discharge of the duties of your Chief Magistrate, and to lay me on a bed of sickness from which I am admonished by my physicians and my own increasing debility, I may, in all human probability, never rise; I have resolved, upon mature reflection, under a conviction of duty, on this day, to restore to you the trust with which your suffrages have clothed me, in order that you may avail yourselves of the provisions of the constitution to choose a successor at the next general election.

I therefore hereby resign the office of Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and direct this my resignation, to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth.

In taking leave of you, under circumstances so solemn, accept my gratitude for the confidence you have reposed in me. My prayer is, that peace, virtue, intelligence and religion may pervade all your borders; that the free institutions you have inherited from your ancestors, may remain unimpaired till the latest posterity; that the same kind Providence which has already blessed you, may conduct you to a still higher state of individual and social happiness; and when the world shall close upon you as I feel it is soon about to close upon me, that you may enjoy the consolations of the Christian faith, and be gathered, without a wanderer lost, into the fold of the Great Shepherd above.

THE CHURCH INTELLIGENCER.—This is the title of a New Paper, just commenced in New Orleans. It is on a single sheet, and the annual subscription is one dollar. We doubt not such a paper may be of great use to the Church in that region, and we wish all success to our new cotemporary.

We copy the following in relation to Bishop Otey's farewell to the Diocese of Mississippi.

"When Bishop Otey, preached his farewell sermon to the Diocese, on Sunday afternoon, the congregation was deeply and powerfully affected. Tears flowed abundantly at the thought of parting with one whom they so much loved; and at the close, several, both men and women (as we are told,) came forward to the chancel and desired the Bishop then and there to confirm them. He stated to them that they were then under the influence of powerful excitement, and he preferred that they should reflect calmly on the act, as one of solemn and real consecration of themselves to the Lord's service. If, after such reflection, they saw fit to present themselves a week hence at the neighbouring parish of Natchez, where he would be holding a visitation, he would gladly confirm them.

We extract the following from an article in "the Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register," exhorting all good Catholics to employ none but "Catholic Physicians." Good rules should work both ways!

"The story about the 'Catholic Physician or no Baptism' lately recited in our columns, has turned out a Protestant fact, or as it used to be called in old times, a downright lie."

Seeing the present editor of that paper was himself "a Protestant fact" until a few months ago, (himself the strongest proof of his own definition) we much wonder that one brought up in such bad habits should be entrusted by "good Catholics" with the conduct of one of their most veracious Journals. We have great faith in the influence of early habit and education. And certainly we have no reason to doubt in the present case, the truth of the saying—"as the twig is bent the tree's inclined."

We have been requested to publish the following. It is stated on good authority, that this displaced clergyman has been officiating in the West as late as May last.

ILLINOIS.—Annual Convention.—The 12th Annual Convention of the Diocese of Illinois, was held on Monday, the 19th day of June, in Jacksonville. The preparatory exercises were conducted the day before, Sunday the 18th, the Rev. Samuel Chase, reading the Morning Prayer, and the Rev. S. Y. Mc Masters, delivering an excellent sermon, upon the doctrine of progressive development in religion. A confirmation followed, of 14 persons; after which, the Holy Eucharist was administered to quite a large number of persons, besides the clergy. On Monday morning, the Conventional exercises were opened, by the Rev. C. Dresser reading the Morning Service; after which, the Right Rev. the Bishop, proceeded to deliver the Annual Report and address; in which he gave a summary account of his labors and acts, during the past year. After so doing, he went on to state, that, without wishing them to transform the Convention into a judicial body—yet, it remained for them to declare, whether the election of an Assistant Bishop, that took place the year before at Alton, was Canonical, free, and in the fear of God—and so vindicate their integrity—and spread the fact upon their Journal for future reference. He further stated, that his conviction, of the necessity of an Assistant Bishop, remained the same, and professed himself ready at any time, when suitable arrangements were made by the Diocese for the support of one, to proceed to an election canonically. The usual course of business was gone through with, and at the afternoon session, a Committee was appointed, by ballot, of three laymen, and two clergymen, to take into consideration so much of the Bishop's Address as related to the election of an Assistant Bishop. During the morning session of Tuesday, the above Committee brought in the following preamble and resolutions, as their report, which was adopted by the Convention—the yeas and nays being called for—4 voting against the resolutions, and 2 declining to vote.

"The special Committee appointed by this Convention, to take into consideration so much of the Bishop's Address as refers to an election of an Assistant Bishop, beg leave to report the following resolutions, and ask the concurrence of this Convention, and the adoption of the same.

"That it is with profound regret, this Convention finds that the election of an Assistant Bishop, has not been approved by the last General Convention of the Church; but as Churchmen, we feel ourselves constrained to submit to the decision of that Convention, as the whole matter rested in their discretion, to sign, or withhold the testimonials requisite for the consecration of said Assistant Bishop.

"That in the opinion of this Convention, the necessity for an Assistant Bishop in this Diocese still exists; but that no encouraging prospect now presents itself, of providing adequately, for the support of an Assistant Bishop, to aid our venerable Diocesan, and that they are therefore reluctantly compelled to decline the further consideration of the subject at this time.

The principal business of the Convention that excited interest, was the appointment of the above Committee, and their report—as it was understood that their appointment had in view, (in keeping with the Bishop's intimation in his Address,) and would embrace in their report, both a retrospective and a prospective bearing. These statements are submitted without any comment, and are left to make their own impression. It may not be amiss to add however, that the adoption of the report of this Committee by the Convention, finally settles the vexed question of the Alton election.

Foreign Intelligence.

The following, relating to a point of general practical interest, we copy from the English Churchman:—

It is now, we believe, some two or three years since—during the "Anti-Rubrical agitation," as it was called—that the Bishop of Chichester appeared before the public as a firm supporter of those who were endeavouring to comply with the injunctions of the Church, with regard to the celebration of Divine service. This support was the more notable and valuable, inasmuch as it was unexpected, for it was tolerably well known that in some other important matters his Lordship differed from those whom he thus supported.

We are rejoiced to find that in these days, when many who had "put their hands to the plough" have from sheer weakness and faithlessness, both "looked" and turned back, the Bishop of Chichester has consistently kept his ground, as may be seen from his reply to certain parties at Hurstpierpoint, Sussex, who wish to coerce their clergyman into a violation of his conscience, by forcing him to break a distinct law of the Church. The following are the documents relating to this affair:—

TO THE RIGHT REV. THE LORD BISHOP OF CHICHESTER.
The memorial of the undersigned rate-payers and other inhabitants of the parish of Hurstpierpoint, in the Diocese of Chichester, Sheweth,—That the practice adopted in the parish Church, of reading the Offertory and collecting money from seat to seat on every Sunday throughout the year, is an innovation, and contrary to the feelings of three-fourths of the rated inhabitants.

That such plan, to our knowledge, is not observed in any other Church of the Diocese, and if uniformity is essential to the interest of our Established Church, the practice in question ought to be discontinued in this, or enforced in all other Churches throughout the Diocese.

That if the system stated is persisted in, contrary to this express desire, the only alternative open to your memorialists will be either to quit the Church immediately after the sermon, being the accustomed time in other Churches, or to abstain altogether from attendance at the parish Church.

For these and other reasons, your memorialists respectfully but urgently request your Lordship will be pleased to direct that the innovation complained of be discontinued forthwith.

(Signed by about fifty inhabitants, members of the Church.)

ANSWER OF THE BISHOP.

21, Upper Wimpole street, 2d June, 1848.

Sir,—Of course I have found it necessary to have some correspondence with Mr. Carey Borrer on the subject of the memorial transmitted to me from yourself and other inhabitants of Hurstpierpoint; other circumstances, too, have contributed to delay my answer. From Mr. Borrer I learn a fact, without the knowledge of which the language of the memorial would have been calculated to mislead me upon a very important point. I find your statement to be correct, that the Offertory is read and alms collected in your Church on every Sunday throughout the year; but the memorial does not state the fact that the Holy Communion is administered every Sunday. As the collection of alms is an essential ingredient in that celebration, it is clear that this fact has a very important bearing upon the complaint of the memorialists.

I cannot enjoin the discontinuance of that weekly celebration; on the contrary, I rejoice in it, and trust that those who constantly avail themselves of the opportunity thus presented to them do as constantly derive blessings therefrom; nay, who can doubt this, if only they approach, and partake in the frame of mind required of them. I can only pray, then, that their example may edify and stimulate others to the formation of a like beneficial habit. I find, too, that whatever may have been the case, the plate or basin is not now presented at every seat; those who collect the alms move slowly, and await a signal before they approach any one. I do not see that those who are not inclined to give have cause for complaint in this. The memorial does not profess to be aimed at the weekly celebration of the Lord's Supper; I should have been much grieved if any who decline on any occasion that blessing for themselves had sought to deprive their brethren of it.

The object, then, of the memorialists appears to be to effect the dismissal of the non-communicants immediately after the sermon, and before the collection of alms, and in order thereto to call for an opinion from me that that is the appointed time for their withdrawal. But I do not think it is. I am of opinion that the service is constructed with a view to their remaining in the Church and joining in the worship as long as possible, i. e., until the commencement of the actual celebration, by the exhortation to those "who mind to come to the Holy Communion of the Body and Blood of our Saviour Christ." Those deny themselves a high and glorious privilege who at any time abstain, having the opportunity, and they still further shorten and abridge their privileges who retire earlier than they need. I cannot render myself a party to such abridgment of the Christian privileges of any of the revelations of the spirit, and I must express the regret with which I learn that some of them have ventured to disquiet their brethren, by retiring earlier than they ought to do. The appeal to me bears indeed upon the face of it the expression of a determination to be influenced by my decision, only if it should accord with the views of the memorialists. I regret the existence of a spirit thus manifested—a spirit of disregard for unity and concord, and for guidance by rule—and a determination of substituting in their place our own judgment, or feelings, or will, in matters which cannot be stated to be sinful, and which are in truth good and edifying. I must not forbear expressing my deep sorrow at the existence of such a feeling, and could I hope for any good result therefrom, while the memorialists continue in such temper of mind, I should feel it my duty earnestly to exhort and in kindness to admonish them. As it is, I believe it better to limit myself to a prayer that God will be pleased to increase in all of us the spirit of meekness, gentleness, and lowliness.

I beg you will do me the favour of making this reply known to your co-memorialists. I remain, Sir,

Your faithful pastor and serv't,

To Lawrence Smith, Esq.

A. T. CICEST.

It affords us very great satisfaction to see his Lordship so distinctly and unhesitatingly deciding that, upon Communion days, those who do not intend to communicate should remain until the Offertory is finished; for we have long been convinced that that is the rule and intention of our Church, whatever may have been the practice of the Primitive Church. That those who may not wish to communicate on a certain day—although they may be constant and regular communicants—should be debarred from giving their alms, or from having them offered at God's altar for His blessing upon them, is, we consider, a palpable infringement of their rights and privileges. Nay, some of the Clergy carry this matter so far that even when there is a "general collection" from the whole congregation, they will adopt the unauthorized and un-Church-like practice of collecting the alms, at the Morning Service, at the Church doors, rather than allow the offerings of "non-Communicants" to be collected in the Church's way and placed upon the altar; at the same time, with painful inconsistency, they do not hesitate to receive and apply the alms of every one to the service of ALMIGHTY GOD!

We contend that when a Minister of the Church agrees to accept, on behalf of the Church, and in connection with her public Services, the alms of the whole congregation, he has no right whatever to deprive any alms-giver of the gratification of seeing those alms offered at God's Altar, or of joining in the Prayers which the Church has appointed to be said in connection with the alms of those who worship in her courts. He has no more right to do this than the opponents of the Offertory have to deprive their brother Churchmen of the weekly opportunity of almsgiving which the Church has provided for them all. Both parties are guilty of interfering with the rights and privileges of their brethren, and of depriving them of that liberty wherewith the Church hath made them free.

We have been induced to dwell especially on this point upon the present occasion, because we are daily more convinced than ever that the restoration of the weekly Offertory (whether there be weekly Communion or not) is imperatively called for by the circumstances of the times. The demand for "more Churches, more Clergymen, and more Schools," must be met, and that speedily, if we would save our country; but such is the state of matters, that the bulk of the people can give only a very trifling amount at any one time—so trifling that they are ashamed to offer it to man, although not to God. To lay by these trifles until they amount to a "respectable sum" is, in practice, found to be very difficult; and as the Church has in this, as in other matters, anticipated and provided for the difficulty, in the weekly Offertory, what true Christian—Priest or Layman—would deliberately step in and prevent his brother from availing himself of this gracious and considerate provision of His Holy Mother?

This book is one of great practical interest at the present time. It gives a graphic account of the regions through which the traveller passed in a long and weary journey.

It is written in a lively style, and seems to be entirely free from exaggeration. It is moreover a well-printed book, and altogether, from the information and entertainment we have derived from it, we commend it most warmly to those readers who desire to unite instruction with amusement in their reading.

AN ORATION before the Zelosophic Society of the University of Pennsylvania: May 18, 1848, (with a few notes, appended by a Henry Reed, Professor of English Literature in the University of Pennsylvania, and member of the American Philosophical Society.

We consider it no mean compliment to the learned author of this "Oration" that he was selected to discharge a duty, for which a stranger is usually chosen, by the students of his own University. This fact is happily alluded to, by the Professor, in the introduction in which he speaks highly, and we doubt not justly, of the character of the Students of the University of Pennsylvania.

The well-selected subject of his Oration is thus stated by the author. The prospects and responsibilities before his auditors, on entering into active life, and the kind of preparation needed for them. This important practical topic, we need not add, is discussed in an able and instructive manner. After speaking of the difficulties to be encountered by those before him, the speaker, as an encouragement, shows them how these difficulties had been overcome, by the graduates of the University and what distinctions had been won by many of them. The account is closed with the following affecting tribute to one whose early death was generally lamented in our city:

I have lately seen the career of one brought to its completion, one whose character I could not do justice to, without going into a deeper vein of thought and feeling than I can venture on in a brief allusion to him. I speak of the career of the late Charles

Kirkham, as completed, for though I saw the grave close early over him, he had lived long "enough to teach Love, duty, generous feelings, high desires, Faith, hope, devotion: and what more could length of days have brought him?" It is right to remember him on this occasion, for he was a member of your Society, and, as both a student and a graduate, he took an active and intelligent interest in its business. It is a just tribute which I understand the Society has paid by requesting one of its members, who knew him well, to prepare some appropriate record of his character. My own acquaintance with him began with my official life here, for he was a member of the first Freshman Class I was associated with; and from that time until his mortal illness, it was my privilege to know him intimately. He died too soon to be widely known, and in truth, any thing like notoriety was not possible for virtues which shone with so pure and placid a light, veiled by a modesty and humility which were among the finest graces of his nature. I might otherwise have presented his character to you as a model of that culture which I have this evening sought to urge upon you. To the special business of his life, the profession of the law, he gave his fine intellect with true professional feeling, expressed as I find it in his own simple and manly language, when he said, "It is not honest to hold myself out as a guide and counsellor of other people, who may come to me with their troubles, unless I have done my best to attain that knowledge which shall effectually serve them." With exact habits of professional application, he combined in just proportions, that liberal culture which gave completeness and elevation to his character as a man. As a citizen, he sought out duties for himself in some of our popular institutions, and he will be remembered as one, who laboured with no ulterior selfish view, but with the single-hearted hope of usefulness. He was a man of the people, in the best and highest sense of such a phrase; he would have died rather than flatter them; he would have died rather than neglect his duties to them. The character of Charles Kirkham was built upon a deep and ever-deepening foundation, a profound devotional spirit, that was the guidance of his daily life. It was the invisible strength of one, who in the business of the world was seen an even-tempered, cheerful, active man, fulfilling his duties noiselessly. As I think of him, I feel the truth of a passage in one of his favorite authors, the Poet of "The Christian Year."

"There is in this loud stunning tide,
Of human care and crime,
With whom the melodies abide,
Of th' everlasting chime;
Who carry music in their heart,
Through dusky lane and wrangling mart,
Plying their daily task with busier feet,
Because their secret souls a holy strain repeat."

My young friends, I cannot better part with you now, than by leaving in your minds, the mention and the memory of such an example, showing, as it does, that a man's education is to prove not only what he has learnt, but what he is, what he can do, and how it will fare with him, when this world's doings are at an end.

A Card.

To the Parishioners of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia.

A number of members of the Congregation, desirous of the re-construction of the Church, upon a better plan than its present, have lately met to consult upon the best mode of commending the object to the congregation at large, and promoting its accomplishment.

They have appointed a Committee to procure information of various kinds, and to devise a course of action upon the subject, with a view to submit the same to a general meeting of the congregation, to be invited for this purpose.

The Committee is engaged in the duties referred to it, and they now desire to make it known to all the friends of the proposed measure, that as soon as circumstances admit, probably soon after the re-assembling of the congregation in the ensuing autumn, a general meeting of their fellow parishioners friendly to the measure, will be invited, with a view to the furnishing of information, and to the adoption of the most efficient concert of action upon the subject.

A general meeting at this time being deemed inexpedient by the Committee, this notice is given, more especially for the benefit of those friends of the proposed object who have not attended the preliminary meetings, and who perhaps may have not yet received notice of them, but whose co-operation is earnestly desired, and will be particularly invited at the time specified.

For the Banner of the Cross.

WISCONSIN, June 26, 1848.

MY DEAR FRIEND:—

I hasten to acquaint you with some very interesting circumstances which have recently taken place in this Diocese, and which, I know, will please you much.

The Second Annual Convention of the Diocese of Wisconsin was held at Jonesville on the 14th inst., and was full of interest in all its proceedings. Among other business, a Chief of the Oneida tribe of Indians, a man of considerable intelligence, was elected a Lay Delegate to the next General Convention. The tribe was represented by four of our Red Brethren at this Convention.

Before the meeting of Convention, Trinity Church, a commodious edifice recently erected at Jonesville, was consecrated to the service of ALMIGHTY GOD, by Bishop Kemper, who, in the course of the session, admitted the Rev. W. C. Armstrong, Minister of St. Alban's Church, Lisbon, and Rev. L. W. Davis, Minister of Grace Church, Sheboygan, to the Holy Order of the Priesthood.

The former is a graduate of Nashotah, at which place Bishop Kemper, on the first Sunday after Trinity, in the chapel of the Institution, admitted Messrs. Wm. A. Leach and Martin F. Gorenson to the Sacred Order of Deacons. Morning prayer was said by Rev. J. Johnstone, M. D.; the lessons read by Rev. W. Adams, who, with Rev. J. Lloyd Breck, presented the candidates. The sermon, a full and clear exposition of Heb. v. 4, on "The Origin and purposes of, and the Qualifications necessary for the Ministry of the Church," was delivered by the Rev. E. G. Gear, Chaplain at Fort Snelling, St. Peter's, Iowa Territory. The Doctrine of the Apostolic Succession was treated of in all its fulness. The address to the candidates was a most impressive one, and, I trust, had its proper effect upon the crowded assemblage present on the occasion. Among the congregation were many Swedes and Norwegians, who had come from some distance to witness the Ordination of their future minister, Rev. M. F. Gorenson, who takes charge of the Parish of St. Olofs', Ashippun, and the Scandinavians at Pine Lake, formerly under the care of Rev. G. Unonius, who has removed to Manitowoc, where a number of Swedes and Norwegians are settled.

Rev. W. A. Leach has been appointed by the Bishop to the charge of a Parish at Keokuk, in the South-eastern portion of Iowa, having a population of about 2000 persons.

On the 7th, 8th and 9th of June, the Ember examinations for candidatuship were held at the Nashotah Mission, when seven young men were examined, and on the 15th inst. admitted as candidates for Holy Orders. The examinations were most strict, and thorough in every respect, and were satisfactorily sustained by this new body of candidates.

At the same time the Junior Academical Classes were examined, and fully proved, along with the examinations for candidatuship, the excellent training which is exercised at the Nashotah Mission.

Having thus stated some brief particulars, let me further state the establishment of the Parochial School under the care of this mission.

This school now numbers about fifty pupils, where are taught, besides the ordinary branches of an English education, the Latin language and Vocal Music. The children are to be instructed in chanting, and will in time form an excellent choir; their sweet voices assisting in the services of the sanctuary. Many of the pupils are from a distance; the most however live in the vicinity of the school. The school-house is of brick, with a peaked roof, surrounded by battlements, in the early English style of architecture, and over the entrance surmounted by a cupola, in which is fixed a steel bell, the clear tones of which can be heard for some miles.

There are quarterly examinations held at the school, when the parents are present. Two such have been held, the results of which were to strengthen the confidence of parents and others in the system pursued at the school.

Nashotah then does not neglect the lambs of CHRIST's flock, but by this her Parochial School trains them up in the love and service of their gracious MASTER. Her system throughout is one which is calculated to promote vast influence for the Church in this growing land. The missionaries which she sends forth are trained to the work before them in the full sense of the word, and, had she the means (which may God dispose the hearts of the faithful to supply her with) many might be received by her who fail of means for themselves. Seven years has she been established, and what are the fruits?

Ask southern and middle Wisconsin how her parishes were formed,—how the large body of Scandinavians brought into the Church,—by whom the Gospel preached and the Sacraments administered,—their little ones cared for, and all the offices of religious exercise, and they will with one accord point to Nashotah as the source, from whence, by the assistance of the HOLY SPIRIT, they were encouraged in their endeavours to walk in "the old path." She has within three years furnished nine clergy to this Diocese, and has now nine candidates for Holy Orders, besides fifteen young men preparing for candidatuship.

In connection with the facts which I have related to you respecting the Nashotah Mission, I would only add, that at this time I understand funds are much needed for the erection of a building for a Professor, and as a very interesting feature, the building is to be of brick from the brick yard of the Institution, and the carpenter work to be furnished by its Carpentering Committee, having at its head an excellent master mechanic.

The Church's Schools.

The importance of Christian Schools to the perpetuity and well being of the Christian Church, is now universally conceded, at least, by the members of our own communion. It is as generally admitted that the power which knowledge confers, is intrusted to unsafe hands, where the salutary restraining influence of Christian morality is wanting. Hence the increasing demand for Christian education. To meet this demand, we may safely say, that no body of professing Christians in our land, has any thing like the appliances and facilities for a liberal and comprehensive course of education on Christian principles, as those possessed by our own communion. Our Book of Prayer, comprising the offices and formulas of Faith, presents a full and perfect outline of the religious course based upon the sure warrant of Holy Scripture; and in the various departments of Literature and Science, we are certainly not behind our neighbours. Of this we need no better evidence than that afforded by the numerous schools, conducted on the principles of the Church, which are now in successful operation in various parts of our country. The value of these institutions, both to the Church and to the State, can hardly be overestimated.

A few months since, it was my privilege to pay a passing visit to three of these schools. The College of St. James, near Hagerstown; St. Timothy's Hall, near Baltimore; and St. Paul's College, near Flushing, Long Island.

The College of St. James, under the direction of its worthy Rector, the Rev. J. B. Kerfoot, assisted by a large and efficient body of professors and instructors, has fully realized the highest anticipations of its projectors. Being no stranger to the peculiar qualifications of the Rector for the responsible position he occupies, I was prepared to find both in the order and arrangement of the school, the practical manifestations of Christian benevolence in the application of the principles of our Holy religion, to the education of Christian youth. But I am free to confess that the salutary moral and social influence, pervading the whole institution, seemed to me during a three days visit, to be a much nearer approach to the theory of Christian education than is often realized in practice. The peaceful, fraternal, and gentlemanly deportment of the students towards each other; and their frank, open, unrestrained, and yet respectful bearing towards their instructors; were sure indications that one great desideratum in Christian education was here attained; the exercise of a salutary, moral and religious influence over the heart and conscience, which manifested itself in the timidity of Christian kindness towards all around them. St. Timothy's Hall, at Catonsville, under the Rectorship of the Rev. L. Van Bokelin, is another Diocesan school, of which the Church in Maryland has reason to be proud. The buildings erected expressly for the accommodations of the school under the experienced eye of the Rector, are admirably adapted to the use intended. It is no ordinary advantage in the arrangements of a building for a Christian family school, to dispose the various halls for study, conversation, dining, the reception of visitors; and the necessary rooms for recitations, for professors, the Dormitories, and the several domestic departments, so that all are easily accessible without interfering with each other. This end has been most happily attained at St. Timothy's.

Occupying a lofty position, the Hall commands a beautiful view of the surrounding country, extending on one side to the distant City and Harbour. A three years experience has verified what its general appearance sufficiently indicates, that the locality is sufficiently salubrious. The energy and untiring industry of the Rector, his more than ordinary qualifications in executive matters, combined with sound scholarship and long experience in the great works of Christian education, are the best security that all the reasonable expectations of parents and guardians, will be fully realized in this institution.

After visiting St. Timothy's, and the College of St. James, my attention would naturally be directed to St. Paul's College, the parent institution of the Church's schools, and the Alma Mater of the respective Rectors of St. James and St. Timothy's, and, indeed, of its own Rector also. St. Paul's College, at College Point, for salubrity of climate, and the accessibility and natural beauty of its location; as well as for the improvement of the adjacent country, stands unrivaled. And when we add to these the clear blue briny wave of Long Island Sound, which laves the shores of the Point; affording the luxury of sea bathing, and opportunity for the various aquatic sports; we are constrained to confess that all is here attained that nature can bestow to render the place a happy and attractive home to the youthful students. Here are ample accommodations for eighty, or even one hundred students. The Rector, Mr. Barton, an accomplished scholar, and an alumnus of the Institution, is aided in the administration of the school, by a numerous and experienced faculty, most of whom were long associated with Dr. Muhlenberg, the former Rector. For efficiency, sound scholarship; a thorough and careful supervision on the part of the Faculty, and diligence and order on the part of the students, this school now, will not suffer by comparison with any other, nor with itself in its most prosperous days, when no rival institution of similar character had as yet appeared in our land! It well deserves, and we trust will ever receive, the patronage of Christian parents who wish for an asylum for their sons, where they may be trained in Christian principles, whilst they are treasuring up the most valuable stores of literature and science.

I have called this the Parent Institution of the Church's Schools. It is even more than this. It is the pattern from which the multitude of professedly Christian schools, in all the Protestant sects around us have copied. Twenty years ago, our land was filled with military schools. Every student aspired to be a Cadet: even little boys ten and twelve years of age were trigged out in gaudy uniforms, and subjected to the discipline of the guard-house, and the camp. That the tendency of such a system was to engender a martial and worldly spirit, at variance with the principles of the Gospel, was soon apparent to the considerate observer. Christian men began to direct their attention to the subject, and to seek a remedy. The most effective note of warning and alarm to the Church on account of her gross neglect, in consigning her baptized children to the cold embraces of the world, instead of nursing them in her own bosom, was sounded by the Rev. founder of St. Paul's College. His appeals to the Church were not the mere outpourings of a morbid sentimentalism, which expended itself in dolorous complaints, and then relapsed into inglorious ease, and that too common self-excusing spirit which says, "I have faithfully warned, and therefore have freed my soul from the Church's sin of omission." He not only wrote and preached, but he labored heart and hand in behalf of the neglected lambs of Christ's fold. With the most self-sacrificing spirit, he devoted his time, his property, and the energies of his mind, to the work of reform in the department of early education. Well do we remember when his personal friends endeavored to dissuade him from undertaking the drudgery of conducting and directing in all its details, an institution embodying his views of Christian duty to the young. Satisfied that no one could so well reduce his own conceptions to practice as himself, he commenced in the Flushing Institute the experiment of uniting moral and religious, with literary and scientific instruction, under the salutary influence of a well ordered Christian family. And what has been the result? In less than a quarter of a century; the principle for which he contended, "that the Church and not the world, should educate the children of the Church," has been so generally adopted, and is so manifestly right in itself, that Christian parents can no longer with a clear conscience entrust their tender offspring to the guardianship of any institution which does not professedly incorporate religious culture in its educational system. Hence the constantly increasing demands for schools that may prove the nurseries of the Church. Having lived to see the fruits of his labours in the wide dissemination of his views and principles; and having been instrumental in training up many others for the work of Christian instruction, he has intrusted his own institution to the hands of a gentleman who was educated in it, and who was for many years its chief professor of languages. His well known qualifications as an instructor; his long experience in the management of youth, are the best assurances that the interests of parents and pupils will be safely intrusted to his care. Dr. M. has only retired from one field of Christian duty to enter upon another, not less important to the welfare of the Church. Should he prove as successful in his present enterprise, as in his former one, he will have the singular privilege of knowing, that under the guidance of a kind Providence, he has been instrumental in effecting two most important objects: arousing the Church to a right appreciation of Christian education; and to the just claims of the poor to seats in the sanctuary. The influence of a life thus spent must be felt by many succeeding generations.

The venerable Dr. Boyd of your City, so far as my knowledge goes, is entitled to the credit of opening the first Free Church within our borders, to be supported by the weekly offerings of the congregation. With the spirit of a martyr, he has struggled with opposing prejudices and difficulties, until at length he is permitted to see new advocates of the system springing up in every quarter of our wide spreading land. May the day soon come when "Free Churches," supported by the free will offerings of the people, shall be deemed as essential to the interests of the Church at large, as her Schools now are.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—

Will you be so kind as to give the following acknowledgment a place in your Journal.

Respectfully,

JNO. A. WILSON.

The Rector and Wardens of St. Luke's Parish, Ypsilanti, gratefully acknowledge a donation of thirty-five volumes, from the Bishop White Parish Library Association.

From the Female Prayer Book Society, twenty-eight copies of the Prayer Book; and also a large supply of Tracts from the Female Tract Society.

Sentences from Bishop Taylor.

"If the people die for want of knowledge, they who are set over them shall also die for want of charity."

"Time is checkered with black and white: stay but till tomorrow, and your present sorrow will be weary and lie down to rest."

"It were well if men would not inquire after the learning of the sermon, or its deliciousness to the ear or fancy, but observe its usefulness; not what concerns the preacher, but what concerns themselves."

DIED,—On the 11th day of June, at Elizabeth City, N. C. ANN D., consort of the Hon. WM. B. SHEPARD.

How often are we called upon to lament the early and unexpected death of those whose life to human wisdom seemed so necessary to the furtherance of the interests of religion,—whose character and activity gave hope and promise of long and wide extended usefulness, and cheered the humble pastor in the arduous duties of his calling. Such a bereavement we have to lament in the death of the good, the excellent, the highly accomplished lady to whose memory this notice is written. She was the daughter of the late Josiah Collins, Esq., of Edenton, N. C., whose noble charities and devotions are still fresh in the memory of the community in which he lived. Mrs. Shepard had all the advantages of education that an ample fortune, and an intelligent and kind father could bestow; and his pains were admirably repaid in the great mental cultivation, and the high accomplishments of his daughter; for there was no circle, however distinguished, to which she was not fitted to be an ornament,—none however bright that could obscure the lustre of her graces. All that knew must remember her as the excellent, the attractive of all assemblies. And above all her accomplishments shone that noble faith which gave them character, and made them amiable and lovely. Mrs. Shepard was an humble, devout Christian. The acts of her sincere faith, though simple, were in character, sublime, and showed that that faith was not far removed from actual knowledge. Her charity prompted her to be kind and considerate to all. Her humility caused her to condescend to men of low estate: and how often has her smile and her kind inquiry after their welfare dissipated their sorrow; and the attention and sympathy of one so noble, made them forget the disparity of their several conditions, and lighted up in their present misery the hope of better things to come. Mrs. Shephard had brought all her powers and faculties under the guidance of, and in subjection to the holy faith which she professed;—at least, I never knew any one that had more entirely done so; and according to her ability was she forward in doing for the Church. And noble and acceptable were the personal sacrifices which she often made to give the countenance of her example to the revival of true catholic practice in the Church, in her constant attendance upon daily services and frequent communions, and in the observance of the Church's festivals and fasts. And it affords us confidence as well as pleasure to know that her religious action was the result of the devotion of a well regulated mind whose piety was formed after the model of that quiet, meek, unobtrusive spirit which characterizes the most excellent formularies of our Holy Church, in whose communion she died, and of whose blessed resurrection we trust she will be made a partaker in the glorious and eternal kingdom of God.

Edenton, June, 1848.

DIED.—At Water Street, Huntingdon County, May 1st. CHARLES HALE, son of Dr. JACOB FORNEY, aged 3 years and 6 months.

It is often urged as a topic of consolation, upon parents who have been bereaved of children, like the subject of the above notice, of tender years and much promise; that God has in mercy taken them away in early youth, whilst gentle and innocent, transplanted them in the dewy freshness of life's morning from the unkindly soil of this world, to bloom in His garden in Paradise;—in order to save them from the withering influence of sin, from being soiled and marred by contact with a wicked world, to which maturer years would have exposed them.

This thought is happily illustrated by the following taken from a new work on Parables.

"A king walking in his garden, saw some roses which were yet buds, breathing an ineffable sweetness. He thought, if these shed such sweetness while yet they are buds, what will they do when they are fully blown? After a while the king entered the garden anew, thinking to find the roses now blown, and to delight himself with their fragrance; but, arriving at the place, he found them pale and withered, and yielding no smell. He exclaimed with regret, 'Had I gathered them while yet tender and young, and while they gave forth their sweetness, I might have delighted myself with them, but now I have no pleasure in them.' The next year the king walked in his garden, and finding rosebuds scattering fragrance, he commanded his servants, 'Gather them, that I may enjoy them, before they wither, as last year they did.'"

Diocesan Intelligence.

Texas.—On Easter day, in Christ Church, Matagorda, the Rt. Rev. the Missionary Bishop in the South West admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons Henry N. Pierce, a candidate from the Diocese of Florida, recommended for orders by the Standing Committee of that Diocese. Morning prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Ives, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Gillett. Sermon by the Bishop. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Mr. Young. The Communion was administered by the Bishop to the Clergy present and to 35 other persons.

On Monday morning, (Easter week,) in Christ Church, Matagorda, the Bishop joined together in the holy estate of matrimony the Rev. Charles Gillett, Rector of Christ Church, Houston, and Miss Marianne Wharton, formerly of Brooklyn, New York.

The following confirmations have been held by the Bishop:

Tuesday, April 18, at Gulf Prairie,	2 persons.
Easter day, " 23, at Matagorda,	9 "
Sunday, " 30, at Houston,	16 "
" May 7, at Independence	1 "
Monday, 15, at Houston,	4 "

And on Sunday, 21st May, he expected to hold confirmation at Galveston, where, it was understood, there were about 15 candidates.

New Jersey.—The Bishop of New Jersey laid the corner stone of St. John's Church, at West Hoboken, on the afternoon of Thursday, the 29th of June. The procession formed at the house of Mr. Sinclair, (the liberal gentleman by whom the site is given.) It consisted of the lay members of the parish, and representatives of the several other parishes in the vicinity, and, besides the Bishop, of the following clergymen—the Rev. Dr. Barry, A. C. Patterson, A. M. Loutrel, R. F. Burnham, and E. F. Edwards, (the Rector of the parish,) of the Diocese of New Jersey; the Rev. Dr. Boyd of the Diocese of Pennsylvania; the Rev. Dr. Wainwright, J. Pound, R. Cox, William Walton, S. M. Haskins, and C. Clapp, of the Diocese of New York; and the Rev. Mr. Hudson of the Province of New Brunswick. On reaching the spot chosen for the purpose, the Bishop used the printed form common on such occasions, and delivered an admirable address, in which he directed the attention of his hearers to the fact that the act in which they were participating must remind them of Jesus Christ as the Great Corner-stone of the Church Universal. He dwelt beautifully upon this relation of the Saviour to the Gospel and His people, and enforced the necessity of looking alone to Him in every such enterprise as that which was then and there so auspiciously commenced. The Bishop concluded his eloquent address by comparing the laying of the first stone of the intended edifice in faith, with the planting of seed in the soil, and held up reliance upon Divine protection and aid as necessary to bring about the happy consummation when the last little particle shall have been added to the edifice, and it shall be fit to be consecrated for the worship of Almighty God. The address was admirably filled with poetic thoughts and the sentiments of Scripture, and was encouraging as it was appropriate.

The position to be occupied by the intended building, is perhaps as beautiful as any afforded by the world. It is on an elevated site, commanding a view of the majestic bay of New York, the city, and all the immediately surrounding places; and is at the same time in itself entirely secluded and rural.

We congratulate the excellent and laborious Rector of the parish, and his self-denying co-workers of the laity, on the success which, under the smiles of Providence, has thus far attended their efforts. They have done much, and have already reaped a good reward for their exertions.

The edifice is to be constructed in the Gothic style of architecture, under the direction of Mr. Upjohn.

Connecticut.—TRINITY COLLEGE.—It will be seen by a notice in another column that the Oration before the House of Convocation will be delivered by the Hon. D. D. Barnard, of Albany. The Poem will be by the Rev. W. Crosswell, D.D., of Boston. Calendar.

COMMENCEMENT.—The Annual Commencement of Trinity College will take place on the 3d day of August.—Ibid.

A parish has been formed at Tariffville, (Simsbury,) by the name of Trinity Church; and they are going to build upon the old lot of ground which was the homestead of the Griswold family, and the birth-place of Bishop Griswold. It is believed that some of the old friends of Bishop G. will be glad to assist in this good work. A Church at Tariffville has been greatly needed, and we wish the new parish "good luck in the name of the Lord."—Ibid.

New York.—NEW YORK ECCLESIOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—The Stated Meeting of the New York Ecclesiological Society was held on Monday, the 3d inst., in the Sunday School room of St. Paul's Chapel, at 8 o'clock, P. M. The Rev. Dr. Forbes, President, took the Chair.

The Report of the Committee was read by the Rev. T. S. Preston, one of the Secretaries.

From this Report it appeared that several very valuable works had been added to the library since the meeting in April. The Committee had, in a number of instances, given advice respecting the erection or alteration of Churches, in New York, Maryland, North Carolina, and Missouri.

The following new members have been elected, in the recess of the Society:—

The Rev. Charles Burroughs, D.D., of Portsmouth, N. H.
George C. Shattuck, M.D., of Boston.
William Edward Coale, M.D., of Boston.
Plowden C. J. Weston, of Hagley House, near Georgetown, S. C.

The Rev. Walter Ayrault, of Auburn, N. Y.

Frank W. Anthony, of the General Theological Seminary. After the reading and adoption of the Report, Mr. W. A. McVickar read the regular paper, upon the style of Architecture to be recommended for Ecclesiastical Buildings in this country. Mr. McVickar divided his subject, and confined himself, upon this occasion, to a well condensed history of the rise, the ancient excellence, and the decline, of Christian Architecture in general, and in each of its particular periods and styles; leaving for another time the discussion of the main point to be considered—the style to be recommended by the Society. His paper was listened to with very great interest and attention by all present.

On motion of Mr. R. Ralston Cox, the Rev. Mr. Muhlenberg was appointed to read the paper before the next stated meeting, upon "The style of Music proper for use in congregations, and its due performance."

The Society elected John Henry Hopkins, Jr., of the General Theological Seminary, a member; and confirmed all the elections made, in the recess, by the Committee.

On motion of Mr. J. P. Pirsson, the Committee were authorised to issue, when they deem it convenient, a large edition of the first number of the Ecclesiologist, for general and gratuitous distribution. This issue is to be made without reference to the number of subscribers obtained, and the expense is to be defrayed out of the treasury of the Society.

On motion of the Rev. Dr. Haight, Vice President, Mr. W. A. McVickar was requested to continue, upon some future occasion, at his own convenience, the paper which the Society had heard with so much interest this evening.

The letters received, since the last meeting of the Society, from the Rev. B. Webb, Secretary, and from A. J. B. Hope, Esq., M.P., Chairman of the Committee of the Ecclesiological (late Cambridge Camden) Society, were read by the Corresponding Secretary. On motion of the Rev. William Walton, it was ordered that these letters be entered, at large, upon the Records of the Society; and that the Corresponding Secretary inform their authors of this order, and express to the Rev. Mr. Webb, and to Mr. Hope, the very grateful feelings with which their letters had been received by the Society. In connection with this matter, the Rev. Dr. Forbes, President, spoke with much pleasure of a private letter received from the Rev. Mr. Forbes, one of the Committee of the Ecclesiological (late Cambridge Camden) Society, very heartily congratulating Dr. Forbes upon the establishment of the Society of which he is President.

On motion of the Rev. Henry McVickar, the Committee were requested to prepare a "Church Scheme," for distribution throughout the country, to be filled up with information from all quarters, and returned to the Society.

* Afterwards (1851-2) a Roman C. Priest

The Society, after much interesting conversation upon the subject of the last motion, adjourned. The day for the next stated meeting will be Monday, October 2d.—Churchman.

South Carolina.—ASCENSION DAY.—As has been the case for several years past in St. Philip's and St. Michael's Churches, "the Holy Communion was administered—the Church, by setting forth a proper preface" for this as for four other festivals, having suggested such an observance of it. Indeed the day of our Lord's nativity, and that of His return to where He was before, what days more solemn and affecting!

MONTHLY MISSIONARY LECTURE IN CHARLESTON.—That for June was at St. Philip's Church, by the Rev. P. Trapiet, who enforced the obligation in particular, of the Mission in our City, having special reference to the spiritual benefit of the colored.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.—The annual festival of our Sunday Schools was held at St. Philip's Church on the afternoon of Monday in Whitsun-week; when divine service was performed by Rev. Mr. Philips, and an excellent Address, adapted to the capacities of children, was delivered by the Rev. J. W. Miles.

P. E. FEMALE, BIBLE, PRAYER BOOK AND TRACT SOCIETY.—This Society celebrated their twenty-first Anniversary, on Tuesday in Whitsun-week, at St. Paul's Church, Radcliffeboro'. The Bishop being absent from the City, the Rev. Dr. Hanckel presided, and read the Annual Report of the Board of Managers. From this report we learn that the Managers distributed, during the past year, fourteen Bibles, fourteen Testaments, 333 Prayer Books, sixteen Sailor's Manuals, and two thousand seven hundred and forty-two Tracts.

CONSECRATION.—On Whit-Sunday, being also "the feast of St. Barnabas, the Apostle," Ascension Church, at Gillisonville, was consecrated by the Bishop, four Presbyters being present, who took part in the services. The Church presents to the eye a remarkably agreeable object, being well proportioned with gothic-resembling doors, with sashes and blinds, a modest steeple, with its fine toned bell, and an open-fenced enclosure. The pews are sufficiently wide for kneeling: the chancel separation is neatly carved work; the desk and pulpit of uniform height, and quite suitable for the speaker and hearer.

ORDINATIONS.—On "Trinity Sunday," one of the stated days for admitting to Holy Orders, Rev. W. H. Hanckel, Rector of "Church on Edisto Island," was admitted to the Priesthood, and Mr. James Ward Simmons to the Order of Deacons. The sermon was by Rev. Mr. Hyatt, who presented the candidates, and with Rev. J. B. Campbell, concurred in the laying on of hands on the Rev. W. Hanckel. On Wednesday, June 21, at Trinity Church, Columbia, Mr. John DeWitt, McCullough was admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons. He was presented by the Rev. P. J. Shand. "Morning Prayer" by the Rev. Mr. Swart; the sermon by Rev. Mr. Curtis. The Holy Communion, as prescribed, by the Bishop.—Charleston Gospel Messenger.

Indiana.—Rev. Francis Vinton, who was elected Bishop of Indiana, has declined the election.

Wisconsin.—CONSECRATION OF A CHURCH.—On Wednesday, June 14, the Rt. Rev. Dr. Kemper consecrated a Church at Jonesville.

"The people at Jonesville," says Bishop Kemper in a letter to the Agent of the New York Bible and Common Prayer Book Society, "have acted nobly; for without soliciting aid from abroad, they have erected a very commodious edifice, which I had the pleasure of consecrating last Wednesday. They are in want of Prayer Books and Tracts, and as their means are somewhat exhausted, they solicit a donation of 50 copies of the Book of Common Prayer, and 75 of the Tract concerning proper behaviour in the public worship of Almighty God."

This request of the Bishop has been complied with, and the Prayer Books and Tracts sent. But this constant giving by our Societies, renders it necessary that Churchmen should give them the means wherewith to manufacture these desirable volumes. The Agent, Mr. T. C. Butler, 20 John street, assures us that there is great need of liberal contributions at the present time. He sends no applicant empty away: but if he is to continue this course—so necessary to the growth of the Church—the Treasury must be replenished.—Churchman.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Francis Peck has been transferred to the Diocese of Rhode Island, by letters dimissory to the Rt. Rev. the Bishop.

The Rev. Richard P. Killin has been received into the Diocese of Maryland, by letters dimissory from the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Ohio. Mr. Killin will take charge of the Church of the Ascension, Baltimore, vacated by the resignation of the Rev. Mr. Peck.

The Rev. Joseph Adderly has been received by letters dimissory from the Diocese of Pa., into the Diocese of Ohio, and has become Rector of St. James's, Boardman, and St. Stephen's, Canfield.

The Rev. Timothy F. Wardwell requests letters and papers to be addressed to him at Syracuse, Western New York.

The Rev. J. H. Morrison has resigned the charge of St. John's Church, Richmond, Virginia, and accepted that of St. John's, Montgomery, Alabama.

The Rev. George N. Sleight (pronounced Slack) has taken charge of St. Paul's Church, Whitehall, Washington county, New York.

The Rev. W. B. Ashley has resigned the Rectorship of St. James' Church, Derby, Birmingham. We understand that Mr. Ashley has been constrained to resign his present position on account of the health of his family, and that (his physician having recommended a Western climate,) he is to become the assistant of Bishop McCoskry, in his parochial charge at Detroit.

Rev. Dr. Bouman previously declined.
Rev. Dr. Upfold afterwards, declined.

Miss McIntosh's New Work.

CHARMS and Counter Charms, by Maria J. McIntosh, author of "Two Lives, or to Seem and to Be," "Aunt Kitty's Tales," &c., &c., 2 vols, 12mo. 75 cents paper cover, or 2 vols. in one, cloth, $1.

This new work of Miss McIntosh will be found one of the most impressive and beautiful tales of the day—the moral is felicitously developed, and is true in thought and feeling.

"One great fault possessed by many otherwise excellent novels in the English language, is the want of moral principle, which too often mar their beauty and usefulness. Miss McIntosh has written several works of fiction, but in nothing from her pen can a sentence be found that inculcates anything that could offend the most rigorous moralist. Charms and Counter Charms is a story of the affections, and can be read with pleasure and profit by all."—Saturday Courier.

It can be seen that the learned writer of the following able article does not confine himself to a mere critique upon the work of Bishop Kenrick. He takes the surer method of first establishing strong points within the disputed territory, and from these he can more successfully attack error and defend the Truth. We omit the first two points to pass to the third and more important question. The bearing of this upon the matter in debate, will at once appear. If it can be proved that St. Peter never was THE BISHOP OF ROME, the Primacy claimed for the Roman Bishops, as his successors, is shown to have no real foundation. Let our readers carefully consider the proofs of this fact in the following article.

From the Church Review.

"Kenrick on the Primacy."

But the question now arises, whether he ever did sit there as Bishop of that See? And to that we proceed.

St. Irenæus is the oldest authority on the subject. He speaks in the passage before cited, of the Apostles Peter and Paul, as founding and building up the Church of Rome, by delivering into the hands of Linus the ministry of the Episcopate. He then adds; Anacletus succeeded him; and after him, in the third place from the Apostles, the Episcopate was allotted to Clement, who both saw the blessed Apostles, and συμβεβηκώς was intimate with them, &c. Tertullian (de Præscr. Hæret. c. 32) says, that Clement was ordained or consecrated by Peter himself; and the Liber Pontificalis acknowledges the same fact, and says that he held the See in the times of Galba and Vespasian from the Consulship of Trachalus and Italicus to Vespasian vii, and Titus, or from A. D. 67, to A. D. 75, nine years, two months and twelve days. We lay no stress upon these statements, excepting the admission that the consecration of Clement by St. Peter, must have been just before his own martyrdom. To account for this, consistently with the assumption that St. Peter himself was Bishop of Rome, the testimony of Irenæus, that Clement was the third Bishop from the Apostles is abandoned, and he is there represented as the second. We choose to follow in this respect, the order of Irenæus, for reasons which we trust will be obvious to our readers. Eusebius has so followed him, in his account of the Roman succession; (Lib. iii, cap. 2 and 4 comp. with 13 and 15;) only that he places the commencement of the Episcopate of Linus after the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul, which was clearly a mistake. Indeed the whole account of Eusebius is full of inconsistencies, as we could easily show, and as Pagi himself acknowledges: "Neque enim in Chronologia Pontificia Eusebio magna fides habenda." In Annal. Bionii. Claudii Imp. 3.)

If, then, Clement, the third Bishop after the Apostles Peter and Paul, was consecrated by Peter just before his martyrdom, from the collection took place in the twelfth year of Nero, or June 29th A. D. it is plain that Linus and his successor, by whatever name called, Anacletus, Anacletus, or Cletus, must have been spectators of Rome before the year 65 of the common Christian era, within thirty-six years after the memorable day of Pentecost, from which the Church dates her origin. We have already remarked that we lay but little stress upon the early dates of Liber Pontificalis, because we know not what dependence in place upon its testimony. As it comes to us, it is the work of Anastasius, a librarian of the Vatican in the eighth century. It is likely, however, that the records are of much older date, and if it were not for the intrepid assurance with which the falsehood that Peter "ingressus est in urbem Romanam" is asserted, we could not but be struck by the improbability of its being so late. It is likely, however, that the records are of much older date, and if it were not for the intrepid assurance with which the falsehood that Peter "ingressus est in urbem Romanam" is asserted, we could not but be struck by the improbability of its being so late. It is likely, however, that the records are of much older date, and if it were not for the intrepid assurance with which the falsehood that Peter "ingressus est in urbem Romanam" is asserted, we could not but be struck by the improbability of its being so late.

Assuming, then, that Cletus and Anacletus were one and the same person, and that the duration of his episcopate was that of the two united, or 19 years and 10 days, we have, from the Liber Pontificalis itself, the testimony, that Linus and Anacletus held the Episcopate 31 years, 3 months, 22 days! For aught we know to the contrary, Anacletus may have suffered martyrdom before St. Peter. This would account for the consecration of St. Clement, by that Apostle. Nearly 32 years, therefore, out of the 36, are accounted for. To get over the difficulty presented by these facts, and to save their darling notion, that St. Peter was 25 years Bishop of Rome, two catalogues, one in the National Library of Paris, transcribed by Pagi, the other in the Vatican prefixed to the Liber Pontificalis, gives the names of Linus and Cletus before Clement, but adds a note that "these two were Chorepiscopi, one after the other, in the times of the blessed Peter." Risum teneatis amici? CHOREPISCOPI! Country Bishops forsooth! How drowning men will catch at straws.

Both before and since, but more especially since the labors of the learned Bishop Pearson, the more candid critics in the Roman communion have been obliged to confess that the early series of the Roman Pontiffs was in a state, if not of inextricable, at least of most troublesome confusion. It is a subject which they have not liked to touch. The perspicacity of Pearson has sufficiently shown how little dependence as to the early dates can be placed on the Ancient Catalogues; and that the succession of the Roman Bishops must be deduced from St. Paul, no less than from St. Peter; but he also was embarrassed by a difficulty which was not then overcome, and which affected all his computations with regard to the conversion and subsequent history of St. Paul. That the crucifixion, resurrection and ascension of our SAVIOUR, and the descent of the HOLY GHOST on the day of Pentecost, took place in the Consulship of the two Gemini, was as he knew full well, the almost unanimous testimony of the ancients. But he in common with the learned men of his time, supposed that their Consulship coincided with the year 29 of the common era; and they could not reconcile this with the Gospel history, because the computations of the Passover in that year did not accord, either with the Gospels, or with the month and day of the month, as to which the testimony of the ancients was no less unanimous. Pearson died in 1686; and it was not until 1703, that Francis Bianchini gave to the world a reconciliation of the whole difficulty, by proving that the Consulship of Fufius Geminus and Rubellius Geminus should be connected with A. D. 28, in which the calculations of the Passover agreed with the ancient account of our Lord's passion. But Bianchini, though his proofs were strong, failed to convince because he was himself embarrassed by another difficulty. The list of Consuls then received, was supposed to be correct; and the retrocession of one Consulship, served to throw the whole subsequent series into disorder. This difficulty was not removed until 1844, when it was shown by Dr Jarvis that the last Consulship in the reign of Antoninus Pius, the year in which he for the fifth and Marcus Aurelius for the third time, held that office, had been dropped; and that it was absolutely necessary to complete the acknowledged length of his reign. For all this we must refer our readers to his work, and to the Vindication of it from the attacks of Prof. Kingsley in our last number. Suffice it to say, that the fact of our SAVIOUR's crucifixion in the Consulship of the two Gemini being now established, as we conceive, beyond reasonable doubt, and the early history of the Church thus harmonized with that of the empire, we are enabled to throw a light which has never yet been thrown, upon the incipient history of the Church of Rome.

The memorable day of Pentecost, on which the HOLY GHOST descended on the Apostles and primitive disciples at Jerusalem, fell upon the sixteenth of May, A. D. 28. Among the multitudes who were filled with amazement at the miraculous gift of tongues were οἱ ἐκδημονῆτες Ῥωμαῖοι peregrinantes Romani, (or as it is in the Vulgate, Advenæ Romani, whence our translation renders the phrase "Strangers of Rome;") literally "the sojourning Romans." To show who these were, and what befell them, we must have recourse to Josephus, Suetonius, Tacitus, and Philo. Josephus (Antiq. xviii, 3, 5,) says that "Tiberius, on the complaint of Saturninus the husband of Fulvia, ordered the whole Jewish people to be driven from Rome; out of whom the Consuls selected 4000, and sent them as troops to Sardinia. The greater part of these refusing to serve, on account of keeping the law of their nation, were punished. Thus for the wickedness of four men, the Jews were banished from the city." This is confirmed by Suetonius, (Tiberius, § 36,) who says that Tiberius repressed foreign rites, both of the Egyptians and Jews, forcing all who adhered to their superstitions to burn the vestments and instruments of their religion. The Jewish youth he distributed in the most unhealthy provinces, under the military oath, and the rest of the nation he removed from the city under pain, if disobedient, of perpetual slavery." Tacitus places this event in the Consulship of M. Silanus and L. Norbanus; and his account agrees in all its details with Suetonius. (Ann. Lib. ii, c. 85.) The four thousand drafted as soldiers, shows how numerous the Jews were at that time in Rome. Philo (in leg. ad Caium) tells us that "they inhabited the Transiberine Region. The greater part of them had been brought as captives into Italy, liberated by those who brought them, and made Roman citizens. They were not forced to abandon their rites, but had their pro-seuchæ, or synagogues, where they assembled, chiefly in the holy weeks, and there made collections of their first fruits, which they sent to Jerusalem by those who carried the sacrifices. Philo adds, that after the death of Sejanus, Tiberius discovered that the slanders, on account of which the Jews were driven from Rome, were "inventions of Sejanus, who wished to destroy the nation because he knew that the Jews were opposed to his wicked designs, and the acts by which he traitorously put in peril the life of the Emperor." (Opera Ed. princ. 1552, p. 698.) Sejanus was executed on the 18th of October, A. D. 30; and the Consulship of Silanus and Norbanus, in which the Jews were banished from Rome, coincided with A. D. 18. During that twelve years of banishment, no Jew could return to Rome without incurring the pain of perpetual slavery; and it was especially during the last six years of that period, that all the stirring events took place in the nation, beginning with the ministry of St. John the Baptist, and including, not only the ministry of our SAVIOUR from his baptism to his ascension, and the descent of the HOLY GHOST, but also all that is recorded in the first nine chapters of the Acts of the Apostles until after the conversion of St. Paul, that is, until the Churches in Judea, Galilee and Samaria, were no longer persecuted. We can now, therefore, be at no loss to perceive that the "strangers of Rome" who were present on the day of Pentecost, were the banished Roman citizens of the Jewish nation. We can not doubt that many of them were of the three thousand converted on that day by the preaching of St. Peter. But though converted and baptized into the Christian faith on the 16th of May, A. D. 28, they could not, for at least full three years afterwards, return to Rome. The death of Sejanus, as we have remarked, occurred in the last half of October, A. D. 30; and it is not likely that the examination of his papers and the full disclosure of his wicked machinations against the Jews, and of their entire innocence, could have been laid before the Emperor, till some time in the year following, or A. D. 31.

Let us now return to the history of St. Peter and St. Paul, the two Apostles to whom the unanimous voice of antiquity ascribes the foundation of the Roman Church. An apocryphal, though very ancient book, entitled the Preaching of Peter, is thus quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus: "Peter saith, that the Lord said to his Apostles, if any one of Israel will repent and believe in God through my name, his sins shall be forgiven him. After twelve years, go forth into the world; lest any one should say, We have not heard." (Clem. Alex. Ed. Potter, Tom. 2, p. 762. Strom. Lib. vi, 637.) The same is mentioned as an ancient tradition by Apollonius, who flourished in the last of the second, and beginning of the third century, under Commodus and Severus: "They say, that the SAVIOUR commanded his Apostles not to depart from Jerusalem for twelve years." (Ap. Euseb. H. E. Lib. v, c. 18.) So St. Chrysostom argues, in his 69th Homily upon St. Matthew, that both before and after the cross, the disciples were commanded first to preach to the Jews in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and then to the ends of the earth. "On this account," he adds, "the Apostles first preached to the Jews, remaining a long time in Jerusalem. Then, being rejected by them, they dispersed themselves among the Gentiles." (Opera Ed. Montf. Tom. vii, 630-81.) Whatever may be thought of the command, the fact is not unlikely; and both accord well with what is said, (Acts viii, 1,) that when the disciples were scattered abroad, (but only, be it observed, throughout Judea and Samaria,) on account of the persecution, the Apostles remained firmly in Jerusalem. The history of Cornelius also shows that St. Peter had confined his preaching to the Jews, until he was sent by express revelation to open the door of faith to the Gentiles, which may not have been until the time thus specified. Assuming, then, these twelve years as probable, St. Peter continued to make Jerusalem his abode and to confine his ministrations to the Jews in Judea, until A. D. 40, the last year of Caligula. Nay we find him there at the passover, (Acts xii, 3, April 10th to 16, A. D. 43; and after his deliverance from prison we read (v. 17) that "he departed and went into another place. This other place, which Baronius, and many who have followed him, suppose to be Rome, we in the exercise of an equal right suppose to have been Antioch. As there is only an incidental mention of him after this in the Acts, we turn to the history of St. Paul.

The events mentioned after the day of Pentecost until the death of Stephen, viz: the healing of the lame man at the beautiful gate of the Temple, the imprisonment of the Apostles, the death of Ananias and Sapphira, the conversion of multitudes, and even of a great company of the Priests—the frequent sessions of the Sanhedrim, the bold and open preaching in the name of the crucified Jesus, both in the Temple and from house to house,—all passed in rapid succession. The enemies of the Church were roused even to the most infuriate madness; and it needed nothing but a general assemblage of the Jewish people to bring on a frightful persecution. Such an occasion was presented at the Feast of Tabernacles, which began that year in the third week of September. Stephen was stoned; and the thirst for blood being excited, the young and zealous Saul began to make havoc of the Church. His miraculous conversion followed towards the close of that year or the beginning of the next; and then after "certain days," in which he proclaimed Christ in the Synagogues, he retired into Arabia. (Gal. i, 13-17.) There he remained in strict concealment until the persecution had died away, enjoying the communications with our Lord Christ himself, which made him equal in all respects to "the very chiefest Apostles," and thus fitted him for the eminent station which he was destined to occupy.

At the end of three years St. Paul returned to Damascus, and thence went up to Jerusalem "to see Peter." There he "abode with him fifteen days, but saw none other of the Apostles save James the Lord's brother." (Gal. i, 18, 19.) It has been made a question, whether James the son of Alphaeus, and James the Lord's brother were one and the same person; and on this depends the other question, whether he was one of the original twelve, or a thirteenth apostle. Alphaeus, if it was a patronymic and not the name of a fraternity, may have been another name for Joseph, the husband of our Lord's mother; and the more general opinion is, that he was the eldest son of Joseph by a former marriage. But without dwelling on the question, what was the degree of his affinity to our Lord, it is certain that he was of the seed of David, and probably on that account, as well as for his eminent holiness, was made the first Bishop of Jerusalem. This office he held according to Epiphanius, for twenty-four years after our Lord's ascension, and was then martyred by the Jews, in the ninety-sixth year of his age.

Death of the Archbishop of Paris.

The Archbishop of Paris accompanied by two of his Grand Vicars, MM. Jacquemet and Ravinet, went on Sunday of his own accord to General Cavaignac, at the Palais Bourbon, where he had established his head quarters. He offered himself to go among the insurgents, as bearer of the words of peace to them, and to place himself and his clergy at the service of the Republic.—General Cavaignac immediately gave orders that every facility should be given to the venerable prelate, who, accompanied by his colleagues, went immediately to the barricades, carrying with him General Cavaignac's proclamation to the insurgents. Three members of the National Assembly, MM. Larabit, Galli-Cazlet, and Druet-Desvaux, volunteered to accompany him. On his way citizens and soldiers fell on their knees, begging his blessing, but entreating him not to proceed. He replied that his duty led him to risk his life, and he kept repeating Bonus autem pastor dat vitam suam pro ovibus suis. He passed several ambulances on the way, where he entered in, and blessed the wounded. On his arrival at the formidable barricade of the Faubourg St. Antoine, the Archbishop and his Grand Vicars advanced to speak to the insurgents. One man alone, dressed in a blouse, preceded him, carrying a branch of a tree in his hand as a mark of conciliation. The insurgents on their part, descended from their barricade, some of them appearing pacifically inclined, and others with menace in their features and in their language. By a zeal which can readily be understood, the combatants on the side of order could not reconcile it to themselves to see the Archbishop thus exposed to the rage of men who had on that very day murdered some persons who had been sent to parley with them. They, therefore, neglected the request of the prelate, and advanced, and were thus face to face with their enemies. Reproaches and threats were exchanged, and personal struggles took place, the disastrous consequences of which the ecclesiastic sought to prevent in the name of religion, and of the pontiff who came there to stop the effusion of blood, and to save those who had taken up arms, and their wives and children.

During these altercations, which for some time delayed the accomplishment of the holy mission, a musket was fired, but it is not known on which side, or whether it was by accident or intentionally. In an instant a cry of "Treason, treason!" arose on all sides; the combatants retired, and the firing became more severe than ever.—The worthy Archbishop was thus placed between two fires; he showed no alarm, he never thought of escaping to the right or left. Headadvanced towards the barricade, and still accompanied by his vicars-general, he mounted it and reached the summit. He was thus in view of both parties. The balls whistled round him, but at this time seemed to respect him. One of his attendants had three balls through his hat. The mediator showed himself, and what voice could be more eloquent than this heroic apparition? What thanks ought to fall on the heart of the pontiff, thus offering and giving his blood and his life for the people entrusted to his care? What glory also both for him and for the faith which inspires it!

But his sacrifice was to be completed. He came down and had scarcely descended a few steps, when he fell pierced in the loins by a ball which appeared to have come from a window at the side. A faithful servant, who followed him unknown to his master, endeavored to catch him in his arms, but was himself wounded in the side. Let us, however, render justice to even the insurgents ran to his assistance, and carried him to the hospital of the Quinze Vingts, and placed a guard over him. He procured the signatures of all present to attest that he was not by the persons to whom he had first spoken, and they all very anxious to have this point clearly stated. The event soon spread through the Faubourg, and produced an extraordinary sensation. In an hour afterwards the firing not to recommence.—The physiognomy of one of those lads had struck him, having seen him fight and disarm him, after being wounded several times. Calling him, side he had strength enough left to raise his arms, and a little wooden crucifix attached to the black collar which he gave it to the young hero, saying to him, "No, this cross . . . lay it on your heart, it will make you happy." Francis Delavigniere, such was his name with his hands joined, and in the attitude of prayer, ever serve this precious souvenir of the dying prelate. The hero did not for a moment lose his Christian serenity. Scarcely his Vicar-General, M. Jacquemet, rejoined him, asked him, as a friend, whether his wound was very dangerous. "It is very serious." "Is my life in danger?" "Well!" said the Archbishop, "blessed and may he accept the sacrifice which I offer for the erring people. May my death serve to atone for the faults I have committed in my episcopate!" Then, reflecting himself, he made his confession, and received the last sacraments. He died, maintaining in the time afterwards extreme unction, maintaining in the unspeakable suffering, all his presence of mind, a full of simplicity and grandeur, at having done his duty so little," he often said, "what remained of it, insignificant; I have sacrificed but little for God, I died after His image, and redeemed by his blood." The day they removed the prelate to the Archbishop's faubourg through which he passed was all full of their knees, exhibiting signs of the most profound reverence. The Archbishop's sufferings have been the subject of elegant illustrations. Muslin paper covers, 25 cents. An Allegory. By the same author Muslin, gilt, 624 cents. The Shadow of the Cross and the Crucifix. Muslin, gilt, 51 cents.

On Tuesday night, at 8 o'clock the President reassembled the following letter:—"Monsieur le Cardinal, the Archbishop of Paris died to-day, at 4 o'clock p. m. The venerable prelate had lost all consciousness last night at 8 o'clock, but recovered his senses a few moments before he expired and was able to address his Clergy. He left them, as a farewell, the recommendation to redoubled zeal and self denial in the accomplishment of the holy mission, and to pray God that his blood might be the last shed in France under such cruel circumstances." This communication was received with the most solemn silence.

The following decree was passed by the National Assembly on Wednesday, to express their regret for the loss of the Archbishop of Paris:—"The National Assembly regards as a duty, to proclaim the sentiment of religious gratitude and profound affliction which it feels for the devotedness which the Archbishop of Paris showed, and for his death, so holy and so heroic."

From the Church Times.

Rev. and Dear Sir.—Although it was with reluctance that I consented to write an outline of what I knew of the Valle Crucis mission, for publication in the Church Times, still as I knew that there were but two or three in the whole country (besides those who are connected with the mission) who had ever been there, and could give the information which you thought so desirable, I felt myself bound to comply.

As you are aware, I made a visit there during the last winter, and having been previously acquainted with several of the missionaries, was received with great cordiality and kindness. Being greatly pleased with all that I saw, I prolonged my stay for more than a month, at the request of the Rev. Mr. French the Superior of the establishment. During this period, I became deeply interested in the mission, having learned their plans, and having seen their system in operation, besides witnessing the devotion and self-denial of the united little band, that are there giving themselves up for the work of the Lord. And now that I have left Valle Crucis, shut in by its mountains, a thousand miles behind me, there is never a day passes but I think of the love and zeal that are there glowing and fervent as in the primitive times.

Valle Crucis, is the mission established by the Bishop of North Carolina, to supply the blessings of the Church throughout the extensive mountain region in the western part of his diocese.

To accomplish this end he has there founded an associated mission, on the plan adopted with such encouraging success at Nashotah. The Clergy officiate at the valley, and for a distance of 80 miles from the mission house. In addition to the missionary work in which they are engaged, they are also training up a number of young men for the ministry. When I was there in the winter there were 3 clergy, and 10 young men, candidates for holy orders, or pursuing their preparatory studies. Another clergyman and two young men are now on their way to join the brotherhood; thus making the number at the mission sixteen in all.

The system, too, is one of very great efficiency. There is the most perfect harmony possible existing among the brethren, and though each has some employments in common with all the rest, each has also his own particular employments for the good of others. The clergy hold service and preach. They also visit among the people and catechise the children. The clergy, too, hear the recitations of the candidates for orders, and some of the others who are pursuing the higher branches of study. The candidates for orders hear the recitations of the younger members of the household, and instruct the children of the neighbourhood in the week day and Sunday Schools. The younger portion of the family are the assistants, in all things of which they are capable.

Mr. French, who catechises all the catechumens in the Valle Crucis Episcopal Church. The terms will be moderate. Parents intending to place their daughters under its fostering care are referred for further information to the Bishop, or to the Rev. J. A. Vaughan, D.D., Rector of the Institute, Oak street, or to either of the following gentlemen, Trustees, viz: Jas. C. Booth, Joseph Cabot, Samuel V. Merrick, Caspar Morris, M. D., William Welsh.

It is important that, prior to Aug. 1, notice should be given to the Rector of those pupils who expect to enter at the opening of the Institute.

TERMS, including French, Latin, Drawing, Stationery, &c., viz: For pupils from 9 to 13 years of age, $25 per session. Over 13 years, $40. Primary Department, $12.

J. B. Payment to be made in advance.

Trinitarian Bible Society.—Established in 1831. Average annual income, 1500/.

Cheltenham Training Schools.—Established in 1845, for the instruction of masters and mistresses upon principles conformable with the liturgy of the Church of England. The Association has received 6500/ including a grant of 3000/ from the Educational Committee of Council; but 2500/ more is required for the erection of the proposed schools.

[NOTE.—The respective incomes are calculated, upon an average of the last three years. During the year 1847-8, the receipts of nearly all the Societies show a decrease as compared with the preceding year—a circumstance attributed to the monetary pressure.]—Presbyterianian.

EFFECTS OF ENCOURAGEMENT.—The following happy illustrations of the influence of encouragement upon children, and of the importance of understanding a child's character, and addressing him in the right way, we are unable to credit to the author. We find the extract as we give it:

Last summer, I had a girl exceedingly behind in all her studies. She was at the foot of the division, and seemed to care but little about her books. It so happened that as a relaxation, I let them at times, during school hours, unite in singing. I noticed that this girl had a remarkably clear sweet voice; and I said to her, 'Jane you have a good voice, and you may lead in the singing.' She brightened up, and from that time her mind seemed more active. Her lessons were attended to, and she soon gained a high rank. One day as I was going home, I overtook her with a school companion. Well, Jane, said I, you are getting along very well; how happens it you do much better now than at the beginning of the quarter?

I do not know why it is, she replied.

I know what she told me the other day, said her companion. And what was that? I asked.

Why, she said she was encouraged.

Yes, here we have it—she was encouraged. She felt that she was not dull in every thing. She had learned self-respect, and thus she was encouraged.

Some twelve or thirteen years ago, there was in Franklin school an excessively dull boy. One day the teacher wishing to look out a word, took up the lad's dictionary, and opening it found the blank leaves covered with drawings. He called the boy to him.

Did you draw these? said the teacher.

Yes sir, said the boy with a downcast look.

I do not think it well for boys to draw in their books, said the teacher, and I would rub these out if I were you; but they are well done. Do you ever take lessons.

No sir, said the boy his eyes sparkling.

Well, I think you have a talent for this thing. I should like you to draw me something, when you are at leisure at home, and bring it to me. In the meantime, see how well you can recite your lessons.

The boy felt he was understood. He began to love his teacher. He became animated and fond of his books. He took delight in gratifying his teacher by his faithfulness to his studies—while the teacher took every opportunity to encourage him in his natural desires. The boy became one of the first scholars, and gained the medal before he left the school. After this he became an engraver, laid up money enough to go to Europe, studied the works of the old masters, sent home productions from his own pencil, which found a place in some of the best collections of paintings, and is now one of the most promising artists of his years in the country. After the boy gained the medal, he sent the teacher a beautiful picture, as a token of respect; and I doubt not, this day, he feels that that teacher, by the judicious encouragement he gave to the natural turn of his mind, has had a great moral and spiritual effect on his character.

The Keystone of Knowledge.

The principle of esteeming the minister very highly in love, and especially for his work's sake, for his office, more than for his own sake, is the very keystone of edification; without it we cannot expect in the ordinary course of God's grace to be built up into an holy temple to the Lord. The building will not be compacted together. It will be, like an arch to which the keystone is wanting, ready to fall to pieces when the wood-work which forms its temporary support shall decay, or be withdrawn. In all teaching, love is the most efficacious and constraining power. The child, who loves his teacher, and feels the interest which the teacher takes in his welfare, and that the work of the teacher is work for his good and advantage, will learn infinitely more, and apply to far better purpose what he does learn, than another who learns unwillingly or even indifferently. But much more so does this principle hold good in religious teaching, where compulsion cannot be used, and where the self-denying precepts of duty are to be urged against the tempting and ever-pressing solicitations of interest and avarice, and pleasure, and self-love. How shall this unequal contest be sustained? how amidst this conflict shall the house be built, and compacted and made to stand, if, instead of the cementing principle of love, the elements of repulsion and disunion shall abound among the materials of which the edifice is to be framed? The master builder may be wise, he may have laid the right foundation, he may choose the best materials, he may be skilful in putting them together, but if that, which, as the keystone of the arch, is necessary to bind the whole fabric together, be wanting, his wisdom will be vain, his labour fruitless, the edifice weak, and when the winds of temptation or persecution beat upon it, great will be the fall thereof.—Rev. J. E. N. Molesworth, D. D.

MR. EDITOR:—

I saw in your paper of the 24th inst., some remarks on the notice of the proceedings of the Delaware Convention, in which the writer exposes his dislike of the use of the word performed, as applied to the service of the Church, insisting, as others have done of late, that the proper expression would be prayers were said, &c. Why is it not correct and rubrical to say that prayers were read, or service was performed? In looking into the Prayer Book I find that the exhortation is to be said by the minister, but the general confession, and the first prayer is to be said by the congregation. The declaration of absolution is made, not said, by the Priest.

The Lord's Prayer is said by the minister and people. The Psalms are to be said or sung, by the congregation of course, for it too often happens that our ministers take no part in the singing services, herein differing essentially from the Romish clergy. The Lessons are read by the minister while the creed is said by minister and people. The collects and special prayers are not designated to be said, and are therefore to be and in fact are read by the minister. The Litany is to be used, which implies reading. It is the leading peculiarity of our liturgy, that the congregation participate in its performance, and it is remarkable in the Morning and Evening Prayer, that whatever is directed to be said is performed by the minister and people together. The use then of the expression that prayers were said, if allowable, is not, in my opinion, more correct than that to which we have always been accustomed.

But there was another matter referred to in the article of your correspondent—the complaint made by some one of a too frequent communion. Certainly every right minded Christian should strive to live in a constant preparation for that solemn sacrament; but is it not to be feared that the too frequent repetition of it will induce a less careful examination on the part of members of the Church, and tend to make them regard it too cheaply, or if such is not the case, to deter persons from approaching the holy table, and to induce others to stay away who ought to be there on every such occasion. Without extenuating such conduct, it is sufficient to say that such a result was manifested in a small parish when lately the administration of the communion took place four times within a month. Our Church has provided no regular periods for the celebration of this service—for I do not agree with you nor with the minister of the parish last mentioned, that because there are proper prefaces for Ascension, Whitsunday and Trinity, therefore the Church requires the communion on each of these days. If that construction were correct it would apply as strongly to the seven days after Ascension and the six days after Whitsunday as the special prefaces are to be used on all those days. Moreover, upon your view of it, the general preface, reciting that it is meet and right at all times, &c. would make it equally obligatory upon the minister to have a communion every Sunday, which will not be insisted on. Usage existing now for at least two hundred years has established for parishes with stated services a monthly communion, including the celebration at Christmas, Easter and Whitsunday, those three great festivals commemorative of events more interesting to mankind than any or all others. This has been found to be quite as frequent as the due preparation for it and reception of it would warrant. We are neither wiser nor better than those who lived at and after the period of the reformation. Let us abide by their usages nor seek under pretence of a nearer approach to primitive christianity to go back for precedents beyond their day, lest we lose our true character of a Protestant Church.

LAICUS.

We publish the above although denying the correctness both of the conclusions and the assumed facts on which they are grounded. We will make this article the subject of some remarks in the next Banner. [EDITOR.]

For the Banner of the Cross.

Sentences from Bishop Taylor.

"God hath sent some angels into the world, whose office it is to refresh the sorrows of the poor, and to lighten the eyes of the disconsolate." And what greater measure can we have, than that we should bring joy to our brother,—than that thy tongue should be tuned with heavenly accents, and make the weary soul listen for light and ease; and when he perceives that there is such a thing in the world, and in the order of things, as comfort and joy, to begin to break out from the prison of his sorrows at the door of sighs and tears, and by little and little melt into showers and refreshment? This is glory to thy voice, and employment fit for the brightest angel.

"So have I seen the sun kiss the frozen earth, which was bound up with the images of death, and the colder breath of the north; and then the waters break from their enclosures, and melt with joy, and run in useful channels; and the flies do rise again from their little graves in walls, and dance awhile in the air, to tell their joy is within, and that the great mother of creatures will open the stock of her new refreshment, become useful to mankind, and sing praises to her Redeemer:—so is the heart of a sorrowful man under the discourses of a wise comforter, he breaks from the despairs of the grave, and the fetters and chains of sorrow, he blesses God, and he blesses thee, and he feels his life returning: for to be miserable is death, but nothing is life but to be comforted. God is pleased with no music from below, so much as in the thanksgiving songs of relieved widows, of supported orphans, of rejoicing, comforted and thankful persons."

"Sermons may please when they first strike the ear, and yet appear flat and ignorant when they are offered to the eye, and to an understanding that can consider at leisure."

"He that is apt fondly to admire any man's person, must first cure himself by considering, that the preacher is God's minister and servant; that he speaks God's word, and does it by divine assistance; that he hath nothing of his own but sin and imperfection; that he does but his duty and that also hardly enough: that he is highly answerable for his talent, and stands deeply charged with the care of souls; and therefore that he is to be highly esteemed for the work sake, and not for the person."

Obituary.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Fell asleep in Jesus, on Thursday, July 13th, in the city of Wilmington, Del., LYDIA ANN, wife of ALONZO B. DAVIS, of the U. S. Navy, and daughter of the late Rev. STEPHEN W. PRESSMAN, of Newcastle, Del., in the 25th year of her age.

The removal from earth of this lamented lady is a stroke that has fallen most heavily upon an affectionate family and a large circle of relations and friends. Her character was one which, impressing even the stranger with a conviction of its amiability and excellence, took an ever increasing hold upon the affections and esteem of her more intimate friends. All those natural endowments and coveted acquirements, which grace and refine the female character, were in her exhibited in happy union with sincere and all-controlling piety. Fitted to adorn society, and sure to win its admiration, her chosen sphere was the peaceful home, illumined by her beaming smile and sanctified by her fervent and chastened religion. As a wife and a mother, a daughter and a sister, she was worthy of all that intense and pure affection which flowed forth towards her from many hearts. The law of kindness was ever on her lips, and her chiefest adorning was that "ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price."

Stricken by a blow so sudden and grievous, and feeling the magnitude of a loss which earth can never repair, her friends are enabled to find that support and consolation in the hour of trial which flow from the precious gospel of Christ. They saw in her a bright example of the power of that gospel to regulate and elevate the life, to comfort in tribulation, to sustain in the prospect of eternity. Brief as was her earthly existence, they rejoice to think that a large part and the best part of it was given to God. And thus, inspired with the fullest confidence that unto her mortality is swallowed up of life, they can give her up in resignation and faith to Him who had upon her the highest and most sacred of claims, "looking for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Indeed! Has she not from time immemorial provided Sunday & other holy days' Office?

SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1848.

To Agents and Subscribers.

AGENTS OF THE BANNER, who may have made collections, are respectfully requested to remit the amount to us by mail. Notes of any specie-paying Banks will be received.

SUBSCRIBERS, who have received bills, will especially oblige us by remitting to us the amounts respectively due. We solicit early attention to them.

The terms of the Paper are Two Dollars and Fifty Cents a year, payable in advance; or Three Dollars if not paid before the end of the year. The advance price will be charged when we are obliged to collect the bills through a travelling agent.

Any person remitting Ten Dollars, will be entitled to receive five copies for one year.

Communications for the Editor may be addressed to the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, and for the publisher to James S. Newbold, both, No. 16 South Seventh street, Philadelphia.

Office of the Banner of the Cross.

The office of this paper has been removed from No. 89 South Fifth street, to the Book store of Mr. R. S. H. George, No. 16 South Seventh street, between Market and Chesnut streets.

Mr. George will act as Agent for the receipt of subscriptions, &c.

Mr. Editor:—

Can you say something which will induce the subscribers to the "Banner," who are indebted for it, to remit the amounts they owe? Bills have been sent to many of them lately, with as polite a request as I know how to make, that they would please to remit the amount by mail, at my risk, in notes of any specie paying bank. A few of them have promptly complied with the request, and I beg them to accept my thanks for their kind attention. Those who have not yet done so, will very much oblige me by giving me an opportunity to make to them the same grateful acknowledgement.

THE PUBLISHER.

James S. Newbold

We take this occasion to call the attention of our Subscribers and Contributors to the very plain fact, that a distinction should be made between the office of "Publisher" and "Editor" of this paper. To the former all business communications should be addressed. Subscriptions, when they are paid, are to be paid to "the Publisher." And so, when any change is to be made in the address of a subscriber.

On the other hand, all communications which are intended for the Banner, and all matters which require editorial notice, are to be addressed to the Editor.

We might suppose this plain distinction would be universally recognised. But this is far from the case. As the Publisher has nothing to do with the Editorial department, and as the Editor has no connection with the business department, much needless trouble, and unnecessary delays are occasioned by the very common disregard of this distinction.

While we ask attention to these hints of our own, we trust that "subscribers" will also pay due regard to the very reasonable and very modest request of the Publisher. A slight knowledge of business matters will inform our subscribers that making "bricks without straw" is an easy matter compared with the task of publishing a Paper without the payments of subscriptions! We are very sure that none of the patrons of the Banner design to be Egyptian task-masters. As the deficiency complained of results from inadvertence or forgetfulness, we hope that all whose subscriptions are due will act at once upon this friendly mnemonic.

It is not merely a selfish motive which induces us to append the following extract from a letter lately received. Those who have experienced the evil of a position, which is exposed to so much captious and severe criticism, will realize the grateful influence of such kind words. And this effect is increased by the high character and standing of their author, one who would be the last to say what he did not feel, and one whose feelings are controlled by a sound mind and right judgment.

"It is very difficult indeed, to induce many of our people to take a religious paper—and acquaint themselves with the intelligence of the Church. They are so much engrossed in worldly and political affairs, that they seem indisposed to anything else.

"The Banner of the Cross" I consider as admirably calculated to help forward the cause of piety and of the Church within our parishes. It is firm and decided in the support of 'evangelical truth and apostolic order.' The intelligence it contains is of an instructive and interesting character, and just what our people want. If we can only prevail on those who belong to our respective charges, and even those without, to read and study the principles of our faith and order, as set forth in the unequivocal and christian tone of your paper, we accomplish much I conceive in the furtherance of true religion in the Church. There is much of pretended religion, of spurious charity, and of boasting liberality in the present day. And we discover this spirit among too large a portion of Episcopalians. There is a disposition among us to suspect and denounce every minister who advocates the Church as she is, and desires to carry out her authority and requirements. There is a readiness on the part of some of our members,—I trust the number is decreasing—to brand such clergy as bigots, as cold formalists and even as the propagators of pestilent errors. Charity in the estimation of some—or at least in their practice, consists in their lauding all other denominations, and abusing the Church, or perhaps, I should rather say in disparaging it, and exposing what they regard as its evils. This however in my opinion is a strange and inconsistent kind of charity, and I verily believe is not that of the gospel."

ST. AUGUSTINE'S MISSIONARY COLLEGE.—We think our readers will be deeply interested in the following account of this noble Institution, which we take from the (London) Guardian. The object for which this College has been established, invests it with peculiar interest to our Church. Had such an institution existed while the United States were colonies of Great Britain, how different might our Church be now! It is a great and glorious idea this of establishing a college for the education of a Missionary clergy, to supply the large demands for laborers in the vast field for whose spiritual condition Great Britain is responsible.

And this Missionary enterprise derives still greater interest from the fact, that its success is owing chiefly to the munificence of an individual, Mr. A. J. B. Hope. It is an example, a noble and blessed one, to the rich men of our Church. We have many St. Augustine's to be built and established. All our Church colleges are "Missionary colleges." All of them want endowments, and means for vigorous and successful prosecution. Let not our men of wealth wait until they have no use for their money to bequeath it to such blessed uses. But, like this noble son of our Mother Church, let them give it under their own direction, and while their own eyes may see the present fruits of their charity.

ST. AUGUSTINE'S COLLEGE, CANTERBURY.

It was our painful duty last week to record events passing in a neighbouring country, unparalleled in the annals of civil warfare among Christian communities, for atrocity and bloodshed; crowned too with the death of the chief pastor of the French Church, whilst engaged in the holy attempt to throw oil upon the troubled waters. We have this week to paint a scene of peaceful contrast, in which our own Archbishop took a prominent part; and one we hope in all respects calculated to call down a continuance of those blessings upon our land, the receipt of which during the last few months has shown England indeed to be a "favoured nation." The consecration of St. Augustine's College, Canterbury, is an event of the age—a striking witness of life in the Church—that will speak to future generations in an eloquent tongue of piety and self-denial, most conspicuous in an age of luxurious indulgence. It was on St. Peter's day, 1847, that we had the gratification of witnessing the consecration of four colonial Bishops in Westminster Abbey. A twelvemonth has elapsed, and again the festival of St. Peter is sanctified by the dedication of a college, following up the good work of its predecessor, in giving strength to our Church in the colonies, and affording assistance in propagating the Gospel among brethren who have a peculiar claim to such help from our hands. As the beneficent act of an individual sent forth Bishops for her guidance, so now another individual has founded a college, the object of which is to train missionaries for their assistance.

At present the foundation of St. Augustine contemplates a society consisting of a Warden, Sub-Warden, and six Fellows, appointed or to be appointed, by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishop of London. The Primate is perpetual visitor of the college (which was incorporated by royal charter on Wednesday last), and the statutes are given by his Grace. There are to be forty-eight students, who will be admitted on application to the Warden, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-two, and will be maintained at a calculated average expense of 35*l.* each per annum, in some instances assisted by studentships, four of which, for instance, have been already founded by Mrs. Sheppard for natives of Lincolnshire. The students will take all their meals in the hall, wear an academic dress, and be allowed twelve weeks' vacation in the course of the year. They will be trained especially for service in the Colonial Church, or as missionaries to the adjacent heathen, and will be ordained abroad. The Rev. Dr. Coleridge, formerly Bishop of Barbadoes, has been appointed Warden; the Rev. G. Pearson, M. A., of Christ Church, first Sub-Warden; the Rev. A. P. Moore, Trinity College, Cambridge, a Fellow; and it is hoped the college will be in full operation in the autumn.

The College is founded on the site for a monastery, assigned by Ethelbert, King of Kent, in the year 605, to St. Augustine, from which date the following brief history will trace it down to the present time:—

The ancient monastery was dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, and was under the Benedictine rule. The monastery appears to have been a place of royal sepulture; King Ethelbert and St. Augustine were interred there, and many of their successors. By royal favour, and by the especial patronage of the Papal See, it grew in power and wealth. Canute, the famous Danish monarch, was one of the contributors to its grandeur, and nearly every Sovereign down to the reign of Edward the Confessor. Indeed, so great was its influence, that, though from its foundation to the Norman Conquest it acknowledged the control of the Mother Church, in after years it refused to do so, and in the end so far established its independence that the Archbishop's benediction on the abbots was conferred without the abbey church, and without any profession of obedience being exacted. In the midst of its pride, however, this famous monastery suffered many reverses, and was at length reduced to the same ruined and degraded condition as all the other religious establishments of the kind in this country. It was frequently sacked by the Danes; in 1168 it was nearly consumed by fire, and in 1271 an inundation did great injury to a large portion of the structure. After a reign of 69 abbots, the final overthrow of its power took place in the reign of Henry VIII., by whom it was seized as a royal palace, and the domains turned into a deer park and chase. In the second and third of Philip and Mary, the Queen granted the estate to the Cardinal Archbishop Pole for life. Queen Elizabeth, in 1573, kept court there in a royal progress, and Charles I. and Charles II. lodged there, the former on his marriage with the Princess Henrietta, and the latter in passing through Canterbury on his restoration. Queen Elizabeth granted it to Henry Lord Cobham, who was attainted, when it again lapsed to the Crown. The Queen then gave it to Lord Essendon, Viscount Cranbourne, Earl of Salisbury, but it afterwards fell into the hands of Edward Lord Wotton of Marley, from whom it descended to Thomas Lord Wotton, and remained in that family until the Great Rebellion, when it was plundered. Sir Edward Hales, who married one of Lord Wotton's daughters, subsequently obtained possession, and from him it descended to Sir Edward Hales, of St. Stephen's, Baronet. At this time so little veneration was paid to the ruins of this once sacred place, that the apartment adjoining the gateway was used as an alehouse, the gateway was converted into a brewhouse, the great court into a bowling-green, the chapel into a fives-court, and the room over the gate into a large brewing vat, or perhaps worse, a cockpit.

In 1842, the Rev. E. Coleridge, one of the Masters of Eton, began turning his attention to the necessities of a missionary college, and drew observation to the subject. In June, 1844, Mr. A. J. B. Hope bought the site simply with a view of rescuing it from its continued degradation. But, in December the same year, Mr. Hope determined to devote his purchase to the purpose of a missionary college as its best destination, and procured the assistance of Mr. Coleridge for carrying out his plan. Besides giving the site, Mr. Hope undertook to rebuild the small chapel of the monastery, and to contribute a considerable sum of money towards the settlement of a college. In the following January the late Archbishop of Canterbury gave his cordial approbation to the scheme, which has since been carried on in the fullness of faith, till the buildings have been completed, and on Thursday last were consecrated by the presnet Primate, who has followed the example of his predecessor in affording his warmest approbation and assistance to the plan. The commission to restore and rebuild the college was intrusted to Mr. Butterfield, the architect, to whom the highest praise is due—for beauty of design in which the harmony of the whole is apparent to the most æsthetic critic—from the subserviency of accurate and simple detail. We now proceed to a description of the buildings:—

The new college is built in the style of the 14th century, and accords admirably with the fine old gateway, which has been incorporated with it, now forming the grand entrance. The porter's room and infirmary to the north, the dining hall, with kitchen and offices, the west front of the chapel, and the warden and fellow's lodgings to the south of the gateway, form the principal street front. The walls all round are faced with square flint and ragstone, which, contrasted with the red tiled roofing and the quaint Gothic forms of the stone masonry where it intervenes, has a singular but very pleasing effect. The use of flint in this way is almost entirely confined to ancient times, and this may be considered the most successful modern imitation thereof. To a spectator the walls look like one immense mass of honeycomb—so curiously and regularly are the flints arranged. The general effect of the buildings is excellent, their character and subordination as a consistent whole being skillfully preserved, while over them is cast an air of modest and grave seclusion well befitting an institution dedicated to theological study. Entering the gateway, you find yourself in a turfed quadrangle, with diagonal and straight gravel walks; a gravelled terrace runs round the north and east side and part of the south. On the north terrace stand the cloisters, with the students' dormitory above them; they are one hundred and fifty feet in length, and occupy the space of eight arches. In the buildings above are apartments for forty-eight students, consisting of a sitting-room and small bed-room partitioned off for each; the rooms warmed with hot water pipes, and opening from either side into a gallery two hundred and fifty feet long. On the east side of the quadrangle is an undercroft, intended for a museum, a fine room, floored with red tiles and vaulted with brick, the arches having stone groinings. Above the museum is the library, the entrance to which, with large open staircase, forms the principal feature in this portion of the buildings, and for the unostentatious beauty of which the architect has been much praised. The library has a fine pitched oak roof, and is lighted on each side by six windows, and at the end by a large one, with stained glass, with figures representing St. Augustine, in a quatre foil in the centre, and on each side St. Peter and St. Paul. Some progress has already been made in the collection of books, and the arrangements for reading are very good.* The south side is formed by a terrace under the north wall, and remains of the western tower of the ancient abbey church; this tower, known as St. Ethelbert's, was most unnecessarily pulled down a few years since, under a mistaken idea that it was unsafe. A wall, shutting off the college garden, completes this side. A broad raised terrace is carried round in front of the students' building and library. An elegant stone conduit, the gift of J. C. Sharpe, Esq., the banker in Fleet street, stands in the middle of the quadrangle. The college buildings are, throughout, designed to agree in style with the ancient gateway, which has long ranked among the finest remains in the kingdom. The west end of the chapel is of early English or first-pointed architecture; it had been very much mutilated, and was all that remained of an ancient guest chapel. The present chapel is half as long again as this was. On the west side of the quadrangle stand the apartments of the warden and fellows, the chapel of the college, projecting considerably beyond the other buildings into the court, the dining hall, and the kitchens. The chapel is fitted up with surprising taste, and merits, from the chaste simplicity of its details and its elegant proportions, a minute description. It is raised upon a crypt, is provided with seats in the ante-chapel for the lay members of the college, and is furnished with sixty-four stalls in choir for the fellows and students, with a litany stool in the centre. The chapel is lit by an east window, two on each side of the sacra-rium, four in the ante-chapel, and a western triplet, all filled with stained glass, by Willement. The east window of five lights contains, in the three middle ones, the Baptism of our Lord, the Adoration, and our Lord's First Miracle at the Marriage Feast in Cana, under canopies, subjects which are commonly known as the three Epiphanies. In the external lights are figures of St. Gregory and St. Augustine, under similar canopies. Above, in two cinquefoils, is the Annunciation, being figures of the Blessed Virgin and the Archangel. In a wheel of trefoils above is a choir of angels. In the two north windows in the sacra-rium, containing two lights each, are the full length figures of the four Evangelists, holding on labels the first words of each gospel. Above these, in quatrefoils, is represented our Lord, enthroned and supported by angels, with the inscription, "Sedebit autem Dominus Rex in Eternum," and the Day of Pentecost. In similar windows on the south side are the four greater prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, with the offering up of Isaac, and the Meeting of Abraham and Melchizedec in the tracery above. In the west windows of the chapel is the history of St. Peter and Paul, in memory of whom the abbey was originally dedicated. The altar candlesticks are of silver gilt, and of a rich and ancient design. The sacramental plate is of the same material, and also carefully modelled after mediæval examples. The great feature, however, of this exquisite little chapel is the sacra-rium. The altar is raised on three successive steps, distinguished each by tessellated pavement of distinct patterns. The lowest step is covered with tiles relieving a fluer-de-lis stamp. On the second are tiles of a circular form, bearing each the inscription in old English, "Miserere Domine Jesu." The foot-pan of the altar is a rich mosaic pattern of enamel-work, the colours being dark brown, green, red, and blue. The architect has sought, as far as possible, to restore each particular part of the ruins, in detail as well as style; thus the present library, chapel, and dormitories are built upon the exact foundations of the old. The library crypt is a literal restoration from the existing remains of the crypt of the old great refectory. The library itself is an original composition of Mr. Butterfield's, though, of course, of the same size as the refectory. The hall is a restoration, from remains found in the course of the work, of its predecessor (which must have been the great hall). The arrangement of the hall and chapel opening from a common staircase was the ancient one. The common room was the bed chamber for the principal guests. The warden's lodge and fellows' lodgings are an original design of Mr. Butterfield's, but mainly on old foundations. Perhaps the most picturesque feature in this beautiful reproduction of our ancient monastic buildings is to be found in the "fair conduit," which occupies the centre of the quadrangle.

Canterbury was crowded on Wednesday evening, and there was great difficulty in obtaining beds at any price, although the principal parties concerned in the ceremonial did not arrive till Thursday morning. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Mr. Hope, and many friends, left London at 5 o'clock, by a special train, and at eight o'clock those who had received the privilege of an invitation assembled in the dining hall.

The company having been placed in the chapel, the procession entered in the following order:—

Verger,

The Sub-Warden and Fellow,

The Bishop Warden,

The Bishops of Fredericton and Brechin,

The Bishops of Lichfield and Oxford,

The Bishop of London,

The Archbishop of Canterbury, followed by his Chaplains,

The Deputy Registrar and other officials.

His Grace being seated on a throne, erected for the purpose at the north side of the Holy Table, the warden presented and read the petition of himself and the fellows for the consecration of the chapel of the College, situated within the precincts of the dissolved Monastery of St. Augustine, the site whereof had been presented for the purpose by Alexander James Beresford Hope, Esq. The Archbishop assented to the prayer of the petition; and then, attended by the other Bishops and his Chaplains, the Warden, Sub-Warden, and Fellow, moved towards the west end and back to the Holy Table, repeating the 24th Psalm. The consecration service, which had been drawn up specially for the occasion by the Archbishop, was then proceeded with by his Grace.

The alms were collected by the Fellows while the offertory sentences were read by the Primate, and amounted to about 508*l*. The prayer for the Church Militant was said by the Archbishop, and the Exhortation and Confession by the Bishop Warden, the rest of the office by his Grace the Archbishop. The Archbishop having communicated, the other Bishops proceeded, with the Bishop of London, aided by the Bishop of Lichfield and Bishop Coleridge, to administer to the other clergy and laity present. During the early part of the morning there was much and continued rain, but whilst the administration of the Holy Communion took place the sun broke forth, lighting up the chapel with its rays, falling in bright gladness on the crowd of devout worshippers, kneeling on the bare pavement in the centre of the chapel, and offering a glad omen to the founder as it greeted him on his approach to the altar. God grant it may be realized!

After these services at the Chapel, the congregation proceeded to the Cathedral where the Archbishop preached the consecration sermon, choosing for his text the Epistle to the Ephesians, chap. 3, verse 10: "To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God."

The Dean read the offertorial sentences, and the prayer of the Church Militant; the Archbishop giving the concluding benediction.

The crowded state of the Cathedral prevented the collection of the alms except at the doors, where plates were held by the Rev. Dr. Mill, the Rev. Earnest Hawkins, the Rev. George Gilbert, the Rev. Thomas Darling, the Rev. J. Moore, (Fellow of St. Augustine,) and the Rev. E. H. Woodall; and 430*l*. was collected, including 50*l*. from the Earl of Winchelsea, who was unable to be present. In addition, 50*l*. was given in the afternoon; and the sum of 2,020*l*., together with 100*l*. a-year, was presented for the establishment of New Zealand scholarships, in memory of the Rev. Thomas Whytehead, late chaplain to the Bishop of that colony. During the day another contribution of 1,000*l*. was announced, for the establishment of Australian scholarships. The names of the respective benefactors have not transpired.

At three o'clock an elegant luncheon was provided in the cloisters and museum of the college, to which Mr. Hope invited at least twelve hundred to partake. The college was now thronged with visitors that gave the quadrangle a most gay appearance, and the opportunity was taken to inspect the various buildings, which called down the admiration of a crowd of goodly judges, whose praises could be no slight reward to the pains-taking architect, and whose blessings on its founder, we trust, may be reiterated within its walls for ages to come.

The day concluded with evening prayers at the beautiful cathedral, amidst associations that space will not allow us to dwell upon here, though they must be coupled with the Festival of St. Peter in the memory of all present for time yet to come.

We take the following from "The Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register," a leading paper of the Romanists, published in New York. We leave our readers to comment for themselves. It will show that "Catholics" are not quite so submissive as formerly, and that those who would govern are none the less arrogant! This CATHOLIC Editor speaks with more authority than a Patriarch, and, one would think, is fitting himself for what may be left of the chair of St. Peter!

Canada Affairs.

QUEBEC—SHAMEFUL LANGUAGE OF A CATHOLIC IN THE SPECTATOR.—We have been watching for a good while, with the interest that we take in Irish affairs everywhere, the progress of a controversy in Quebec, in which one of those politico diabolical clubs, whose real motto is independence of the clergy—i. e. of religion in any form, plays the part of trouble stirrer. Its organ is a little sheet called the Quebec Spectator, which appears tri-weekly, and has reached somewhere about its thirtieth number. The editor boasts himself a Catholic and an Irishman, and yet ventures to put forth for Irishmen and Catholics to read such stuff as the following:—

"As a Roman Catholic we respect and obey our Clergy, but beyond the pale of religion we hold ourselves entirely independent of them. It is not the desire of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick to interfere in any way in the world with the Revd. Gentleman; they will always submissively obey him as their religious Pastor, and they do expect that he will require no more of them. They emphatically protest against any allusion being made to them from the Pulpit; they are too numerous and too independent to allow themselves to be treated as 'vagabonds, miscreants, political knaves,' &c., &c., by any one."

Here it is in style rich enough for an orangeman fifty years ago; "BEYOND THE PALE OF RELIGION we hold ourselves entirely independent of the clergy." But how is the editor of the Spectator, who calls himself a Catholic, to wriggle himself out "beyond the pale of religion," without getting into the pale of damnable sin? He forgets that he does not live in the happy eighteenth century, when it passed for a principle that a man was to forget that he was a politician when in Church, or that he was a christian, as soon as he had got outside.

"See you Mister Priest," seems to say the Quebec editor, "when we are amind to drop into church of a Sunday morning, before the tap-rooms are open, we will pull off our hats at the door, and be decent while you are saying mass. But we expect you will require no more of us. And if you go to talking from the pulpit, about what we may do outside, why just prepare yourself to be put through the window—for we are numerous and independent enough to do it." In another number of his paper he says:—"there is such a thing as independence among the Irishmen of Quebec, and they are extremely jealous of that independence. Neither Doctors in Physic or Ethics will be able to rob them of that precious gift. It is singular how our French Canadian Clergy can content themselves without heading political parties, yet our Pastors are not only determined to be our spiritual leaders, but they must also lead in secular affairs."

This tone of remark, uttered by one calling himself a Catholic, and propagated among Catholics, has sprung, as the paper in which it is given forth seems itself to have sprung, from a Society calling itself "The Friendly Sons of St. Patrick." This Society was originated in opposition to the St. Patrick's Society of Quebec, about which we have nothing to say. What we have to say is: that the Friendly Sons is a would-be-Catholic-and-independent-of-the-clergy-society; 2. That Mr. McMahon, Pastor of St. Patrick's, whose zeal and piety is known among the Catholics from one end of Canada to another, is too well informed and too vigilant a priest to let such a monstrosity take root among his flock without openly opposing it: 3. That the Spectator, and other machinery of the Friendly Sons in Quebec, have in consequence been set to work to traduce, annoy, and oppose the Rev. Mr. McMahon and other of the excellent clergy of Quebec: 4. That the latter gentlemen deserve and will certainly have the sympathy of Catholics, and particularly of Irishmen, whenever the thing is known: 5. That we hope and are convinced, when local irritations or annoyances shall have passed away, that the true Catholic sentiment, and the true Irish feeling, of respect for the clergy, will roll back to its natural level, and in so doing wash out the character or the existence of the Quebec Spectator: 6. That as we will not exchange with a paper for which our conscience would reproach us for subscribing as a private Catholic; and as we think no Catholic could with a free conscience subscribe for a paper like the Spectator, we to-day cut it from our exchange list, and deprive ourselves for the future of the sight of its dingy columns,—and its blackguardism.

Bishop Doane's Address to the Sixty-Fifth Annual Convention of New Jersey.

We omit the records of services already given in the Banner. The practical importance of the Bishop's brief but pointed remarks will show how much he is alive to the true interests of the Church and to the welfare of the diocese.

MY BRETHREN OF THE CLERGY AND OF THE LAITY:

My first Episcopal service, after the rising of the last Convention, was on Sunday, 18th July, (seventh after Trinity,) in St. Paul's Church, Paterson; when I admitted John A. Parsons, A. B., an alumnus of the General Theological Seminary, to the holy order of Deacons. Morning prayer was read by the Rev. Dr. Ogilby; the candidate was presented by the Rector of the Church, the Rev. Mr. Thompson; and I made the exhortation and administered the Holy Communion. Mr. Parsons was appointed Missionary to officiate in Christ Church, Allentown, and in other places. On this occasion, we were ministered to, in all the acts and offices of the most refined and generous hospitality, by a holy woman, who has since entered into her rest—Mrs. Ogden was the model of a Christian lady, and a Christian mother. She was the friend of my youth; and her friendship was faithful unto death. I had enjoyed her highest confidence, in that most sacred of all trusts, the education of her children; and her last words, as I stood by her dying bed, were a commendation of my sacred work, at St. Mary's Hall, and Burlington College, to the favour and blessing of Almighty God. Her fervent words seemed uttered from the better world, on which she had well nigh entered; and I could not but receive them as a token of the blessing they invoked.

On Sunday, 3, (eighteenth after Trinity,) the Rev. Mr. Clarkson read morning prayers and I preached, and administered the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Dunn. I regret to say, that this interesting station is without a missionary. The Rev. Mr. Clarkson has most kindly consented to give a portion of his time to it. But his whole strength is called for at Belvidere and Knowlton. It is melancholy to see Churches built and people ready and anxious to occupy them; and no one to gather them to the Cross, and break to them the Bread, that cometh down from heaven. Two things are needful. More Ministers of Christ; and more of Christ's Spirit, in some, that are His Ministers. A larger salary, or better society, or, what is called, a wider field of usefulness; it must be added, an imagined bronchitis, or a caprice that cannot be defined, leave flocks untended, and bring reproach upon the Church. Since my address was written, I have learned with great pleasure that a parishioner of St. Luke's in whose private house my first service was held, and who has ever been a most zealous supporter of the Church, has given a Parsonage House to this Parish; on the condition that seven hundred dollars are raised towards an endowment for the support of the minister. From what I know of the people, this great benefit, I am sure will be made real.

In the evening, in St. Mark's Church, Orange, the Rev. Dr. Ogilby read prayers, and I preached, and confirmed seven persons. The Rector, the Rev. Mr. Williams, and the Rev. Messrs. Crane, (of the diocese of Tennessee,) and Flower (of the diocese of Alabama,) were present. The Rev. Mr. Crane was a candidate for orders, and afterwards a missionary of this diocese; one of the men whom God has granted to my prayers, of whom I have no need to be ashamed. Though long in a distant portion of the Master's field, in arduous and useful service, he has a Jersey heart; and Jersey hearts were glad to welcome him, on his late visit.

On Saturday, 16, in St. James' Church, Piscatawa, the Rev. Dr. Ogilby read evening prayers, and I preached. The Rev. Mr. Smith, the Minister was present. I am sorry to learn that this faithful man, long in feeble health, has been for some time quite withdrawn from the work, to which his life is given. He has found a good Samaritan, in his neighbouring brother of New Brunswick; in whose hospitable Parsonage he has had a home, and all that kindest love can do and furnish. Has the diocese discharged its duty towards its aged and disabled Clergy?

* Amongst the works which thus early enrich the library are a series of the large folio editions of the works of the Fathers, in fine preservation. Also, a valuable collection of rare classical works, richly bound, the gift of the munificent founder of the college, A. B. Hope, Esq. The late Mrs. Horne, of Gores-street, Maidstone, is also a costly contributor, a considerable portion of the valuable library of the late Bishop Horne and W. Stevens, Esq., having been transferred by this lady to the college shelves. J. H. Shirreff, Esq., M.D., of Blackheath, has presented an unique series of medical works, amounting in number to nearly one thousand volumes; many of them of large size and rare copies. Amongst the other contributors are Arch-deacon Berens, of Shrivensham, Berks; Mr. Leslie, of London; the Rev. H. H. Norris, of Hackney; Mr. Hildyard, the Rev. Mr. Hogg, of Brixham, Devon, &c. &c.

On Sunday, 31, (twenty-second after Trinity, in Grace Church Newark, the Rev. Messrs. Watson, the Rector, and Brown, (of the diocese of Florida,) read morning prayers, and I preached, confirmed seven persons and administered the Holy Communion. The Rev. Mr. Tyng was present. The noble structure, of which I reported the laying of the Corner Stone, in my last Address, is advancing rapidly to its completion. It is by far the finest building in the state. It will have no equal of its class, in all our land. The true spirit of the Church burns brightly here, and many feel its warmth.

In the afternoon, in the Chapel, at Elizabethport, I read prayers, and preached. It grieves me, that the interesting little flock, who have done their best to provide a temporary place of worship, and have succeeded so well, have, as yet, no Pastor. I cannot see why the neighbouring Clergy cannot arrange for their supply. Have they asked "Who is my neighbour?" Will they not meditate of the young man's answer, and apply it, "He that showed mercy unto him?"

In the evening, in St. John's Church, Elizabethtown, the Rector, the Rev. Mr. Moore, read prayers, and catechised the children, and I examined them, preached, and confirmed three persons. Since my last visit, the beloved name of Mary Goodin Hobart, the widow of my venerated father in the Church, whose splendid name grows brighter with the lapse of years, had been engraven on the mural tablet which commemorates her father, the admirable Doctor Chandler. The load of life, increasing as its remnant years grow less, lies with more weight upon us, as the elder hearts, on which we leaned, for counsel and for comfort, sink from beside us; and the world, which they have left, grows lonelier.

On Sunday, 14th October, (twenty-fourth after Trinity,) in St. Peter's Church, Perth Amboy, the Rev. Mr. Halsey, (of the diocese of Mississippi,) officiating in the absence of the Rector elect, read morning prayers, and catechised the children, and I examined them, preached, confirmed four persons, and administered the Holy Communion. The Rev. Mr. Leacock, as I learn is still absent; and, to increase the evil, the Rev. Mr. Halsey has been called to a parish in another diocese. I am without information as to the provision now made for the pastoral care. Unless the wolves have changed their nature, there is danger for the flock.

I have learned with great pleasure, since I came to the Convention, what the failure of a letter has prevented my knowing before, that St. Thomas' Church, Vernon, Sussex County, is ready for consecration; and the Rev. Dexter Potter, late of the diocese of Connecticut, secured as its Minister. This is mainly due to a family of this diocese, whose acts of beneficence I have more than once recorded. But so it will be. Grace grows by the use of it. They who have done most, are the same that will do more.

The services of the Northern Visitation, which was thus concluded, were less full than heretofore, from the fact that I was in attendance, during the greater part of it, at the General Convention, which held its triennial Session in the City of New York, during the month of October. By devoting Saturdays and Sundays to my diocesan duties, I was enabled to sustain the just responsibilities of both relations. Of the proceedings of the General Convention, as they have been long since spread before you, in the Journal of that body, there is no need that I should speak. Every day of my life strengthens the conviction that the more distinctly our action here is diocesan, the better for the unity and harmony of our federal Church: and that the duties, by which a Bishop is most effectually to serve the flock, which his divine Master purchased with His Blood, are those which He performs in his own diocese. If "one member suffer, all the members suffer with it." It is when every member is honoured, that all the members will rejoice.

On Ember Sunday, (second in Lent,) 19, in St. Mary's Church, Burlington, the Rev. Mr. Bradin read morning prayers, and I held a second confirmation; when thirteen persons were confirmed, making, with, one, in private, and eight confirmed in the Chapel of the Holy Innocents, as before reported, eighty-five in this parish.

The new St. Mary's Church is sufficiently advanced, to show its fine proportions, and majestic outline. Nothing that has been done in it, that has not been done for perpetuity. It will stand, while any human structure stands; a rock, upon "the Rock." The capacity of the old St. Mary's Church has been nearly doubled, by the erection of two galleries, to receive the families of St. Mary's Hall and Burlington College; now numbering, in rank and file, well nigh three hundred souls. When I look around upon their fair array, as it greets me, in our simple house of prayer, I feel that I can say, with Jacob, "O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac, the Lord which saidst unto me, Return unto thy country, and to thy kindred, and I will deal well with thee; I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which Thou hast shewed unto Thy servant; for, with my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands."

In the year now closed, I have consecrated one Church, ordained one Deacon, and two Priests, and instituted three Rectors. I have confirmed in thirty-two parishes, two hundred and seventy-four persons.

I have none to add to the list of Parsonage Houses, in the diocese, though one is well advanced for St. Peter's Church, Morristown; and a parishoner, of St. Luke's Church, Hope, as before stated, offers a house for a Parsonage, on the condition that $700 be secured as an endowment for the Minister.

Brethren, this is my sixteenth Convention. I have been your servant, now, almost as many years. At God's command, through you, unthought of and undreamed of by myself, I came to do your bidding. I left for you one of the oldest and most influential parishes of our communion, abundant duties, a competent provision, my bosom friends, my children's home. I came to an obscure and feeble diocese; one half of which, I was assured, by one your chief Presbyters, was dead, and could not be revived. But I have never for one moment doubted, that I did right; or regretted what I did. I have found the best and truest friends. A happy home has grown up, to my hand. I have been favored with as wide an influence, and with as large a confidence, as human heart could wish. And best of all, the work of God through His unbounded and unmerited benevolence, has prospered in my hands. The eighteen Clergymen of 1832, are sixty-one: the twenty-nine Churches, are now forty-nine.—Twenty-nine Churches have been built, and one third of that number have been well nigh re-built. Nine Parsonage Houses have been added. The revival and increase, thus noted, I ascribe, under God, to the influence, direct and indirect, of the undertaking for Christian Education, in which, I have, for eleven years, been engaged. And, under God, I rely, for the continuance of this revival, and the extension of this increase, on the prosperity of the two Institutions, now in successful operation, at Burlington. Burlington College is intended for the training up of Pastors. It is designed, also, as a central home, for Missionary Deacons. When, in a few years more, these purposes shall be fulfilled, the diocese will have no want of Clergy of a proper spirit. There are already there, five priests and six young men, preparing for the ministry. Ten years with God to bless us, will double, from that source alone, the present number of our Clergy. I ask your prayers, that God may bless the enterprise, that He may raise up for it, those who, in furnishing it with the endowments, which is all it needs, may find how true it is, which He hath said, "it is more blessed to give than to receive;" that He may continue to the dear children, in both houses, and to them who have the charge of them, abounding measures of His grace, "that our sons may grow up as the young plants, and our daughters, as the polished corners of the temple." Every year as it convinces me of the pre-eminent importance of Church-training, for the children of the Church, establishes in me more strongly the conviction, that we have here surpassing advantages for the work; and, in its faithful prosecution, transcendent means of usefulness and influence. Nearly three hundred children are gathered now at Burlington. They come from every quarter of the land. They meet as in a common home. They are knit together in the bonds of mutual love. They will disperse, with false impressions corrected, with prejudices removed, with attachments formed, with affections mutually won. The way to the parental heart is shortest through the child. Sectional differences, will, in this way, be diminished; local and personal partialities will be removed; the North will be drawn nearer to the South; the East will be conciliated to the West. In this way who can tell what permanence may be imparted to our civil institutions, what vigour infused into our great national interests, what harmony secured in our vast political relations? Especially when the Cross of our Lord Jesus Christ is made the central magnet of attraction; especially, when the Church of our Lord Jesus Christ is made the fold, for safety and protection. Give me your prayers, dear brethren, that I may have the strength and wisdom, which the trust reposed in me requires. Give me your prayers, that God's work, in my hands, may prosper and increase; to the good of many souls, and to the glory of His great and gracious name.

Beloved brethren, it is the feast of the Ascension. As on this day, the divine and holy Sufferer for our sins ascended to His glory. There, at His Father's throne, He pleads the bleeding burden of His Cross, as our prevailing Intercessor. What a thought to convince us of our sinfulness, that should require such a sacrifice for our atonement! What a thought, to assure us of the love, which such a sacrifice failed to exhaust! We have, repaired together, to the altar, which commemorates the Cross, We have poured our hearts out there, in prayer, and penitence and praise. We have renewed our vows of faith, and purposes of holiness. Shall not the Saviour's love be so enkindled in our hearts? Shall we not go, to do our Master's work, with minds chastised, and hearts subdued, to bear and do his will? So for the Saviour's sake, He will accept our service and ourselves. So, shall He send His Holy Ghost, "to comfort us, and exalt us to the same place, whither our Saviour Christ has gone before."

Newark, Ascension Day, 1848.

GEORGE W. DOANE.

Bishop

We have been requested by a friend, in whose judgment we have the highest confidence, to call attention to the advertisement of Mrs. A. Price and Sister's Boarding and Day School. The character of the Principals, we are assured, renders this school in all respects worthy of patronage.

Report.

In presenting to the Bishop White Prayer Book Society their Fifteenth Annual Report, the Board of Managers think that they will best discharge this duty by confining themselves to a simple statement of facts.

The facts to which the Board desire to call the attention of the Society, whose interests they are appointed to advance, are those which will serve to show the condition of this Society during the year which has now elapsed. It is our duty, not merely to consider the history of this year's transactions by itself, but to compare the present with the past, to determine whether we have been progressing or retrograding in the great work which has been given us to do. And such a view of the relative history of the Society taken in connection with the evidently increased demands upon our charity, from the growing wants and opportunities of the Church, will furnish grave matter for our consideration, and should afford exciting motives to stir those whose apathy and indifference have in part caused the result we deplore.

* Miss Rachel Bradford Wallace, late of Burlington, a lady of exemplary benevolence and devotion, has set the noble example: having bequeathed to the College two thousand dollars, for the support of such candidate, or candidates for orders, pursuing theological studies there, as the Bishop may designate. I find her excellent father the venerable Joshua Maddox Wallace in the Convention of 1793; (the ninth) and seldom absent through a period of nearly thirty years; during which, he was commonly on the Standing Committee, and in other chief offices of trust and care. Such fathers have promise of such children.

The annual reports which have been presented to this Society in past years, have ably advocated its claims to the general sympathy of the Church. These reports will be found to embody a great amount of important information concerning the Prayer Book. Arguments, full and abundant, are here presented to give strength and force to our conviction of the benefits which are to result from the distribution of this book in which will be found the wisest and safest guidance to the faithful discharge of the first and highest duty of religion, the worship of the one living and true God. In the earlier stages of this Society's existence, and at a time when, even in our own Church, the high and holy influence of the Book of Common Prayer, was not sufficiently felt or acknowledged, it seemed necessary that the Board of Managers should impress this great practical truth by just arguments, in their annual reports. And we are convinced that a careful examination of these reports will show an irresistible array of facts and arguments by which our noble Liturgy is not only most triumphantly vindicated from the objections of ignorance or prejudice, but in which its claims to more general reception are most conclusively proved.

The Board are also happy to think that the day has gone by when any illiberal prejudice can have place in the minds of the members of the Church against a Society whose sole object is to distribute a scriptural and primitive Form, which teaches men to worship God "in spirit and in truth." The Book of Common Prayer can never be made the badge of a party in the Church. Its use is common to all, not only as a blessing and a privilege, but as an imperative obligation. This Society, therefore, affords common ground on which all the members of our "one Catholic and Apostolic Church," may and should meet in harmony of feeling, in unity of purpose and of action. And thus meeting here, and learning that there are great occasions when those who differ in theory may unite in the holy and blessed exercise of charity, we may be taught the important lesson, that though we may not be all of "one mind," we should be all of one heart, since we must all unite in owning the authority of those Forms which require us with one voice to worship the one only God, "with one heart," to desire the prosperity of the holy Apostolic Church, and "with one mouth to profess the Faith once delivered to the Saints."

Under these circumstances, the Board feel convinced that their present duty will be fully discharged by presenting to the Society such a statement of facts as may exhibit not only what we are doing, but what we are not doing. The account of what we have done during the present year compared with the history of past years, will serve to show how little we have done, and how much we have left undone.

The appropriations for this year are as follows:

Maine, - - - -	100	Georgia, - - - -	50
New Hampshire, - - -	50	Alabama, - - - -	275
Massachusetts, - - -	225	Mississippi, - - -	50

In connection with this, we would present to the Society the appropriations for the last seven years.

The following table exhibits the annual distribution for the seven years last past:—

	Copies distributed.
May, 1841, to May, 1842, - -	5,778
" 1842, " 1843, - -	5,395

" 1846, " 1847, - -	6,366
" 1847, " 1848, - -	4,755

Total distributed in seven years, - 37,098

From these facts it will be seen that while the wants of the Church are increasing, and the demands for Prayer Books are more frequent, our distribution is decreasing.

The cause of this diminution in our beneficent operations will be found in the following statement of the receipts for the past year.

The receipts during the past year have been $1097.25.

From Pennsylvania, $837.54; Maine, $10; New York, $25; New Jersey, $128.21; Delaware, $10; Virginia, $3.50; South Carolina, $50; Georgia, $10; Alabama, $20; Wisconsin, $3.

From collections in churches, -	$663 80
Donations from associations, -	63 50
Donations from individuals, -	288 00
Sales of books, - - - -	31 95
Southern Agent, - - - -	50 00

$1097 25

The expenditures of the year have been -	$1169 62
The present balance in the treasury, -	30 41
The present indebtedness of the Society, -	339 30

With this we would beg the Society to compare the annual income during each year, since our first organization, furnished by the treasurer.

Statement showing the annual income of the Society from its organization to the present time:

Receipts from May 1834 to May 1835,	-	-	$967 48
" 1835 "	1836,	-	1228 82
" 1836 "	1837,	-	903 49

" 1846 "	1847,	-	1171 95†
" 1847 "	1848,	-	1097 25

From which it will appear that the average income of this Society, since its formation, has been $1125.04, while the income of last year was only $1097.25. It is also the smallest sum received in any year, with the exception of four.

The Board of Managers feel that their duty will not be discharged by vainly deploring a result so injurious to the high and holy interests which this association is designed to promote. They consider it their office to point out the cause of the evil, and if possible, to suggest the remedy. While this evil results in part from the general deficiency among our members of an enlarged and liberal spirit of active beneficence, there is a particular cause which it becomes our duty to regard.

The particular cause of the effect deplored, to which the Board would now call the attention of the Society, is this.—

While the appropriations of the Society are general, its support is almost entirely from very few sources. This evil will be found to have been a growing one. So that as the demands upon our charity have been more general, the sources whence our means are derived have become more restricted. While our aid is refused to no Diocese within the Church, very few Dioceses have given us any continued help. This Society is often considered as a mere local or diocesan Institution; and, consequently the Diocese, which is thought to be the sole recipient of its benefits is left to bear the chief burden of its support. Whereas, it may be shown, from facts, that this Society is Catholic in its object as well as its name. Bishop White was indeed the Diocesan of Pennsylvania, and lived in Philadelphia: but what American Churchman would allow, that the interest which attaches to his venerable name, is confined to these narrow limits? Who, in the wide spreading borders of the Church, does not feel that it is his right and privilege to have a portion in all that bears this goodly name? And, with a view to secure this general interest, the founders of this Society gave it a name which they judged would appeal to the warmest sympathies of the Church at large; and, at the same time express its noble object, which is, to benefit the whole Church, guided only by a desire to supply those parts whose need was greatest: therefore, they called it THE BISHOP WHITE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY.

That this enlarged and noble object has been faithfully carried out by the Managers of this Society, may be seen from the following statement—

During the fourteen years of its existence, "The Bishop White Prayer Book Society" has distributed Prayer Books to the following dioceses and objects.

Appropriations of Prayer Books from 1834 to 1847, inclusive:

That the sources whence its means have been derived are not in any degree proportioned to the objects of its bounty, becomes evident from the following list of the contributions made since the beginning of the Society:

Pennsylvania,	-	$14,779 36	Amount brought forward,	-	-	$16,611 05

* Exclusive of $400 scrip, of St. Luke's church, donation of John Grigg, Esq.

† Exclusive of $600, St. Luke's scrip, donation from John Grigg, Esq.

‡ This amount differs from that given by the Treasurer, be-

From which it will appear that while Pennsylvania has not received one-half of the benefits, this diocese has contributed seven-eighths of the means. While thirty-one states, and various other objects, have received the benefits of our Society, only twenty dioceses have given us very limited contributions each. Out of the $17,681.38, Pennsylvania has contributed $14,779.36, and New Jersey, $914.57.

The only remedy for the evil complained of, which the Board can propose, is suggested by these facts. While we earnestly implore the churchmen of Pennsylvania to do their part with a freer spirit and a more liberal hand, some measures should be adopted to secure more general contributions from the Church at large for a Society which is catholic in its name, and catholic in its objects.

Without other appeal, though we have strong ground for an urgent one; without other arguments though we might adduce many forcible ones; the Board are content to let the facts speak for themselves. They will declare how much this Society has done for the best interests of man, without reference to locality; and how little has been done for it, in return, except in the immediate vicinity. If none can tell the history of a single Prayer Book, who can declare the amount of good which must have resulted from the thousands of this precious volume, distributed by this noble Christian charity? If an object, and a name, which appeal to the warmest sympathies of the Church, could secure the liberal and free-hearted support of the Church, then we may safely conclude that she has no subordinate Institution more worthy of the regard of her members, than "the Bishop White Prayer Book Society."

Diocesan Intelligence.

Missouri.—On the 30th of June Bishop Hawks laid the corner-stone of Christ Church, Lexington. The Rev. Mr. Corbryn, of Boonville, and the Rev. Mr. Harrison, the Rector at Lexington, were present and took part in the services. It is the farthest Church edifice thus far commenced in the West in this country, and commenced too under the most promising circumstances. On the Sunday morning following, (July 2d,) the Bishop gathered around him at the altar 29 communicants, and in the afternoon administered the rite of confirmation to three persons. This is well for a beginning.

Maryland.—CONFIRMATIONS, &c.—On the third Sunday after Trinity, July 9th, in St. Luke's Church, Church Hill, after the sermon by the Bishop, four persons were confirmed. The Holy Communion was administered by the Bishop.

In the afternoon, the Bishop preached again. At night, in Chester Parish Church, Chestertown, after a sermon preached by the Bishop, one person was confirmed.

On Monday, the 10th, in St. Paul's Parish Church, Centerville, the Bishop preached, confirmed four persons, and administered the Lord's Supper, assisted by the Rector. At night, the Bishop preached again.

North Carolina.—From the Journal of the Twenty-second Annual Convention, we gather the following facts:

Number of Clergy, 38. Four new Parishes were admitted into union with the Convention. The Missionary Fund of the Diocese for the past year, amounted to $2690 14. Balance on hand $1710 04. The Committee on the State of the Church presented a most interesting report, embracing the following statistics—Baptisms, excess over the number reported last year, 268. Communicants, 64 more than reported last year, Confirmed, 128. The reason of so small a number—as the Committee state—is "that the Divine Head of the Church has seen fit to deprive her of the services of her Bishop, by his illness. The Committee desire to express their sympathy with him in this visitation of Providence, and trust that the prayers of the members of this Convention, and of the whole Church in the Diocese, are united with theirs for a blessing on the means used for the restoration of his health and strength, and that he may be able soon to resume those services which the Church so much needs."

The Committee dwell on the importance of greater attention to the subject of Christian Education.

New Hampshire.—JOURNAL OF CONVENTION.—From this Document, we learn that the number of the Clergy is eight. Secretary of Convention, N. B. Baker, Esq., Concord. Standing Committee, Rev. Drs. Burroughs and Sprague, Rev. H. S. Smith, and Messrs. M. Harvey and Bingham. Delegates to General Convention, Rev. Drs. Burroughs and Sprague, Rev. Messrs. H. S. Smith and N. E. Marble, Messrs. J. W. Pierce, C. W. Workman, D. Davis, and M. Harvey.

Connecticut.—EPISCOPAL ACTS.—On Sunday, the 9th inst., in St. John's Church, in this city, the Rt. Rev. Bishop Brownell admitted to the Holy Order of Deacons, Mr. Robert C. Rogers, of Hudson, N. Y. Mr. Rogers is an alumnus of Trinity College, and a graduate of the General Theological Seminary, New York.

On Sunday last, (16th inst.,) the Rt. Rev. Bishop Brownell visited the parish of Broad Brook, and confirmed four persons.—Calendar.

Illinois.—The new Episcopal Church in this city, Springfield, was yesterday consecrated to the worship and service of Almighty God, by the venerable Bishop Chase. He, with the attendant clergy, were met at the entrance of the Church, by a deputation of the vestry. From thence, they proceeded towards the Church, repeating responsively, the 24th Psalm. The consecrative service having been performed by the Bishop, Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Safford of Rock Island, assisted in the Litany by Mr. Dresser; and an appropriate ser-cause it includes extraordinary donations, whereas his report only gives the regular annual income from ordinary contributions.

mon delivered by Rev. Mr. Worthington of Jacksonville. This was blessed by the impressive and affecting rite of confirmation, which was administered to six persons. The administration of the Lord's Supper concluded the services of the morning, the interest of which was not a little increased by the use of a new organ from the manufactory of Mr. Schwab, of Cincinnati. This instrument, which was received on Thursday night, and hence, but imperfectly tuned, is thought to promise well. In external appearance it corresponds admirably with the building which contains it—which is of stone, with tower, buttresses and battlements,—and though not in all respects conformed to the early English style, yet it is probably one of the best specimens of Gothic architecture this side of the mountains. And having been designed by a western architect, as well as executed by our own workmen, and with funds collected mostly on the spot, it may be considered highly creditable to all who have been engaged in its erection and decoration.—Illinois Daily Journal.

Virginia.—THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY OF VIRGINIA.—The annual examination of this institution was held on Tuesday and Wednesday of last week, and the exercises closed on Thursday by an address from Professor Packard and the delivery of Diplomas to the graduating class,—10 in number.

During this time the meetings of the Alumni Society and of the Education Society were held, the proceedings of which, will, we presume, be furnished to us by the Secretaries. The sermon was preached before the Alumni by Bishop Johns, an honorary member of the Society, from Colossians ch. i. 28th and 29th verses.

The address of Professor Packard was an able and interesting one, exhibiting the importance of Theological training for candidates suitable to the demands of the age, and among other points affording some valuable and discriminating views of German Theology.

On Friday morning an ordination was held by the Bishop of the Diocese, in Christ Church, Alexandria, on which occasion the sermon was delivered by the Rev. Henry Johns, D.D., from Acts ch. xx. v. 20. The following gentlemen of the graduating class of the Theological Seminary were admitted to Deacon's orders:—Messrs. Charles W. Quick, George Hall, Charles E. Ambler, R. P. Johnson, Samuel R. Slack, J. Howard Smith.

Messrs. F. S. Wiley, Archibald Beatty, C. Colden Hoffman and Jacob Rambo the other members of the class, are candidates for orders in Pennsylvania, and will be ordained in that Diocese.—Southern Church.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. William Adams, being about to remain for some time at the East, requests all letters and papers for him to be sent to the charge of Stanford and Swords, 139 Broadway, until further notice.

The Rev. R. E. Parham has resigned the Rectorship of Calvary Church, Wadesboro', N. C., and has taken charge of an Academy in Lumberton, N. C., and desires letters and papers addressed accordingly.

Profane Swearing.

"To swear—is neither brave, polite nor wise;
You would not swear upon the bed of death—
Reflect—your Maker now could stop your breath!"

Brother S— and myself were entertained, during the Convention week, at the house of a medical gentleman, eminent in his profession, but addicted, it was said, to profanity in ordinary conversation. Without a premonition, no suspicion of so blame-worthy a practice could have arisen in our minds—for no real Christian ever showed guests greater courtesy, or seemed further from profaneness than our gentlemanly host. He did not even annoy us with lady like mincing, putting forth the bud-dings of profanity in "la me!"—"good gracious!" and the like.

But on Sunday night, our conversation taking a religious turn, and the subject of profane swearing was accidentally named, when I could not resist the temptation of drawing a bow at a venture, and so I said:

"Doctor, we leave you to morrow; and be assured we are very grateful to Mrs. D—and yourself; but may I say, dear sir, we have been disappointed here?"

"Disappointed!"

"Yes, but most agreeably—"

"In what way, Mr. C—?"

"Will you pardon me, if I say we were misinformed, and may I name it?"

"Yes sir, say what you wish."

"Well, my dear sir, we were told that Dr. D— was not guarded in his language—but surely you are misrepresented."

"Sir," interrupted he, "I do honor you for your candor—yet sir, I regret to say, you have not been misinformed. I do, and perhaps habitually use profane language; but sir, can you think I would swear before religious people, and one of them a clergyman?"

Tears stood in my eyes, (the frank-heartedness of a gentleman always starts them,) as I took his hand and replied:

"My dear sir you amaze us. Can it be that Dr. D—, so courteous and so intelligent a man, has greater reverence for us than God who made him."—West Jerseyman.

REV. FREDERICK OGILBY, EDITOR.

PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, AUGUST 5, 1848.

[Vol. X.—No. 31.—Whole No. 501.]

can argue more for peace, than they can for their opinions. hath faith enough to save himself, and charity enough to believe that others may be saved that are not in all points just of his belief. His compassion is equal to his understanding; his meekness equal to his zeal; his faith is matched with charity; his love to his neighbour is proportionable to his love to God; and his humility and modesty is equal to them all. He seems to me to be a piece of the wrecks of ancient Christianity; a relic of the golden age; one of the genuine children of antiquity. He hath escaped the contagion of this evil age, without flying from it; and he is master of more strength, than custom is of force and violence. The general corruption which hath overspread us, hath not been able to prevail over the purity of his temper. And all the wickedness which could not but touch him, hath not yet had the power to defile or sully him. If those worthies, in whose veins the blood of Christ did run, could return to visit the world again I make no doubt but they would discern in him such marks of their virtue, that they would confess him for one of their race, and embrace him as an inheritor, not only of their name, but of their noble qualities. If you would know any more of him, you had better learn it from himself than from me; only this I can assure you, that by his guidance there are many men who have made a very happy progress towards heaven. And if you fear, that when you go unto him, you may lose your labour, and not find him, or that you may find him little at leisure, I can give you this further assurance, that being a man of peace, he sits at little from home, and hath but little company neither that requents his house.

"Kenrick on the Primacy."

(Concluded.)

Making allowance for the "many days" (Acts ix, 23) spent at Damascus, and not including them in the "three years" after which St. Paul "went up to Jerusalem to see Peter," (Gal. i, 18,) he must have arrived there in the course of the year 32; and exactly at that juncture in which the Emperor Tiberius, convinced of the innocence of the Roman Jews, had released them from the effects of the calumnies of Sejanus, and restored them to the rights of Roman citizens. Till that time no Church could have existed at Rome; and now therefore, occurred, as we conceive, that important transaction, so incidentally referred to by Epiphanius, in which St. Peter and St. Paul united with St. James, the Bishop of Jerusalem, in conferring the Episcopal succession. Hence we date from this visit of St. Paul to St. Peter, the foundation in the metropolis of the Empire, of a regular Christian Church. That St. Paul had the honor of it equally with St. Peter, we have the clear and consistent testimony of antiquity, and that St. James, the Bishop of Jerusalem, had also a share in it, must be inferred from the language of Epiphanius, himself an eastern Bishop of the fourth century, not very remote from Judea. His testimony, we have remarked, is incidental. It is, therefore, the stronger, because it cannot be suspected of design. He is speaking, in his seventy-eighth heresy, of the perpetual virginity of our Lord's mother; and in accounting for the fact that the Evangelists mention the brethren and sisters of our Saviour, he says, that the first wife of Joseph was of the tribe of Judah, and that by her he had six children, four sons and two daughters. Of these, James, surnamed the Just, was the eldest. "He first received the chair of the Episcopate, and to him first the Lord confided his throne upon earth." He is also called the Lord's brother; which accords with what the Apostle somewhere says: But other of the Apostles saw I none except James the Lord's brother, &c." Then after accounting for his being so called, Epiphanius proceeds to say, that James was born when Joseph was about forty; that after him came Josias, Symeon, Judas or Jude, and the two daughters, Mary and Salome; that after the death of his mother, many years elapsed before Joseph, at the age of eighty espoused the virgin; so that James was more than forty years old when our Lord was born; and that Joseph probably died soon after the twelfth year of Jesus, when he was taken up to Jerusalem, because, after that event, no further mention is made of Joseph, but only of the mother of Jesus and his brethren. All this and much more, which it would be irrelevant to our present object to mention, is said by Epiphanius before he again speaks of the personal history of James. He then proceeds thus: "Only to this James was it permitted to enter once a year into the Holy of Holies, because he was a Nazarene and was mingled with the Priesthood."

James also added to the honor of the Priesthood; since the only two tribes which were interchangeably united in marriage, were the royal and sacerdotal. "This James also bore upon his head the petal;" (or plate of gold worn by the High Priest, with the words "Holiness to the Lord" inscribed upon it;) "and once when there was a great drought, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and prayed, and immediately the heaven gave forth rain. He never wore a woollen garment; and his knees became as hard as camel's from his always bending them before the Lord, on account of his exceeding piety; whence he was never called by any other name than that of the Just (or righteous) one." After mentioning his austere life, his virginity, and his martyr-

General Epiphanius turns his discourse to the blessed Virgin, guards them at the worship of saints and martyrs, and though doubtful whether she died in peace or was martyred, cautions his readers against the Collyridians, who worshiped the Virgin because he suspects that they are idolaters. Mary is not God, nor was she miraculously conceived, nor proceeded to consider the seventy-ninth heresy of the thing, idians; and after enumerating the twelve Apostles, including St. James, as exercising the sacerdotal functions of the gospel on earth he adds; "With Paul and Barnabas, and the Lord's brother, the first Bishop of Jerusalem; from which Bishop and venerable Apostles were constituted the succession of Bishops and Presbyters in the house of God; ἐξ οὗτος Ἐπισκοπὸν προειρημένον Ἀποστόλων, κατεστήσαν διδοχαὶ Ἐπισκοπῶν, οὐκ ἄλλων ἐν οἴκῳ Θεοῦ." He then proceeds to show that Bebian was so constituted by them; that Anna and the and veers of Philip, though prophetesses, were not entrusted with the Priesthood; that there were Deaconesses indeed, but no hateful heresses, for even Deacons in the ecclesiastical order were Ministers of those who celebrated the mysteries; and he concluded that it was neither proper for women to offer a sacrifice to the Virgin, nor for her to be worshipped as ere God: καὶ μὴ ἄνθρωπον τὸ σῶμα τῆς Μαρίας οὐ μὴν Θεός.

The same incidental manner occurs his testimony with the Roman Succession in particular. Thus in the forty-first heresy, he says: "This Cerdo (or Cerdon) was born in the succession from James, Peter and Paul, and the other Apostles: τὸν ἐνα (Petavius reads, ἐνατον) τὸν κληρὸν ἀγοντος ἀπὸ τῆς τῶν περὶ Ἰακώβου καὶ Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου Ἀποστόλων διαδοχῆς. The very construction of the sentence, as all Greek scholars know shows that Hyginus, in deriving his succession from James and Peter and Paul, derived it from all the Apostles, as holding authority in episcopacy from Christ. In the forty-second heresy, Epiphanius says that Marcion came to Rome after the death of Hyginus the Bishop of Rome, who was the ninth from the Apostles Peter and Paul. By St. Irenæus, Hyginus is counted the eighth Bishop; but there is no discrepancy in the testimony; for he began with Linus, and Epiphanius with James, Peter and Paul.

We have now a solution of the whole difficulty with regard to the Roman succession; proceeding entirely from the adjustment of the true year of the crucifixion. All the authorities we have laid before our readers, have been long known; and the facts they assert are incontrovertible. But so long as the date of our Lord's passion and resurrection were supposed to be unknown, the several facts could not be brought to shed light upon one another. The banishment of the Roman Jews could not appear to have any connection with the first foundation of the Roman Church, so long as it was supposed to have terminated before our Lord was crucified. But now it appears, that they were actually forbidden to return to Rome at the very time of the crucifixion, and that they could not have been allowed to return thither till the very year in which St. Paul went up to Jerusalem to see St. Peter, and when he saw only him and St. James, the Lord's brother, who was Bishop of Jerusalem. The presumption then is, and it is a most powerful presumption, because it reconciles and renders harmonious all the testimony of antiquity, that St. James, St. Peter and St. Paul did then and there consecrate Linus as the first Bishop of the Roman Christians. Thus the Christian exiles went back to Rome as a completely organized Church; and were truly founded by St. Peter and St. Paul, though neither of those Apostles had yet been there, any more than St. James, who never left his province of Jerusalem.

If half the testimony which the ancients give to St. James, had been given to St. Peter, we should have never heard the last of it. If St. Peter and not St. James had been our Lord's brother, a scion of the royal stock of David, and related by blood to the family of Aaron; if it had been said of him, that "he first received the chair of the Episcopate," and that "to him first the Lord confided his throne upon earth;" if that throne had been established, not in Jerusalem, but in Rome, the imperial city; the glorious testimony of Epiphanius, would have been trumpeted to the world's end. But alas! it was St. James and not St. Peter; and he is named first in the consecration of Linus, and spoke last in the Council of Jerusalem. "There was no pride in the Church," exclaims St. Chrysostom, "but great was its good order. Behold after Peter, Paul speaks and no one interrupts him. James waits patiently and does not leap upon his feet; for he it was to whom the government was confided. John says nothing. The other Apostles speak nothing; but are silent, yet not moved with indignation; [alluding here to St. Matthew xx, 24.] Thus pure was their soul from vain glory. After they had held their peace," it is said, "James answered saying—Simeon hath declared, &c." Peter spake at the beginning more vehemently; James more mildly. Thus it always becomes him to do who is in great authority; to leave the more burdensome things to others, while he himself utters the language of moderation." (St. J. Chrys. Op. ed. Montf. Tom. ix, p. 255.) St. Chrysostom had just before observed (p. 253,) that St. James was Bishop of the Church in Jerusalem, and therefore spoke last.

That Council was held in the seventh year of Claudius, or A. D. 46, (Gal. ii, 1); and four years after, in the eleventh of Claudius, St. Paul arrived for the first time at Corinth, in the summer of A. D. 50. In that year the controversy concerning the Mosaic law had occasioned such tumults at Rome, that the Jewish Christians, equally with the unbelievers, were banished by the Emperor. Linus of course was banished with the rest, and was, therefore, sent upon some other mission. At the time of the council it had been agreed upon that St. Peter with St. James and St. John should confine their ministrations chiefly to the Jews; while St. Paul and St. Barnabas should go to the heathen. Accordingly St. Peter went to Antioch, and there, for a time, ate with the Gentiles; but when certain persons came from St. James of Jerusalem, who were zealous for the law, they induced St. Peter and St. Barnabas to separate from the Gentile Christians. This occasioned the public and severe rebuke of St. Peter, given by St. Paul, which if he were Primate he seems to have received with great meekness. (Gal. ii, 7—16.) After this time he appears to have travelled among the Jews of the dispersion in the upper coasts of Asia Minor. Many of these may have been the Jewish Christians of Rome, then in exile. "The strangers (παρεπίδημοι διαπορίαις) scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia," (1 Pet. i, 1,) were sojourning Jews. It is a cognate expression to the ἐπιδημοῦντες in Acts ii, 10, and properly means, as Schleusner well observes, not strangers, but foreigners dwelling for some time in a place.

St. Paul in the meanwhile, having parted from Barnabas and taken Silas with him, and having passed through Syria and Cilicia, and thence into Lycaonia, Phrygia and Galatia, was restrained by the Holy Ghost from going into Asia and Bithynia, probably because those provinces were then included in the mission of St. Peter, and perhaps of Linus. (Acts xv, 40,—xvi, 7.) He therefore went by divine direction into Macedonia, with Silas and Timotheus, and thence, leaving them at Berea, passed through Athens to Corinth. (Acts xvi, 9,—xviii, 1.) The Latin catalogues assert that Anacleus, the second Bishop of Rome, was a Gentile, and a native of Athens. If so he may have been one of St. Paul's earliest converts in that city, and may have been sent by him to Rome some years after. But as we know nothing of him except his name, we presume not to offer conjectures, which are mere inventions, disguised under the garb of history. We therefore proceed to glean from the Acts, compared with St. Paul's own writings, the dates of his Epistles to the Corinthians and Romans.

The Apostle must have left Corinth in the spring of A. D. 52. He therefore merely touched at Ephesus, that he might keep the Passover at Jerusalem; that feast falling on the first of April, in that year. (Acts xviii, 1—23.) During this time Apollos came to Ephesus, where he was instructed by Aquila and Priscilla, and was finally sent to Corinth. (Acts xviii, 24—28.) While Apollos was at Corinth, St. Paul returned to Ephesus; and after preaching three months in the Synagogue, continued two years more to teach in the school of Tyrannus. (Acts xix, 1—20.) As we believe with Macknight, that he wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians a little while before the riot of Demetrius, we place the date of that Epistle about the time of the Passover, or April 17, A. D. 56, in the third year of Nero. Let the reader now look back to the testimony of Dionysius, Bishop of Corinth, and he will see that St. Peter must have been at Corinth after St. Paul left it and even after Apollos had been there; that is within the last three years before the Epistle was written, or from the first to the third year of Nero. Of this, as we have already observed, there is not the least mention in the Acts; but it must be inferred from St. Paul's incidental mention of him, 1 Cor. i, 12, and ix, 5. The testimony of Dionysius is conclusive as to the fact that St. Peter as well as St. Paul, planted the Church at Corinth.

The riot of Demetrius caused St. Paul to leave Ephesus earlier than he had intended, or before Pentecost, (1 Cor. xvi, 8,) which fell that year in June. By his own account, he went into Macedonia, whence he wrote his second Epistle to prepare the Corinthians for his coming. He then went over all those parts, (Acts xx, 2,) that is Macedonia and Thracia, and even extended his preaching into Illyricum, (Rom. xv, 19,) before "he came into Greece." One purpose of his visit in Greece was to receive the collections made for the poor and suffering Christians in Judea. (2 Cor. ix, 3—5,) which as he afterwards told the Romans, (Rom. xv, 25,) he was about to carry himself to Jerusalem. There can be no doubt then that he must have written the Epistle to the Romans from Corinth during the winter of A. D. 56—57, in the third or fourth month of the fourth year of the Emperor Nero. From an expression of St. Paul in Acts xix, 21, we infer that a little before the riot of Demetrius, that is, early in A. D. 56, the Roman Jews had returned from their banishment; for he says that after visiting Macedonia and Achaia, and going with the amount of their offertory to Jerusalem, he "must also see Rome." This neither he nor St. Peter could have done as long as his nation were in the banishment imposed by Claudius; and after the death of that Emperor, some time must have elapsed before they could return. But the Epistle to the Roman Church being written in the early part of the fourth year of Nero, and the faith of its members being then spoken of throughout the whole world, (Rom. i, 8,) we may conclude that their conduct during their exile, and their recent restoration, had thus made them the subject of general attention and remark. The very absence of all Apostolical authority must have made St. Paul the more anxious to go to Rome, that he might "impart unto" them "some spiritual gift, to the end" they might "be established." (Rom. i, 11.) Certain it is, that neither St. Peter, nor Linus, nor Anencletus, are mentioned in the salutations to the Roman Christians at the close of the Epistle. The inference seems almost necessary that they were not in Rome in the winter of A. D. 56-57; and hence the Apostle was the more solicitous to be in Rome himself. For the banishment of Roman Jews had grown out of the contentions respecting the law of Moses, and the necessity of its observance by the Gentiles. The very object of the Epistle then, was to settle the minds, both of the Jewish and Gentile members of the Roman Church, on this great subject, and prevent the recurrence of those feuds which had occasioned so great a calamity. Owing to the circumstances detailed in the last eight chapters of the Acts, St. Paul did not arrive in Rome earlier than May or June, A. D. 60. This may easily be computed. The arrest of St. Paul at Jerusalem, probably took place during the Feast of Tabernacles; for we think he could scarcely have arrived by Pentecost, which he intended to do, "if possible." (Acts xx, 16.) But whether he did or not, the various events recorded, and the two years spent in prison at Cæsarea, occupy the whole period till the winter of A. D. 59-60. His passage recorded in the twenty-seventh chapter of the Acts was in the winter, and he spent more than three months in Malta. At Rome he "dwelt two whole years in his own hired house" before his cause was tried, and he was acquitted by the Emperor; and this brings us to the year 62, which, until October 14th, was the ninth year of Nero. During all this time not a word is said by St. Luke concerning St. Peter; and hence we are forced to infer that his arrival in Rome was after the period to which St. Luke limited his history.

St. Paul, then, and Timothy also, (Heb. xiii, 23,) were finally liberated in the ninth year of Nero; and from some part of Italy, where they both were, he wrote his Epistle to the Hebrews. After this, it is supposed that he accomplished the design which he had spoken of to the Romans of going into Spain; and having there planted the gospel, he visited Crete, where he constituted Titus the Bishop of the first See, and left to him the work of evangelizing the whole Island. His last visit to the Church of Corinth must have taken place at this time; and here he must have been joined by St. Peter, who according to the testimony of Dionysius, accompanied him into Italy—both these eminent Apostles harmoniously preaching together the one Gospel of Jesus Christ.

In the tenth year of Nero, as we have already said, happened the conflagration of Rome, which led to the first general persecution of the Christians. St. Paul was therefore absent, and St. Peter had not yet arrived. Anencletus, who may have been sent to Rome as the Bishop of that See after the Epistle to the Romans was written, A. D. 57, may also have been among the first victims of Nero's atrocity in the eleventh year of his reign, A. D. 64. The Liber Pontificalis makes the length of his Episcopate six years, two months, and seven days. We lay no stress upon these dates, for the Latin Catalogues are very discordant; but our readers must see that we are fully borne out even in our very conjectures.

On the arrival of St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome, both were apprehended and put in prison. During this confinement, and with the prospect of death before their eyes, the last memorials of their unshaken faith and love flowed from their pens. "I think it meet," says St. Peter in his second Epistle, "as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance; knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath showed me." (2 Pet. i, 13, 14.) "I am now ready to be offered," says St. Paul to Timothy, "and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." (2 Tim. iv, 6, 7.) In the same Epistle, he sends the salutation of Linus, which shows that the latter was then living and at Rome; probably in the same prison, and ready to seal his testimony with his blood. After the crown of martyrdom bestowed on the first two Bishops of Rome, Clemens was raised to that dignity by St. Peter, doubtless with the approbation, if not the presence and assistance of St. Paul.—The Catalogues are nearly unanimous in giving to his Episcopate nine years, two months, and ten or twelve days; and this brings the Roman succession down from the Consulship of Pontius Capito and Rufus to that of Vespasian VII, and Titus V, or from A. D. 66 to A. D. 75. The whole difficulty of the Roman succession has sprung from the disturbance occasioned by the attempt to make St. Peter resident at Rome as the Bishop of that See.

We observed, at the outset, that Dr. Kenrick's argument is wholly a priori. He assumes what we have attempted to disprove. If we are right, and that we leave for our readers to judge, his whole argument falls of course. Any one who will carefully examine his allegations and trace out his authorities, will see that he presumes upon the ignorance and prejudices of the persons for whom he writes. He has either taken his quotations at second hand, and is therefore superficial; or he has suppressed the truth, and is therefore dishonest. We are content to leave him upon either horn of this dilemma; but for the sake of our readers we will resume the subject in another number, in order to show that the Primacy of Rome was founded neither upon the Scriptures, nor upon the testimony of the Church down to the first half of the fifth century. The argument from the Scriptures is of much later growth.—Like all other sects who depart from Catholic truth and order, they of the Papal Communion have ingeniously perverted the meaning of the Bible, and by false interpretations have made it speak a language conformable to their wishes. Such has been especially their interpretation of "Thou art Peter," and "Feed my Sheep." Dr. Barrow has long ago exposed the futility of their inferences from these famous texts, by showing the sense in which they were understood by the Catholic Bishops and Presbyters, so late as the fourth and fifth centuries. Let our readers carefully study his immortal work on the Papal Supremacy, and then they may safely read the specious volume of Dr. Kenrick. For our clergy we would recommend a still more untrammelled and loftier method. We would entreat them to go back to the sources from which Barrow himself drew, the venerable writers of the ancient Church. Study them as he and the men of his age did, and they will see with their own eyes how to distinguish Catholic truth from Roman error.

The Dying Robber.

AN OCCURRENCE IN IRELAND.

From the Churchman's Monthly Penny Magazine.

During the awful visitation of the cholera, a clergyman of the Church of England, after a day spent in visiting many a sick and dying person, had retired early, fatigued and exhausted to his bed, hoping to enjoy for a few hours the repose he much needed. He lay for some time but he could not. The scenes he had witnessed that day, the countenances dying, some racked with agonising pain, and some in death-like torpor of the collapsed state, seemed still before him, and a nervous feverishness from this excitement, banished from his eyelids. "Oh!" thought he, "that men would that they understood this, that they would consider the end!" "Blessed is the people that know the joyful side of the gospel; they will walk, O Lord, in the light of the tenet; and when they pass through the valley of the shadow of death, they will fear no evil, for thou art with them; and thy staff they comfort them;" and he shuddered at the fearful contrast which that day had presented to him, in of too many. The clock struck twelve, and he had just into a slumber, when a knock at the hall door aroused him. He opened, and in a few minutes his servant entered. "Sir, there is a man below who says he must speak with you." "Ask him his name and business." "Sir, he must speak to yourself." Mr. T— rose, himself in haste, and, taking the candle left by his descending into the hall. The man stood close to Mr. T— approached, and held the light to his face, seemed rather anxious to conceal. The countenance beheld was appalling; dark and thick mustachios covered upper lip; the beard was long and neglected; the eyes crime, and reckless of its consequences. "What do you want with me?" said the clergyman. "I want you to come to a dying man, who wishes to speak with you." "What is his complaint?" "Cholera." Mr. T— hesitated; and at length said, "I cannot go with you; you do not even tell me your name, nor the place to which you would lead me; I fear to trust my life in your hands."

"You need not fear," said the stranger; "what end would it serve to take your life? Come with me, take no money, and, on my honour, you are safe." Mr. T— gave another glance at the man, and the word honour, connected with the appearance of such a being, made him smile. "Sit down," said he; "I will go with you." He went again to his chamber, committed himself to the care of his Heavenly Father, prayed for his blessing on the intended visit to the dying man, and felt so strengthened and assured by his communion with Heaven, that he seemed to have lost all apprehension of accompanying his ferocious-looking guide.

He followed the man through many a street of a large and populous city; it seemed as if they traversed it in the whole length thereof, so tedious did the way appear. The watchmen were calling the hour of one, and still they proceeded. At length they came to a street, long and narrow, with houses bespeaking wretchedness, and well known as a quarter of the town remarkable for the vice as well as the poverty of its inhabitants. Here the guide stopped, and took out of his pocket a knife, and began to scrape away some earth from the ground. "I can go no farther with you," said the clergyman; but, considering he was as much in the power of the man as he could be in any possible situation, his courage revived, and he watched with intense interest, the movements of his strange companion. After some time, he opened a small trap door, which disclosed a vault of considerable depth, from whence no ray of light proceeded. "Fear not, Sir," said the man, as he let himself down by a rope fastened at the inside. Mr. T— felt at this moment the awful horror of his situation. He might have fled but he knew the man might soon overtake him, and in the dark he could scarcely find his way back. He therefore determined to see the end of this strange adventure, and committing himself again to the care of the Almighty in a short ejaculatory prayer, he watched at the end of the pit, until he saw a light glimmer within it, by the faint rays of which, as it approached nearer, he saw the man place a ladder firmly, ascend a few steps, and entreat him to descend, assuring him again of his safety. He did descend into this pit of darkness, which reminded him of the descent of the prophet into the den of lions; for at the bottom, stretched upon the ground in different attitudes, he beheld a number of men, savage and ferocious as beasts of prey, who, raising their haggard countenances, stared wildly upon him. Their appearance appalled him. "Have I," thought he, "got into the region where hope never comes that comes to all?" The vault was large; the candle which the man held scarcely enlightened where they stood, and left the other end in pitchy darkness. The man then led the clergyman to the farthest end, where, in a corner, stretched upon some straw, lay a man dying of cholera. Here was a picture of human nature brought to the last extremity of wretchedness, cramped in every limb, his eye sunk and hollow, and his skin exhibiting the blue-black hue attendant on this awful malady when there is scarce a hope of recovery. Mr. T— shook in every limb; he had been used to patients in this dreadful malady, but here was one in such a state as he had never before witnessed. "Did you wish to see me?" he asked the dying man. "I did," he replied in a clear and distinct tone. "Why do you wish to see me?" "Because," said the man, "some short time ago, I wandered into your church, and heard you read what I wish you to read to me again: I want to hear it again before I die. Oh! it has never left my mind; night and day it sounded in my ear. I thought I could hide myself from God, but the darkness hideth not from him; he has found me out, he has laid his hand heavily upon me, and soon shall I appear before him, covered over with my crimes. And did not I hear you say, Sir, that God would slay the wicked—that he would say: Depart from me, ye bloody men? O God! I have sinned against thee: there can be no hope for a wretch like me." Every nerve in his body seemed convulsed with agony; and he fixed his eye eagerly on the clergyman, waiting anxiously to hear again that portion of scripture which had first convinced him of his sin. "Tell me some verse that will bring it to my memory," said the clergyman. "Oh! it told me," said the dying man, "that God would slay the wicked."

Parents intending to place their daughters under its fostering care are referred for further information to the Bishop, or to the Rev. J. A. Vaughan, D.D., Rector of the Institute, Oak street, or to either of the following gentlemen, Trustees, viz: Jas. C. Booth, Joseph Cabot, Samuel V. Merrick, Caspar Morris, M. D., William Welsh.

It is important that, prior to Aug. 1, notice should be given to the Rector of those pupils who expect to enter at the opening of the Institute.

TERMS, (including French, Latin, Drawing, Stationery, &c.) viz: For pupils from 9 to 13 years of age, $25 per session. Over 13 years, $40. Primary Department, $12.

N. B. Payment to be made in advance.

be merciful to a poor man, and his attitude his soul departed.

The clergyman looked around him: the light of the glorious gospel can illumine even this dungeon of darkness and horror, thought he; on him who lay in darkness and the shadow of death has this light now shined. The rest of the men had kept at a distance, from the idea that something mysterious must pass between a dying soul and his spiritual instructor, which others were not to hear, corrupted as their minds were, "from the simplicity that is in Christ." But he determined not to depart without a word of exhortation to them; and coming forward in the midst of them, he spoke to them of the awful state in which they were sunk; invited them also to come to Jesus, and obtain from him a full and free pardon for all their past offences. "You know not, my fellow-sinners," said he, "how soon each of you may be summoned, like that poor man, before the awful bar of God. Cholera is sweeping this city from one end to the other: there is contagion in that corpse: I know not but this may be the last time I may have an opportunity of declaring the Gospel to poor perishing sinners. I am a dying man addressing dying men; but, oh! let the love of Christ who poured out his blood upon the cross to save lost sinners, speak to you and urge you to quit this pit of destruction, a faint type of that hell to which sin must lead you; return to habits of honest industry; nothing but idleness and crime could have brought you into this place." "It is true," said the man who led him there, "it was crime brought us here,—we are a gang of robbers. Our lives, Sir, are in your hands; but as a minister of religion, I depend on your not betraying us. We could not now get employment—no one would trust us." "Trust in the Lord," said the clergyman; "hear his words.—Let him that stole steal no more; but rather let him labour, working with his hands that which is good, that he may have to give to them that needeth." Farewell; we may never meet again in this world; but a time will come when we shall meet; and oh! on that awful day, may I find that this message of mercy has been blessed to all your souls!" The man conducted the clergyman until he was past the dark narrow street, and could find his way easily to his home, when he returned with sensations of astonishment at the strange and almost romantic scene he had just witnessed; it almost appeared to him like a dream; but he blessed God for sending him as his messenger to declare the gospel to that poor sinner,—to proclaim liberty to this wretched bond-slave of Satan. "Oh!" said he, "is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?"

This is no fictitious narrative; it is truth, however romantic it may seem. What an important testimony does it afford to the efficacy of God's word, when applied to the heart by the Holy Spirit! The simple word of God, as read in the ordinary service of our Church, was "quick and powerful: it was sharper than any two-edged sword, it pierced even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and was a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart;" like what was said by the Samaritan woman, it told this robber "all that ever he did." He had wandered into the church by accident, as he thought; but was it chance?—No. May we not hope that this poor man was one of those rare instances of a mercy which has no bounds, extended at the last hour,—so that none need despair! An arrow of conviction was sent into his heart, which rankled there till a messenger was sent to speak peace to his soul, and pour the gospel balm into his wounded conscience; and he who has all hearts in his hands, so disposed the hearts of his fero cious and hardened companions in guilt, as to induce them to consent to have the clergyman sent for whom he wished to see, although it exposed themselves to danger, and put their lives, as they said, in his hands.—The Church.

The Faithful Shepherd.

(FROM BISHOP PATRICK'S "PARABLE OF THE PILGRIM.")

He is a person that is altogether disinterested, and a partaker in none of those sects and factions that are among us. One that hath Zion and Jerusalem more in his heart than in his mouth, and loves to do more than sounds, and have a sting in them which pierces the very heart. If you did but hear him you would feel that he leaves a true compunction in the spirit, and not a false alarm in the ear. His head is grey, though not his hairs; his wisdom makes him more venerable than his years; he knows better how to live, than others do to dispute; and he can argue more for peace, than they can for their opinions. He hath faith enough to save himself, and charity enough to believe that others may be saved that are not in all points just of his belief. His compassion is equal to his understanding; his meekness equal to his zeal; his faith is matched with charity; his love to his neighbour is proportionable to his love to God; and his humility and modesty is equal to them all. He seems to me to be a piece of the wrecks of ancient Christianity; a relic of the golden age; one of the genuine children of antiquity. He hath escaped the contagion of this evil age, without flying from it; and he is master of more strength, than custom is of force and violence. The general corruption which hath overspread us, hath not been able to prevail over the purity of his temper. And all the wickedness which could not but touch him, hath not yet had the power to defile or sully him. If those worthies, in whose veins the blood of Christ did run, could return to visit the world again I make no doubt but they would discern in him such marks of their virtue, that they would confess him for one of their race, and embrace him as an inheritor, not only of their name, but of their noble qualities. If you would know any more of him, you had better learn it from himself than from me; only this I can assure you, that by his guidance there are many men who have made a very happy progress towards heaven. And if you fear, that when you go unto him, you may lose your labour, and not find him, or that you may find him little at leisure, I can give you this further assurance, that being a man of peace, he sits but little from home, and hath but little company neither that frequents his house.

Sir Thomas More.

Let all disunited families study with care this beautiful sketch of a household of love, as given by an eye witness, Sir Thomas' friend, the great Erasmus: 'More hath built near London upon the Thames' side, to wit, at Chelsea, a commodious house, neither mean nor subject to envy, and yet magnificent enough; there he converseth affably with his family, his wife, his son and daughter-in-law, his three daughters and their husbands, with eleven grandchildren. There is not any man so loving to his children as he, and he loveth his old wife as well as if she were a young maid; and such is the excellency of his temper, that whatsoever happeneth that could not be helped, he loveth it as though nothing could have happened more happily. You would say, there were in that place Plato's academy; but I do the house injury in comparing it to Plato's academy, wherein there was only disputations of members, of geometrical figures, and sometimes of moral virtues. I should rather call this house a school of the Christian religion; their special care is piety and virtue; there is no quarrelling, or intemperate words heard; none seen idle; which household discipline that worthy gentleman doth not govern by proud and lofty words, but with a kind and courteous benevolence. Every body performeth, yet is there always alacrity, neither is sober mirth anything wanting. He suffereth none of his servants either to be idle or to give themselves to games, but some of them he allotted to look to the garden assigning to every one his separate plot; some gain he set to sing, some to play on the organs; he suffereth touch cards or dice. He used before bed time, to call them together and say certain prayers with them.'

SCOLDING CHILDREN.—Children should be taught to know the connection between action and consequences as soon as possible. What good do you suppose it would do to tell your boys not to roll in the dirt, or to run through a mud-puddle, telling them as a reason that it cost the parent a great deal of labor to procure clothes for them, and a great deal of trouble to keep them clean when they roll in the dirt and run in the mud with them; and then as often as they disobey your orders give them a thorough scolding, and wash their clothes and clean their shoes yourself? I will tell you what good it does to scold your children for doing what you have told them not to do—just as much good as to scold an unruly ox for jumping over the fence and eating the green corn, contrary to orders previously given them. Children are governed by two motives: a hope of reward and fear of unpleasant consequences. A stream of scolding, as long as from sun to sun, never had any other effect upon children than to render them wholly regardless of what is said to them. If you wish to have your children troublesome scold them occasionally. If you want to make them bad, scold them a little harder, louder and more frequently. If you wish to ruin them, and relinquish all hopes of conquering them, scold continually, and you will be sure to gain your object.—Luth. Standard.

NO RELIGION WITHOUT ITS SPIRIT.—The following fine passage is from a sermon of the late Right Rev. Dr. Middleton, bishop of Calcutta:

"Let me caution you against the easy mistake, that you are standing fast in one spirit, if in truth you are sunk into indifference. Men are apt to believe that they agree in religion, and even take credit to themselves for the agreement, when the subject does not sufficiently interest them to afford any cause of discussion. Unity is indeed precious in the sight of God and lovely in the eyes of men, but remember that religious unity supposes that we are really religious. In no other case does it deserve the name; and in candor I must admit that better are differences when all are in earnest, than the mere semblance of Christian agreement when the great and vital doctrines of the gospel are little regarded."

THE PRAYER BOOK.—We have received from an authentic source the following remarks of the late John Randolph, of Roanoke, written in the prayer book of his nephew:

"Your parents were born members of the Church of England. All your forefathers were of that persuasion. You can have no good cause to desert it.—Keep this book, and consider it as, next to the Bible, (from which indeed it is for the most part extracted) entitled to your reverence. If any charge you with formality, ask them if there be more form in reading prose, than in singing verse; given out too by another. This all seek but the Quakers. Ask them to read our Liturgy, more especially General Confession, Te Deum, and above all The Litany, if they can, with unmelted hearts, or uncurdled blood. He that refuses to go along with a devout reader of this service, may suspect himself of a want of 'vital religion.' If Form be again objected and the coldness of our service, tell them the coldness is not in the Book, but in the bosoms of men. Here is something, which out of the Bible we shall seek elsewhere in vain, to suit every rank and condition of life. I am rarely affected by extempore prayer,—often in pain for the person praying—but in whatever mood, I find my feelings, whether of penitence or thanks-giving, respond to the supplication and prayers of our venerable Church.

Laying of the Corner Stone of Christ Church, Lexington, Missouri.

On the 30th of June last, the Corner Stone of "Christ Church," Lexington, Missouri, was laid by the Right Rev. C. S. Hawks, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese. At the appointed hour, the Bishop, followed by the Rev. A. D. Corbyn of Boonville, and the Rev. J. A. Harrison, Rector of the Parish, and by the wardens and vestrymen of the same, proceeded to the church lot. The form of service used by the Rt. Rev. officiator was that one for "The Laying of a Corner Stone," contained in "The Clergyman's Companion." And verily, as the procession approached the north-east corner, repeating responsively the 122d Psalm, and the man of God, in his deep, rich tones, briefly declared the fitness of the ceremonies, and then devoutly thanked the great Head of the Church for putting it into the hearts of his servants to build a house unto Him; as he proceeded to lay the Corner Stone, striking it three times, in the name of the Triune God, and declaring the building thus founded, devoted exclusively to divine services; as, with the devout assemblage, he repeated responsively excerpts from the psalms expressive of love and praise to Almighty God, and then besought Him to prosper the work of his people's hands;—our hearts burned within us, and "prosper, Lord, their handy-work," was our fervent petition. At the proper stage of the services, the Rev. the Rector laid the jar containing certain deposits, in the stone, and read the following memoranda.

"The following are the deposits beneath this Stone. The Holy Bible. The Book of Common Prayer. The Constitution and Canons of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America. The Church Almanac, for the year of our Lord, 1848. The Journal of the eighth Annual Convention of the Diocese of Missouri. A succinct History of this Parish. The Banner of the Cross, of June 10th, 1848. The Calendar of same date. The Lexington Express of June 27th. And the Lexington Appeal of same date. Also the following memorandum. "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen. This Corner Stone of Christ Church, Lexington, was laid in the month of June, 1848, by the Right Rev. Cicero Stephens Hawks, D. D., Bishop of Missouri. The Rev. Jno. A. Harrison, being the Rector of the Parish. R. M. Smith, P. Reinhard, Wardens. Lawson Grant, D. C. Relf, W. K. Trigg, R. B. Smith, J. C. Reinhard, W. J. Piggot and W. M. Smallwood, Vestrymen. J. A. Crump, being the Stone mason, W. W. Lambourne, the Brick mason, Street Hale, the Carpenter. His Excellency J. C. Edwards, being Governor of the State of Missouri, and his Excellency James K. Polk, being President of the United States. "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid which is Jesus Christ." The services ended, and the 25th Hymn sung, the Bishop, in a most felicitous manner addressed the audience on the inestimable privileges derived to ourselves, whether as citizens of this world, or as heirs of a better, from the Church, and dismissed them with the Apostolic benediction.

This edifice when completed, will be the farthest Western Church. It is designed in the Gothic style—with an open roof, and the tower at the side—It will be 60 feet long, and 26 feet wide, and is expected to be ready for divine service early in November, at farthest. On the second Sunday after Trinity, the Bishop confirmed three persons in Lexington. We are a little flock in the midst of much that is antagonistic. According to the utmost measure of our ability, we have helped ourselves, and will continue to do so, praying God to "build the house." Any aid towards the completion of this good work, (for we are able now only to cover the building in) will be charity indeed, and will be twice blest.

Sentences from Bishop Taylor.

The Spirit helpeth our infirmities; for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: "That is, when God sends an affliction or persecution upon us, we are indeed extreme apt to lay our hand upon the wound, and never take it off, but when we lift it up in prayer to be delivered from that sadness; and then we pray fervently to be cured of a sickness, to be delivered from a tyrant, to be snatched from the grave, not to perish in the danger. But the Spirit of God hath from all sad accidents drawn the veil of error and the cloud of intolerableness, and taught us that our happiness cannot consist in freedom or deliverances from persecutions, but in patience, resignation, and noble sufferance; and that we are not then so blessed, when God hath turned our scourges into ease and delicacy, as when we convert our very scorpions into the exercise of virtues."

"We pray with the Spirit, when we pray with holiness, which is the great fruit,—the principal gift of the Spirit. Such praying with the Spirit, when our prayers are the voices of our spirits, and our spirits are first taught, then sanctified by God's Spirit, shall never fail in its effect. Then it is that the Spirit himself maketh intercession for us—that is, hath enabled us to do it upon his strengths;—we speak His sense,—we live His life,—we breathe His accents,—we desire in order to His purposes,—and our persons are gracious by His holiness, and are accepted by His interpellation and intercession in the act and offices of Christ."

"They that say their prayers out of custom only, or to comply with external circumstances or collateral advantages, or pray with trouble or unwillingness, give a very great testimony that they have not the Spirit of Christ within them, that Spirit who maketh intercession for the saints. But he that delighteth in his prayers, not by a sensible and fantastic pleasure, but whose choice dwells in his prayers, and whose conversation is with God in holy living, and praying accordingly,—that man hath the Spirit of Christ, and therefore belongs to Christ."

"The words of a prayer are no part of the spirit of prayer. Words maybe the body of it, but the spirit of prayer always consists in holiness,—in holy desires, and holy actions. Words are not properly capable of being holy; all words are in themselves servants of things; and the holiness of a prayer is not at all concerned in the manner of its expression, but in the spirit of it,—in the violence of its desires, the innocence of its ends, and the continuance of its employment."

"Some have thought of another way, and explicate our praying in the Spirit by a mere volubility of language. Let us not so despise the Spirit of Christ, as to make it no more than the breath of our lungs."

"God gave us his Spirit that we might be insensible of worldly pleasures, having our souls wholly filled with spiritual and heavenly relishes. For when God's Spirit hath entered into us, and possessed us as his temple, instantly we begin to taste manna, and to loath the diet of Egypt:—we begin to consider concerning heaven, and to prefer eternity before moments, and to love the pleasures of the soul above the sordid and beastly pleasures of the body."

"There is a certain joy and spiritual rejoicing, that accompanies them in whom the Holy Ghost doth dwell; a joy in the midst of sorrow; a joy given to allay the sorrows of secular troubles, and to alleviate the burthen of persecution. This is the refreshment of all wearied travellers, the cordial of all languishing sinners, the support of the scrupulous, the guide of the doubtful, the anchor of timorous and fluctuating souls,—the confidence and staff of the penitent."

"God hath given us the Spirit of rejoicing, not a sullen, melancholy Spirit,—not the spirit of bondage or of a slave, but the Spirit of his Son, consigning us by a holy conscience to joys unspeakable and full of glory."

Infant Baptism.

It is no less surprising than true, that many within the pale of the Church entertain ideas the most vague, respecting the nature of the Holy Sacraments—Sacraments ordained by Christ Himself for the spiritual growth and sustenance of His people.

The first act of Christian parents is or should be (for some alas! even doubt its propriety or efficacy) to dedicate their child to God in Baptism, "wherein he is made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of Heaven." yet how few train up their children "in the way they should go," or offer with fervency and faith the prayer that they may "lead the rest of their lives according to this beginning." To insure success we must not only begin aright, but have faith in the means provided. The Church declares, through her minister, that by this act the child "is regenerate, and grafted into the body of Christ's Church." How comforting the assurance! How endearing the relation! How dignified and exalted the position of that dear one thus adopted by God, as joint heir with His well beloved Son!

Parents! an immortal soul is committed to your care, and great must be your condemnation if you neglect to impress solemnly and constantly upon the mind of that heir of Heaven, the intimate relation he sustains to his Heavenly Father!

Most cheerfully would you embrace the offer of an earthly heritage in behalf of your offspring, and take care that every condition be complied with to insure its possession—yet how little effort and prayer are expended in securing for your children—God's children!—those treasures "which moth and rust cannot corrupt," and "which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man to conceive." S.

Love not only thy neighbours and friends, but also thy very enemies; by so doing, thou mayest win and correct them, and make them good people.

Do not desire to have every thing thou seest.

SUBSCRIBERS, who have received bills, will especially oblige us by remitting to us the amounts respectively due. We solicit early attention to them.

The terms of the Paper are Two Dollars and Fifty Cents a year, payable in advance; or Three Dollars if not paid before the end of the year. The advance price will be charged when we are obliged to collect the bills through a travelling agent.

Any person remitting Ten Dollars, will be entitled to receive five copies for one year.

Communications for the Editor may be addressed to the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, and for the publisher to James S. Newbold, both, No. 16 south Seventh street, Philadelphia.

Office of the Banner of the Cross.

The office of this paper has been removed from No. 89 South Fifth street, to the Book store of Mr. R. S. H. George, No. 16 South Seventh street, between Market and Chesnut streets.

Mr. George will act as Agent for the receipt of subscriptions, &c.

LAY READING.—We have received two communications, given below, in reference to difficulties growing out of this practice. We cheerfully reply to the proposed questions, although we do not hereby assent to the large expectations which, as our correspondent states, are entertained by some with respect to the universality of an Editor's knowledge. Where questions are asked for information we are always ready to answer them, as far as our limited knowledge will permit. Of course we do not pretend to decide vexed questions. If any of our friends can show cause for a different judgment, the way is open for them in the columns of the Banner.

In the first place, then, we must express a strong and decided opinion against the practice of Lay Reading in the Church. There is, it is true, a Canon of the General Convention which allows this anomaly. But a careful examination of this Canon will show that it has more of a restrictive, than a permissive character. It is the 11th Canon of 1832, and reads as follows:

Of Candidates for Orders who are Lay Readers

[Former Canons on this subject were the tenth of 1804, and the nineteenth of 1808.]

No Candidate for holy orders shall take upon himself to perform the service of the Church, but by a license from the Bishop, or, if there be no Bishop, from the clerical members of the Standing Committee of the Diocese, in which such Candidate may wish to perform the service. And such Candidate shall submit to all the regulations which the Bishop or said clerical members may prescribe; he shall not use the absolution or benediction; he shall not assume the dress appropriate to Clergymen ministering in the congregation; and shall officiate from the desk only; he shall conform to the directions of the Bishop or said clerical members, as to the sermons or homilies to be read; nor shall any lay reader deliver sermons of his own composition; nor, except in cases of extraordinary emergency, or very peculiar expediency, perform any part of the service, when a Clergyman is present in the congregation.

But were this Canon even more express in its terms, we feel bound to yield greater respect to the authority of the Prayer Book. The Preface to the Ordinal, seems to us to condemn, in express and positive language, all Lay ministrations in the public worship of Almighty God. We quote this "Preface" in order that its strong language may be compared with that of the Canon.

THE PREFACE.

It is evident unto all men, diligently reading Holy Scripture and Ancient Authors, that from the Apostles' time there have been these Orders of Ministers in Christ's Church—Bishops, Priests, and Deacons. Which offices were evermore had in such reverend Estimation, that no man might presume to execute any of them, except he were first called, tried, and examined, and known to have such qualities as are requisite for the same; and also by public Prayer, with imposition of Hands, were approved and admitted thereunto by lawful Authority. And therefore, to the intent that the Orders may be continued, and reverently used and esteemed in this Church, no man shall be accounted or taken to be a lawful Bishop, Priest, or Deacon, in this Church, or suffered to execute any of the said Functions, except he be called, tried, examined and admitted thereunto, according to the Form hereafter following, or hath had Episcopal Consecration or Ordination.

Now if the conduct of public worship does not belong to "any of the said functions," then, of course, this "Preface" is not opposed to Lay Reading! The strongest argument by which this practice is defended, is that dangerous one which appeals to necessity. This argument was of greater force in the earlier history of our Church, when "Bishops, Priests, and Deacons" were so few and far between. Now, we contend, this strong case hardly exists.

The practice of Lay Reading in cases of the temporary or unexpected absence of the proper minister, cannot, we think, be defended on any ground. Neither is there any warrant for it, in the case of those who are within reach of regular ministrations in the country. All the good effected can hardly counterbalance the evil result of lowering the practical estimate of the importance and necessity of a duly commissioned ministry. Of course the people will feel less anxious to supply themselves with the services of the ministry, when one of their own number can officiate for them. Why need they make extraordinary efforts and sacrifices to support a clergyman, when they can have the regular prayers, and a good sermon without such a cost?

The practice must also work badly for those parishes which are supported, in part, by foreign aid. Charity, which might be moved by their utter destitution, may be satisfied with the declaration—if they are too poor to support a clergyman, let them get a Lay Reader!

But the strongest argument in this case, may be found in the resulting difficulties and inconsistencies as presented by our correspondents.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Reverend and dear Mr. Editor:

As an Editor seems to be expected to know everything, and as yourself and your correspondents are ever ready to impart of that information which you possess, I take the liberty of proposing the following questions, by answering which you may oblige some of those, who, like the writer, are occasionally called on to perform the duty of lay reading to destitute congregations.

1. Should a lay reader use any portion of the ante-communion service?

2. If he read the epistle and gospel, omitting the commandments, (which I suppose to be the proper course,) should the collects preceding and following the commandments be also omitted; and in what part of the service ought the collect for the day to be used?

In addition to the above, is the following, which is of more general interest.

Should "the Holy Catholic Church, the Communion of Saints" be read by ministers, and taught by catechists as one article of belief, or two? Was it the design of the General Convention, in altering the punctuation of this part of the Creed, to alter the manner of reading it which had previously prevailed; and if so, is this design generally carried out by the clergy?

Vox Meridionalis.

To the first two questions we can only answer, according to our own conviction, that a Lay Reader should not use any portion of the Ante-Communion Service. The reason for this opinion is found in the fact that this is part of that solemn service of the Holy Communion, the reading of which belongs to the peculiar office of "the Ministers of Christ and Stewards of the Mysteries of God." This is further proved by the Canon saying that the Lay Reader "shall officiate from the desk only."

To the last question we can only say that, in our esteem, "The Holy Catholic Church" and "The Communion of Saints" are distinct articles of the Apostle's creed. None of the other clauses of the creed are explanatory, they are all and each separate and plain assertions of Faith. We are ignorant of the intention of "the General Convention." The general practice, so far as we know, is in accordance with the opinion expressed above.

For the Banner of the Cross.

When, and Where may a Layman Read the Service?

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

May I ask the favour of you, or of some of your correspondents, learned in such matters, to enlighten me and some other of your readers, upon a question that may arise in these days, when our parishes are so often left to take care of themselves, and a layman is obliged to officiate, or the waiting congregation be left to their silent meditations.

1st. In the event of there being no duly appointed Lay reader in a parish, in the absence of a minister on an occasion of public worship, is it proper for any male communicant in the Church, whether of that or another parish, to read the service rather than suffer the congregation to depart without uniting in worship?

2d. When a layman does read the service, whether with or without due appointment by the Bishop, may he do so from the desk, if within the chancel rail? or should he read it, even at a disadvantage from the aisle outside the rail?

I do not ask which is most in conformity with a due sense of propriety, and the fitness of things, but whether there has been any legislation on the subject, or is it left to the discretion and sense of propriety of individuals? Circumstances may, and do arise, when it may be deemed expedient for a layman to read the service, and from the desk, too, without appointment; would he violate any rubric or canon in so doing?

I should like to know my duty, from good authority in such a case; pray enlighten me, and you will doubtless oblige others besides the writer.

Your friend and servant,

July 25, 1848.

To the first question of this correspondent we have, in part, given our answer. We decidedly think it better for a congregation to depart without any worship than to offer that which is not "done decently and in order." The Canon indeed says "No CANDIDATE FOR HOLY ORDERS shall take upon himself," &c. To those who therefore argue that any one who is not a candidate for orders, can "take upon himself to perform the service of the Church" we have nothing to say!

As to the second question, the Canon of our Church forbids the Layman going into the Pulpit or Chancel. This is its meaning when it says, "he shall officiate from THE DESK ONLY." The idea of a Desk being in a Chancel never suggested itself to our Ecclesiastical Legislators. We conclude therefore that in those churches, at least "where the Desk is within the Chancel rail," there is no place provided where a Layman may officiate, as the Canon says "he shall officiate FROM THE DESK ONLY."

FREQUENT COMMUNION.—A Correspondent in our last paper, subscribing himself "Laicus," offers the following as an argument against the celebration of the Holy Communion on solemn Festival days. "Usage existing now for at least two hundred years, has established for Parishes with stated services a monthly communion, &c." We wish our kind correspondent had furnished us with the historical proofs of this "usage." Although we have no doubts of the veracity of "Laicus," yet we cannot take his anonymous authority, when opposed to what we know of Cranmer's judgment, and that of all the glorious men who led the van guard in the struggle of the English Reformation. We are quite sure that our correspondent was correct if he referred to the Continental Reformers in speaking of them as in favour of nothing more than a monthly celebration of the Holy Communion. As long however as we have the Prayer Book, which is in truth "a nearer approach to primitive christianity," to tell what the mind of our Reformers was in this respect, we have no need "to go back for precedents beyond their day," and thus run the fearful risk of losing "our true character as a Protestant Church." But we would feel better satisfied if "Laicus" would only show us the historical proofs of the assertion that the "usage," established by the Reformers we regard, is a precedent for nothing beyond "a monthly Communion." Indeed when we take up the Prayer Book, the noblest bequest of these Reformers, we are constrained to think that the burden of proof lies altogether on the other side. We fully admit that the construction we have adopted applies "as strongly to the seven days after Ascension and the six days after Whitsunday." Indeed we think this provision is a strong and conclusive proof that the compilers of the Prayer Book, following herein the usage of "primitive christianity," were strongly in favour of frequent communions. As to the effect which our correspondent urges against "the too frequent repetition of it," we have only to say that if the Holy Communion is "a means of grace," (see Catechism) the argument proves too much, for it applies equally to public and private prayer. We should then expunge the title from our Prayer Books and call them no longer Books of "Common Prayer," lest Christian worshippers come to regard them "too cheaply!" Indeed we must say that it is a very dangerous view to take of any of "the means of grace," that they may be too frequently used. Such a view suits well our natural indolence and indifference in spiritual things, it little accords with our professions of sinfulness and helplessness, and our supplications for "grace to help in time of need."

We copy with much pleasure, the following kind and excellent editorial from "the Western Episcopalian and Gambier Observer."

BISHOP WHITE PRAYER BOOK SOCIETY.

This Society held its annual meeting in St. Luke's Church, Philadelphia, on the evening of May 17th.—After divine service the annual report was read, and a sermon preached by Rev. Dr. Ducachet. It appears from the report that during the past year 4574 copies of our formularies of devotion have been distributed, and during the last seven years 36,098. The receipts for the year have been $1097,25. The present indebtedness of the Society is $339.30. This state of things the report attempts to explain, by the fact that "while the appropriations of the Society are general, its support is almost entirely from a very few sources"—"While aid is refused to no Diocese within the Church, very few Dioceses give any continued help." The report states very justly that the name of the Society indicates its catholicity, and its course of action in accordance therewith, establishes its claim to the regard and contributions of the whole Church. In these views we fully coincide. We have always looked upon this Society as engaged in a work of vast importance to religion and the church, and one in which churchmen of every grade, and variation of opinion on points not essential to the faith, may cordially unite. It is to the various classes of churchmen what the Bible Society is to differing denominations of Christians. It furnishes a platform upon which all may stand, and where nothing but harmony, and brotherly love, and zeal need prevail. In this view, it has often surprised us that this society has not been better sustained. Its average income since its formation, has been only $1,225 04.— Surely if every Church of our wide-spread Zion would adopt the prayer book system of contributions at communion to benevolent objects, and appropriate one contribution annually to this society, that the spiritually poor throughout the land might be supplied with that "form of sound words" which we all profess to prize so highly, it would not be long before not only the Society's debt were liquidated, but ample means in hand to supply the increasing demands upon its resources. Next to the distribution of the Bible, we know no book better suited to supply the wants of the soul than the Prayer book. And we shall never forget the remark of an eminent legal gentleman, now a member of the Presbyterian Church, "If I wanted a book to put into the hands of a seeker of religion, or for general distribution, and could not obtain a Bible, before all others, I would give the Episcopal Prayer book." Nor will the remembrance of another incident ever be effaced from our memory, of a colored Methodist class-leader, who, when we read to him sentence after sentence, the general confession, exclaimed with a tear swelling in his eye, as we came to "Thou O Lord, have mercy upon us, miserable offenders,"—"O, Sir, dat is de feeling!" We agree with the report "that in this book will be found the wisest and safest guidance to the faithful discharge of the first and highest duty of religion, the worship of the one living and true God."—Let the spirit of these formularies breathe throughout the Church, and there will be more of the wisdom which is first pure and then peaceable; we shall hear less of the notes of discord, and be enabled to obey the Apostolic injunction, "Be ye all of one mind, love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous." Believing the "sole object of the Society, to distribute a scriptural and primitive form, which teaches men to worship God in Spirit and in truth," to be worthy of their sympathy, their prayers, and their contributions, we commend it accordingly to the members of our Diocese, and trust that no churchman will let another year pass without doing something for so noble a charity.

We copy the following from "the Knoxville Register."
To the Clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Tennessee.

REVEREND AND DEAR BRETHREN:—It having pleased Almighty God, in his gracious providence, to restore to our beloved country the blessings of peace, as appears from the proclamation of the President of the United States, publishing the Treaty lately made with the Republic of Mexico; I recommend, in conformity with the XLVII canon of the General Convention of 1832, the following form of Thanksgiving, to be used in all the congregations of this Diocese, on all occasions of public worship, till the first Sunday in September next.

Your faithful Friend,

And affectionate Pastor,

JAMES H. OTEY.

Knoxville, July 18, 1848.

Thanksgiving for the blessings of Peace, to be used after the General Thanksgiving, at morning and evening prayer.

O Almighty and Eternal God! who rulest in the kingdoms of men, and by Thy unsearchable wisdom, Thy almighty power, and merciful providence, dost govern the events of war, the issues of human counsels, and the return of peace, we praise and magnify Thee for Thy great goodness, in restoring to our country the blessings of peace. And we humbly beseech Thee, to enable us by thy grace, to make such a use of this and all thy mercies, as may tend to the advancement of thy honour and glory, and the promotion of peace and happiness, truth and justice among all nations. Bless our rulers with the spirit of wisdom and understanding, that they may govern in thy fear; and grant that the course of this world may be so peaceably ordered by thy governance, that thy Church may joyfully serve thee in all godly quietness; that so they may walk in the ways of truth and peace, and at last be numbered with thy Saints in glory everlasting, through thy merits, O Blessed Jesus, thou gracious Bi-hop and Shepherd of our souls, who art, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end.—AMEN.

We earnestly commend the following appeal, copied from the Missionary, as a strong and urgent demand for the exercise of Christian charity.

An Appeal

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE CHURCH,

In behalf of the Congregation of St. Paul's Church, Paterson.

DEAR BRETHREN:

Under the peculiar circumstances of the case now presented for your consideration, I depart from my customary practice. A brief recital will put you in possession of the grounds on which your benevolence is invoked.

The beginning of the enterprise in this behalf was made in 1817. The number of persons engaged in it was small, and their means limited. It was not until 1826 that the Church was ready for consecration. In its erection, a debt was incurred, which pressed heavily upon them for years, and greatly limited their growth. By the blessing of God, on patient perseverance in well doing, they were enabled, in 1845, to enlarge and improve the church edifice, so as to render it one of the fittest and most beautiful in the diocese. Their affairs were altogether prosperous and full of promise. The end of their hopes and prayers seemed well nigh reached. But it pleased God to visit them with the severest disappointment. On the morning of the 23th of June, a fire broke out in the neighborhood, destroyed several houses, and entirely consumed the Church; and with it, sad to say, Mr. Robert Johnston, a gentleman of great excellence, and a most active parishioner. The insurance of three thousand dollars was just equal to the remainder of their debt, and they were left with nothing but their site.

But, though distressed, they are not discouraged. With true Christian faith and fortitude, and with a comprehensive love which that faith only can inspire, the Rector, Wardens and Vestrymen, immediately adopted the following Resolutions, with perfect unanimity:

"Resolved, That, God helping us, we will take immediate steps to erect a suitable Church edifice.

"Resolved, That the subscriptions be immediately opened for contributions for erecting a fire-proof edifice.

"Resolved, That this Board are unanimously of opinion that the sittings in the new Church should be free.

"Resolved, That the Bishop of the diocese be furnished by the Rector with copies of the foregoing resolutions; and that he be requested to call the attention of Churchmen to our recent and great calamity, and to give us such aid and counsel as our circumstances require."

Having visited Paterson, and officiated in the temporary Chapel, which has been provided for public worship, and met with the Rector, Wardens and Vestrymen, I can speak with perfect confidence of the excellent spirit which pervades the congregation; and of their full determination to do their utmost, not merely to repair their loss, but to make more ample provision for the spiritual wants of the community. The perfect unanimity of feeling which actuates the Vestry, is a token of good from God, and may be accounted on as the assurance of His blessing. "Verily I say unto you," "that if two of you shall agree on earth, as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in Heaven."

Paterson is a very large manufacturing town. There are several hundred English families in employment. They were born, baptised, and brought up in the Church to which we owe our spiritual birth. They have come to us in the ordering of a gracious Providence; and there is no provision for their religious nurture, or the nurture of their children. They shrink from intruding on seats paid for by others. They are not able to pay for seats for themselves. They leave the Church. They are lost to her protection. They are lost to her worship. They are lost to her faith. They wander into strange pastures.—They go astray, and are caught by wolves, and are dashed to pieces from precipices, as sheep that have no shepherd. The Churchmen of Paterson are moved of God to meet their case. They have determined in God's name that it shall be met. They are resolved to do their best to meet it. But it is beyond their best. They must provide a church beyond their ability. They must furnish pastoral care beyond their ability. They must supply training for children beyond their ability. They must therefore ask for aid. And they have a right to ask it. I give my personal and official guaranty, that, what they have undertaken, they will perform. They will build a Church, at once. They will build a stone Church. They will build a Church in which the rich and the poor shall meet together, before Him who is the maker of them all; and where the blessings and the graces of the Gospel shall be dispensed to all who will, without money and without price. It is a great and gracious enterprise. It has a claim on all who love the Lord Jesus Christ. As the case of a people especially visited by the heavy hand of God; as the case of a people at unity with themselves; as the case of a people who have put their own hand to the work, to do their utmost; as the case of a people resolved to offer of their best to God, and to offer it without the drawback of a debt; as the case of a people who look not on their own things only, but also on the things of others, and who are leading on the glorious enterprise of A FREE GOSPEL IN A FREE CHURCH, I commend them heartily to all who love the cause for which the Saviour shed His blood. "Freely ye have received; freely give." "The liberal deviseth liberal things, and by liberal things shall he stand." God loveth a cheerful giver.

RIVERSIDE, July 12, 1848.

We have great pleasure in publishing the following interesting account of the formation of a new Parish in Spring Garden. A large and fast increasing portion of our city will thus be supplied with the means of grace. We trust that this worthy effort will be sustained by the liberal aid of the churchmen of our city.

St. Jude's Church.

The following particulars in relation to the new Episcopal Church in Spring Garden, have been obtained from an authentic source.

The rapid increase in the population of the northern section of our city, induced our Bishop to propose the establishment of another parish, with a view to the speedy erection of a Church. The Rev. D. S. Miller of this city was elected Rector; he served as Superintendent of the Sunday Schools at St. Philip's Church for some years, therefore, he is familiar with the District of Spring Garden, and also with the most important branch of the Church's work. He had already been engaged in Missionary work in that District. The following named gentlemen compose the Vestry.

John Welsh, Jr.,	Wm. P. Cresson,	Edward Gaskell,
Geo. L. Harrison,	Thos. A. Newhall,	Solomon Alter,
Francis Wharton,	Jos. S. Burnett,	John R. Wilmer,

Harry Conrad,	Thos. Allibone,	Jacob S. Miller,

The Vestry have received a most eligible lot on Franklin St. north of Brown St., 90 feet front by 113 feet deep, ground rent $300 per annum. They have contracted with Mr. Hiram Miller, a highly honorable and responsible builder, for the erection of a building to seat 850 persons in pews on the floor of the Church.

The sum of $3000 finishes the Church ready for worship, it is so moderate that the Vestry feel confident of finding that amount of unappropriated funds, in the keeping of members of our Church, dedicated to the service of God. They have resolved to collect the entire cost of the building, and not to ask for possession from the builder until every dollar is paid for. Any extra work must be paid for by a special donation before it is ordered, therefore, contributors may feel confident of the most economical disbursement of their donations. Few, if any of the Vestry, design worshipping in this Church, their only wish being to so arrange their plans as to furnish appropriate Church accommodation at the least possible cost. The style of architecture is English Gothic, the gable is on the street—this renders a basement unnecessary, as rooms for Sunday Schools can be erected in the rear, when the size of the congregation requires such a building. During the infancy of the parish, the Schools will be accommodated in the transepts; Screens will be used to separate them from the body of the Church. The materials are to be of the most substantial kind. Walls of brown sand stone, pointed with colored mortar; roof of slate, finished in the interior with stained wood. The entrance from the north is by a porch; and a tower finished as high as the Church, forms the south entrance. This tower can be completed with a handsome spire for $1000. The corner stone was laid by the Bishop of the diocese on the first day of July, with an appropriate ceremony. Eleven of the city clergy, and a large company of the laity, were present. The walls are above the ground. It is expected that the roof will be finished in November, and the building completed in April next. Donations may be sent to the Rector, or to any member of the vestry.

A CONTRIBUTOR.

We make the following extracts from BISHOP HENSHAW'S ADDRESS to the late Convention of Rhode Island.

Brethren of the Clergy and Laity:

This occasion of our assembling in Convention, to consult and act for the welfare of Christ's Church, in addition to the interest usually connected with such meetings, awakens in the mind of your Bishop the most solemn and affecting associations. It is my birth-day, and also the Anniversary of my Ordination, as Deacon and Presbyter. It reminds me of the flight of time and the rapid approach of the final account. I would be devoutly thankful to the Author of life and of all mercies, for the privilege of entering upon another year. And while I earnestly implore pardon for past deficiencies and sins, and fervently pray for grace, that the residue of my days may be more distinguished by personal holiness, and ministerial fidelity than those which I have already numbered; you will excuse me for reminding you of our common responsibility as the Lord's stewards, and for suggesting that this Annual season of reviewing and reporting our labors, should fix our thoughts upon that great day when the record of our whole lives will be reviewed, and we must give an account of all the deeds done in the body to the Judge of quick and dead. The Lord give us grace to be faithful, that we may then render our account with joy and not with grief.

A few days after the adjournment of the last Convention, viz: on Friday, the 18th day of June, 1847, in St. Philip's Church, Crompton, Evening Prayer having been said by the Rev. J. H. Eames, and the Preface read by the Rev. D. Henshaw, I administered the rite of Confirmation to four persons, accompanied by a sermon and address.

On the 24th of the same month, I was present at the Stated Meetings of the Board of Missions, and of the Trustees of the General Theological Seminary, held in the city of New York. The following day, being the Annual Commencement of the last named Institution, I delivered a Charge to the graduating class. In that discourse, (since published by standing rule of the Trustees,) I bore firm testimony against the Romanizing tendencies manifested by some of the students of the Seminary, within a few years past, and against those deviations from the fixed doctrines of Christ as this Church hath received the same, into which youthful Theological inquirers are most liable to be betrayed by the speculations and errors of the times.

Justice requires the avowal of a conviction on my part that the evils referred to, were ascribable, not to the carelessness or false teaching of Professors, within the Seminary, but to corrupting influences obtruded from without; and to the too common conceit of young and undisciplined minds, that to doubt the truth of generally received opinions is one indication of extraordinary genius and talent. It is a cause of congratulation to the friends of truth and orthodoxy, that the weak attempt of some earnest but misguided men to undermine the foundations of Protestantism, and recover the absurd dogmas and superstitious follies which were rejected at the Reformation, having reached its full development in the apostacy of its originators, has been, as we would hope, effectually checked in our own Church and in the Mother Church of England.

Severe the fiery ordeal may have been, but the pure gold of truth has passed through it with unabated, nay with appreciated value. 'The wood, hay and stubble' may be consumed, but the 'gold, silver and precious stones' will abide. Although there is danger that, in the re-action which is going on, some may be carried to an equally dangerous ultraism in the opposite direction, yet, we believe that the great body of the Church will be found in a condition of increased purity and strength; better qualified and disposed to maintain the truth in its integrity, against those extremes of error, on the right hand and on the left, by which it is at all times assailed. As in the midst of the unhappy controversy of these times, the progress of the Church has been steadily onward; so we may hope that its termination will find the great majority of Clergy and Laity warmly espousing evangelical doctrines, rendered the more precious by the conservative influence of those Catholic principles and divine institutions without which all experience shows that truth and holiness cannot be preserved among men.

From the 5th to the 30th of October, I was in the city of New York, attending to my duties as a member of the General Convention. Although that Triennial meeting of the Bishops and Clerical and Lay Deputies of the different Dioceses, was occupied with the discussion and decision of some questions of an exciting character, about which wide differences of opinion were known to exist among its members, yet its proceedings were conducted with Christian dignity and harmony; and while the reports from different parts of the Union indicated the steady growth of the Church, there was nothing in the debates or acts of that high Ecclesiastical council which in the slightest degree endangered the unity of our Communion. Thus, we firmly believe, it will ever be. While, according to his sure promise, God is the protector of Zion, and His Spirit is in the midst of her, she shall be preserved as a 'city which is at unity in itself.'

I also participated in the debates and doings of the several Meetings of the Board of Missions, held during the session of the General Convention. To spread abroad His Gospel, for the salvation of mankind, is the great work for which the Church of Christ was instituted: and the more deeply its members are engaged in this work, the less room there will be for division, and the less inclination to controversy. It is fondly hoped that there is no diminution of our interest in the great Missionary cause: although it is not to be denied that the spiritual wants of our country and of foreign lands loudly call us to increased zeal and liberality in sustaining it.

THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR THE BUILDING OF CHURCHES, which has been duly organized in conformity to the provisions of Canon V., has since then had no call for its agency, except to approve and recommend a subscription to raise funds for the purchase of a Stone Baptist Meeting House, in Centre Mill, North Providence. The subscription has been so far successful to secure the house for the services of the Church.

The house thus secured, is a substantial building of stone, capable of accommodating a congregation of two hundred and fifty or three hundred persons. Missionary services have been introduced there; several of the pews have been rented; and we have reason to hope that by the blessing of God, many in the neighborhood, hitherto strangers to the worship and doctrines of our Church, may be led to prize them as means of grace and instruments of salvation.

The Committee appointed, at the last Convention, to devise some system of providing relief for the Widows and Orphans of deceased Clergymen, and of infirm and superannuated Clergymen, have had the subject under their consideration, and will report the result of their deliberation at the present session.

When we reflect upon the very small salaries received by the majority of those who serve at the altar, affording very scanty means for the support of themselves and families, we must perceive that it is impossible for them to lay aside any part of this pittance for the support of their families after their decease, or for their own comfort in protracted sickness, or under the infirmities of old age. If those who are taught in the word are required to minister unto him that teacheth in all good things, there can be no more imperative duty than that of contributing to such a charity as is now referred to. It is a charity which has awakened lively interest and called forth liberal benefactions in some of our sister Dioceses. And I cannot but express the earnest hope that this Convention will not adjourn until it has devised and put in operation some wise and well ordered agency in this important branch of Christian benevolence. One which will insure the confidence and call forth the liberality of the faithful while living, and be remembered in their testamentary bequests when dying. Then may we hope for the sure accumulation of a sacred fund which, through coming years and generations, will be the means of cheering the heart of many a decayed Minister of Christ, of wiping away the tears of the widow, and making the orphan sing for joy.

Brethren, I have discharged my canonical duty in reporting the Episcopal acts performed by me during the past year, and am now ready to co-operate with you in the duties which we share in common as members of this Convention. May we proceed to those duties in the exercise of fraternal charity to each other, and with confidence in the blessing of Him who has promised to be with His Church 'always even unto the end of the world.' May that blessing come upon us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Lord. J. P. K. HENSHAW,

Bishop of Rhode Island.

AGENT AT ANNAPOLIS, MARYLAND.—Mr. William D. Greenham has very kindly consented to act as Agent for the "Banner" at Annapolis and its vicinity, in place of Mr. Edward C. Mills, who has heretofore very obligingly and satisfactorily acted in that capacity, but has now removed.

AGENT AT NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.—Dr. L. D. Powell has very kindly consented to act as Agent for the "Banner" at Nashville and neighbourhood, Tennessee.

Diocesan Intelligence.

In accordance with the request of several Clergymen of this Diocese, our subscribers, we proceed to publish some of the Parochial Reports, taking a few at a time.

PAROCHIAL REPORTS.

Report of the Rev. Thomas G. Allen.—I am still engaged in missionary effort as set forth in last Report.

I have administered or assisted in the administration of the Lord's Supper on 13 occasions. I have baptized 75 persons. In preaching, lecturing, &c., I have officiated on 233 occasions. I have married 24 couple. I have officiated on 83 funeral occasions.

During the year up to March 12th, my pastoral visits have been 1080;—1036 of them to the sick, afflicted, &c. There have been distributed a few Bibles and Prayer Books, and 70,000 pages of tracts, in which is included 47,000 pages of the tract, Morning and Evening Prayers for Children and Youths, &c.

I have also been instrumental in circulating more than 80 sets of Scott's Commentary.

My monthly appointment at the Widow's Asylum; also my weekly appointment in the Magdalen Asylum, and at my own house are continued. When I have had no appointment on the Lord's day, I have, most generally, gone to the Eastern Penitentiary. On some of these occasions, after preaching to the prisoners, I have visited them individually, offering them tracts with a word of counsel, &c. On Sabbath June 13th, my fifty-third birthday, I spent nearly eight hours in the enclosure of the Penitentiary. I preached twice and visited upwards of 100 convicts.

Report of the Rev. F. W. Beasley, Rector of All Saints' Church, Lower Dublin, Philadelphia county, and of Christ Church, Oak Grove, Bucks county.—Baptisms, infants, 19; communicants added, 4; died or removed, 3; present number, 50; public services, on every Sunday in the year, at All Saints' Church in the morning—in the afternoon at the Chapel—during Lent, once each week at both places—twice at Mechanicsville—twice at a house two miles above All Saints' Church—twice at China Retreat—once on a Sunday evening, and once on Wednesday evening at Hulmeville, during the absence of the Rector—once at the Presbyterian Church in Bensalem. The children are instructed in the catechism once a month at All Saints' Church. Sunday schools, 2; in the one at Oak Grove the children receiving their instruction from the Rector alone during the last summer. Collection for the Episcopal fund, $6 00; for Missions in Wisconsin, 16 00; Monthly collections, 20 00.

As the annual meeting of our Missionary Society has been postponed, I am unable to say what sum will be collected by it.

Report of the Rev. R. H. Bourne.—I beg respectfully, in compliance with the Canons of the Church, to present a brief report of the manner in which my time has been occupied during the past year.

As an Agent of the American Sunday School Union, I have been employed principally in presenting among such of my brethren of the Episcopal Church as were friendly to the cause, the class of operations in which this Society is engaged, and in making collections to aid its efforts among the destitute.

It becomes me gratefully to acknowledge the kindness and courtesy with which I have been every where treated.

As the business of my agency has left my time on the Lord's day, much at my own disposal, I have left myself at the service of my brethren, and have esteemed it a privilege to be permitted to render them any service in my power, in preaching, or other parochial duties.

I have thus in various churches in Philadelphia and the neighbouring counties, and in the other cities visited, preached 70 times; and assisted in the reading of the service, and at the Lord's supper on 30 or more other occasions, twice I administered the Holy Communion alone; twice the Ordinance of Baptism; twice performed the burial service; once the marriage service;—and on one occasion assisted my respected Bishop at an Ordination; namely, that of two candidates for the priesthood, and two for the Diaconate, in St. Peter's Church, New York; on the 16th of April last. In addition to these services, I have visited some 50 Sunday schools, comprising from 6000 to 7000 pupils; which I generally addressed.

Report of the Rev. William H. Bourns, Rector of Emmanuel Church, Holmesburg, Philadelphia county.—Congregation, families, 39; adults, 112; children, 54; total, 166; baptisms, adult, 1; infants, 3; total, 4; confirmed, 3; communicants added, 11; died or removed, 10; present number, 53; burials, 10; public services, on Sundays, 104; other days, 56; total, 160; children catechised, 12; times, 6; Sunday schools, male, 1; teachers, 4; pupils, 39; female, 1; teachers, 7; pupils, 50; total, schools, 2; teachers, 11; pupils, 89; Bible class, 1; members, 10; collections, Episcopal fund, $8 00; Convention fund, 8 00; Soc. Adv. Christianity, 48 00; Missionary and other purposes, 83 88; total, $147 88.

In addition to the above services, I have preached ten times in the Poor House, since 1st of January last.

Report of the Rev. Samuel Bowman, Rector of St. James' Church, Lancaster, Lancaster county.—Baptisms, adults, 6; infants, 29; total, 35; confirmed, 12; marriages, 5; burials, 17; communicants added, 14; died or removed, 13; present number, 138; public services, on Sundays, 104; other days, 49; total, 153; children catechised, monthly; Bible class, 1; members, 10; Sunday schools, male, 1; teachers, 6; pupils, 31; female, 1; teachers, 7; pupils, 42; infant school, teacher, 1; pupils, 64; total, schools, 3; teachers, 14; pupils, 137; collections, Christmas fund, $21 55; Convention fund, 35 75; Episcopal fund, 22 66; Society for Advancement of Christianity, 50 00; Missionary and other purposes, 396 04; total, $526 00.

Of the item last above named, $150 00 were in part payment of a debt remaining on the parsonage of the Church.

Report of the Rev. Charles Breck, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Wellsboro', Tioga county.—Congregation, families, 60; adults, 180; children, 157; total, 337; baptisms, adults, 10; infants, 24; total, 34; confirmed, 12; communicants added, 14; died or removed, 4; present number, 65; marriages, 3; burials, 13; public services, on Sundays, 100 times, other days, not known; children catechised, in the church every Sunday; Sunday schools, male, 2; teachers, 7; pupils, 32; female, 2; teachers, 8; pupils, 80; total, schools, 4; teachers, 15; pupils, 112; collections, Episcopal Fund, $10 00; Convention Fund, 5 00; Society for the Advancement of Christianity, 8 00; missionary and other purposes, 37 00; total, $60 00.

During the past year, I have officiated in some of the school houses in the vicinity; in the villages of this county, and at the seats of justice of the counties of Potter and McKean.

Report of the Rev. S. C. Brinckle, Rector of St. James' Church,

Kingsessing.—Congregation, families, 50; baptisms, adults, 3; infants, 11; total, 14; confirmed, 3; communicants added, 3; died or removed, 1; present number, 40; marriages, 9; burials, 13; public services, on Sundays, 79; other days, 13; total, 92; children catechised 4 times; Sunday schools, 2; teachers, 7; pupils, 50; collections, missionary purposes, $63 40.

The undersigned on the 15th of this month, resigned the charge of this church which he has held since December, 1831, and has taken a letter of dismission to the diocese of Delaware. With this report therefore will close the connexion of the undersigned with a diocese in which his entire ministerial life thus far has been passed, comprehending a period of thirty years.

S. C. BRINCKLE, Late Rector.

Report of the Rev. George Boyd, Rector of St. John's Church, Northern Liberties, Philadelphia county.—This parish has continued since my last report to sustain my testimony to the primitive and apostolic order of free seats and freewill offerings, in the place of rented pews, and what has well been called the commercial system. It has not been without much fear and trembling, many sacrifices, and the necessity of constant self-denial, that I have so far been enabled to abide what I believe to be the will of the Lord. My hope is gradually brightening, although I must confess, that my patience is sometimes sorely tried.

No important changes have marked the history of this parish during the past year. The Church proper is I think manifestly growing in grace; numbers are walking blamelessly in all the ordinances and commandments of the Lord. Others are yielding their hearty consent to my ministry, and striving to enter into its spirit, while there is a constant attendance and participation in our worship, of persons, who seem to be seeking rest to their souls.

I have solemnized 7 marriages, and baptized 19 persons, (3 adults. The Sunday and infant schools are continued, with the best results. The children are trained in the "nurture and admonition of the Lord," as the church directs, and all other formularies of instruction are carefully excluded, as far as may be. By the liberality of one who loves the church, and prays for its prosperity, the Sunday School library has recently been enlarged, by the addition of a considerable number of books, designed more immediately for the teachers. From this good is anticipated to flow.

Report of the Rev. E. Y. Buchanan, Rector of All Saints' Church, Paradise, Lancaster county, and Christ Church, Leacock. ALL SAINTS' CHURCH, PARADISE.—Congregation, families and parts of families, 38; individuals, 215; baptisms, adults, 2; infants, 10; total, 12; confirmed, 6; communicants added, 8; died, 2; removed, 4; stricken from list on account of non-attendance at communion, 2; separated from the church, 2; present number, 54; marriages, 5; burials, 5; public services, on Sundays, 53; other days, 23; total, 76; children catechised, frequently; 1 Sunday school; teachers, 15; pupils, 125; collections, Episcopal Fund, $7 28; Convention Fund, 7 75; Society for the Advancement of Christianity, 7 50; missionary purposes, 17 29; Tract and Prayer Book Societies, 12 80; other purposes, 58; total, $110 63.

CHRIST CHURCH, LEACOCK.—Congregation, families, and parts of families, 37; individuals, 175; baptisms, adults, 2; infants, 4; total, 6; confirmed, 6; communicants added, 7; died, 2; removed, 5; separated from the church, 1; present number, 40; marriages, 1; burials, 4; public services, on Sundays, 31; other days, 6; total, 40; children catechised, often; Sunday schools, 1; teachers, 6; pupils, 45; collections, Episcopal Fund, $3 75; Convention Fund, 3 00; missionary and other purposes, 37 75; total, $44 50.

This congregation continues to afford encouraging indications of improvement. The church, it is hoped, will this summer, be placed in a state of complete repair.

NEW YORK.—ASSOCIATE ALUMNI OF THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—ANNUAL MEETING, A. D. 1848:

NEW YORK, Tuesday, June 27.

This being the day appointed by the Constitution, the Association met at St. Thomas's Church, in the city of New York.—Present, Rev. Drs. S. R. Johnson, Whitehouse, and Forbes.—Messrs. Hart, Van Kleeck, Embury, Watson, R. Cox, J. A. Williams, Storrs, Eigenbrodt, Halsey, Loutrel, Bruce, Gibson, Harwood, Duffie, Howland, Preston, Harison, and Walton.

Rev. J. M. Forbes, D.D., took the Chair, and opened the meeting with the usual devotions.

Standing Committees appointed—

On the Room and Library.—Rev. Messrs. Watson, Harwood, and Bruce.

On the Invitation of the Graduating Class.—Rev. Messrs. Howland, Duffie and Harison.

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to ascertain whether any members have departed this life since the Triennial Meeting, and to prepare suitable resolutions.

Rev. Messrs. Storrs, Cox, and Gibson were appointed. Resolved, That a Committee of five be appointed to prepare an address to be presented by the Associate Alumni to the Rev. Professor Wilson, expressive of their feelings at his retiring from the duties of the Professorship of Systematic Divinity, which he has filled with such honor to himself, and profit to the students for more than a quarter of a century.

Rev. Dr. S. R. Johnson, and Messrs. Watson, Odenheimer, Van Kleeck, and J. A. Williams were appointed. On motion, the Chairman was added to said committee.

Resolved, That when this meeting adjourns, it adjourn to meet to-morrow at the Seminary at 12, M.

On motion, adjourned.

8, P. M. Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. S. R. Johnson, D.D., Rector of St. John's Church, Brooklyn, and the Lessons were read by the Rev. E. Harwood, Rector of St. James's Church, New York. The Annual Sermon was preached by the Rev. Henry L. Storrs, Rector of St. John's Church, Yonkers, on Acts xx. 26. The concluding prayers were said and the benediction pronounced, by the Rev. Dr. Forbes, Rector of St. Luke's Church, New York.

Wednesday, June 28.

Met at the Seminary Hall pursuant to adjournment. Rev. Mr. Van Kleeck was called to the Chair, and offered the usual devotions. Rev. Messrs. Stubbs and Fash attended, not before present. The minutes of yesterday's session were read and approved. The minutes of the Triennial Meeting were read and approved. The Annual Essay was then read by the Rev. Edmund Embury, A. M. Rev. Dr. Forbes then took the Chair, and business was resumed.

The report of the Executive Committee was then read by the Secretary. It stated that the minutes of the last Annual Meeting had been published in the Churchman, and a copy sent to each member; and 100 extra copies printed. That the Sermons and Essay for 1847 had been published and distributed, and that the expense thereof had been over $200, of which amount only half had been paid. That about $30 had been received at the last Annual Meeting, and $26 in reply to the circular sent by the Committee, from 21 members; and that at least 200 members had failed to make any contribution to defray the expense of the publication; of which, however, they had received the benefit. That in consequence they had been unable to proceed with the other publications ordered by the Association.

Also they have been unable to have 50 volumes of former publications bound, inasmuch as there were very few copies in some years remaining, and in others none.

Also that they had arranged with a student in the Seminary for the occupation of the Room and Library for the past and ensuing years.

They recommended the adoption of the following resolutions: 1. Resolved, That the By-law relating to Publications be suspended, till the present debt shall have been discharged, and there shall be funds in the Treasury to authorize the publication for the present year.

2. Resolved, That the publication of the Sermons and Essays of former years be not proceeded with, until the publication of the present year shall have been paid for, and there shall be funds in the Treasury to meet the expense.

3. Resolved, That the Committee be discharged from the duty of binding former publications and increasing the Scholarship Library.

The first resolution was, on motion, laid on the table. The 2d and 3d were adopted.

The Report of the Acting Treasurer was then read—

Receipts—From the Treasurer—(in Europe),	$85 50
From 21 members,	26 00
	$111 50
Expenditures—For 150 copies Churchman,	$6 00

	$111 50

On Motion, The Committee on the History of the Seminary was continued to the next Annual Meeting.

The Committee on the Invitation of the Graduating Class, reported that they had performed their duty by giving the usual notices.

The Committee on the Room and Library reported that they had found the same in good order.

The Committee on Deceased Members, reported that none had departed this life since the Triennial Meeting.

Rev. Messrs. Van Kleeck and Cox were appointed a Committee to nominate officers, and Preacher and Essayist.

The amendment to the 2d Article of the Constitution proposed by the Executive Committee at the last Annual Meeting, and approved of at the Triennial Meeting, was then considered and adopted, so that said Article now reads as follows, to wit:

"Article II. The Association shall consist of all graduates of the General Theological Seminary, and of such other persons as are or may be designated as Alumni, by existing or future regulations of the Board of Trustees, who shall have given their written assent to this Constitution, and shall conform to its requisitions. But if any member shall abandon the design of taking Holy Orders, or shall be displaced from the ministry of the Church, he shall thenceforth cease to be a member of this Association."

The Committee on Nominations reported; and on a ballot the following gentlemen were elected officers for the ensuing year:

President—Rt. Rev. William R. Whittingham, D. D., ex officio.

1st Vice President—Rt. Rev. Alfred Lee, D. D., ex officio.

2d. " " Rev. William Shelton, D. D.

3d. " " Rev. John M. Forbes, D. D.

4th. " " Rev. Benjamin I. Haight, D. D.

5th. " " Rev. Albert Smedes.

6th. " " Rev. William I. Kip, D. D. in 1853 Bishop

Treasurer—Rev. Edward N. Mead.

Corresponding Secretary—Rev. Robert B. Van Kleeck.

Recording Secretary—Rev. William Walton.

The following gentlemen were elected Preacher and Essayist:

Preacher—Rev. William Payne.

Substitute—Rev. William Watson.

Essayist—Rev. Loyd Windsor.

Substitute—Rev. James A. Williams.

Resolved, That when we adjourn, we adjourn to meet on Friday next, at the Sunday School Room of St. John's Chapel, immediately after the commencement of Exercises.

Resolved, That a Committee of five be appointed to suggest what means, if any, can be devised for exciting greater interest in the meetings of the Association.

Rev. Messrs. Van Kleeck, Harwood, Howland, Hart, and Gibson were appointed.

On Motion, The Chairman was added to said Committee.

On Motion, adjourned.

Friday, June 30.

Met pursuant to adjournment in the Sunday School Room of St. John's Chapel at quarter to 1, P. M.

Rev. Dr. Forbes in the Chair.

Rev. Dr. Haight, and Messrs. Hallam, Fish, Mallaby, Spooner, Clapp, Haskins, Pitkin, and Sterling attended, not before present.

Minutes of yesterday's session read and approved. The Rev. Dr. Johnson, from the Committee to prepare an address to the Rev. Professor Wilson, reported that the Professor had withdrawn his resignation; and asked to be discharged.

Whereupon, on motion, they were discharged, and the following resolutions adopted unanimously.

Resolved, That the Associate Alumni have heard with the greatest satisfaction of the withdrawal by the Rev. Dr. Wilson of his resignation as Professor of Systematic Divinity.

Resolved, That a Committee of five be appointed to wait on the Rev. Professor Wilson, in the name of the Associate Alumni, and request him to sit for his portrait, to be placed in the Library of the Seminary; and that the said Committee be empowered to take all necessary measures for the accomplishment of this design.

Rev. Drs. S. R. Johnson and Haight, and Messrs. Watson, Hallam, and Harwood, were appointed.

The first resolution reported by the Executive Committee was then called up for consideration, and on motion, adopted.

Rev. Dr. Forbes reported, that the Committee appointed to inquire what means might be adopted to increase the interest of the Annual Meetings of the Association, deemed it inexpedient to offer any suggestions on the subject, in consequence of the small attendance of the members at this present meeting.

On motion, ordered, That said Committee be continued, and report on the second day of the next Annual Meeting.

The Constitution was then read by the Secretary, after which the following members of the graduating class signed the roll, viz:

Messrs. R. Rallston Cox, Thomas S. Drowne, Andrew Mackie, Josiah Phelps, Sylvanus Reed, Horace H. Reid.

The minutes of the present session were read and approved. On motion, adjourned sine die.

W. WALTON, Recording Secretary.

The Acting Treasurer acknowledges the following contributions:

For 1847—From Rev. Messrs. Slack, H. R. Peters, Cornish, Van Rensselaer, Shackelford and Griswold.

For 1847 and 1848—Rev. Messrs. Van Kleeck, Hallam, Fish, Mallaby and White.

For 1848—Rev. Messrs. Fairbairn, Gibson, R. Cox, Duffie, Howland, Hart, Dr. Forbes, Harwood, Spooner, Pitkin, Dr. Van Ingen, Watson, Clapp, T. McC. Peers, and Mr. R. R. Cox.

W. WALTON, Acting Treasurer.

Western New York.—BISHOP DELANCEY'S VISITATION.—On Sunday, July 9th, the Bishop visited St. John's Church, Canandaigua. The Bishop preached and confirmed six persons, including one from St. Matthew's Church, Moravia. The Bishop preached again in the afternoon.

On the 10th, in St. John's Church, Honeoye Falls, the Bishop preached and confirmed three persons.

On the 11th, the services were held in the morning in Zion Church, Avon. The Bishop preached and confirmed two persons belonging to St. John's Canandaigua. In the afternoon, in the school house at Mumfordsville, the Bishop preached.

Wednesday, July 12th, the Bishop visited the parish of St. Mark's Church, Le Roy. The Bishop confirmed eight persons and preached.

The afternoon of the same day the Bishop visited the parish of St. Paul's Church, Stafford. The Bishop confirmed sixteen persons and preached.

Thursday, July 13th, the Bishop visited Christ Church, Albion, confirmed fourteen persons and preached.

Friday, July 14th, the Bishop visited St. John's Church, Medina, confirmed one person and preached.

In the afternoon of the same day the Bishop preached in the Methodist house of worship, for the Parish of St. Luke's, Royalton Centre.

Sunday, July 16th, the Bishop visited St. Paul's Church, Lewiston, confirmed four persons, preached and administered the Holy Communion.

In the afternoon, the Bishop visited St. Peter's Church, Niagara Falls. The Bishop preached to a large congregation.—Gospel Messenger.

Marland.—VISITATION OF CALVERT COUNTY.—On Tuesday, July 18th, the clergy of the county met the Bishop at the Parsonage of All Saints' parish, and proceeded with him to the parish Church. There a large congregation was in attendance. The Bishop administered Holy Baptism to two adults, and received into the congregation the infant son of the rector of the parish, previously privately baptized in illness. The Bishop preached, administered Confirmation to eleven persons (two colored men, and one female of Indian descent) and celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Williams, the rector.

On Wednesday, July 19th, the services were at St. Paul's Parish Church, Prince Frederick. The Bishop preached, and administered the Lord's Supper, assisted by the rector.

In the afternoon, the children of the Parish having been catechised after the Second Lesson by the Bishop, the Bishop confirmed four persons (three males) addressing them as usual. The congregations, both morning and afternoon, were large; many persons spending the interval between the services in the grounds around the church, where the revival of the old agapae might have been seen in the cheerful but quiet groups assembled under sundry spreading trees, partaking of the refreshments for which they were indebted to the forethought and hospitality of members of the parish.

On Thursday, the services were at the parish church of Christ Church Parish. After the Second Lesson, the rector received into the congregation a child privately baptized in illness. The Bishop preached, confirmed five persons (four males) and administered the Lord's Supper, assisted by the rector. After the dismissal of the congregation, the children were catechised and addressed by the Bishop.

The afternoon and evening of this day, as previously the evening of Wednesday, were occupied by the clergy in the examination of a candidate for Holy Orders. A postulant for admission as a candidate had been examined by the Bishop on the afternoon of Tuesday.

On Friday, at the chapel of Christ Church Parish, the Bishop preached, and celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the rector. After the Benediction, the Bishop addressed the congregation, before its dispersion with reference to the services of the week, and the results to be looked for from them. After the dismissal, the children were gathered round the chancel, and first catechised by the rector, and then briefly addressed by the Bishop.

The congregations in Christ Church Parish were both large; that on Friday the largest remembered to have been convened in the chapel.

A handsome silver paten, presented for use in the chapel of Christ Church Parish, by a few members of the parish, was employed for the first time at the Communion there.

On Wednesday, in St. Paul's Parish, arrangements were finally made by the vestry for liquidation of debt on the church, in order to its consecration at an early date.—Church Times.

Massachusetts.—CONFIRMATION.—On Sunday, the 23d inst. the Bishop visited St. Matthew's Church, South Boston, in the afternoon; preached, and confirmed five persons. After Church, he also catechised the children.—Church Witness.

Ohio.—CONSECRATION.—The Rt. Rev. Bishop McIlvaine, on the 28th inst., consecrated to the worship and service of Almighty God, Trinity Church, Lyme. Present of the clergy, the Rev. Messrs. Bronson, Freeman, Winthrop, Cracraft, and J. R. Taylor. The instrument of donation was read by the Rev. Mr. Cracraft; the sentence of consecration by the Rev. Mr. Taylor. The Rev. Mr. Freeman read morning prayer, assisted in the Lessons by the Rev. Mr. Winthrop. The Bishop read the Ante-Communion Service and preached from Phil. iii. 3:—"We are the circumcision which worship God in the spirit." Setting forth in a clear and powerful manner the relation between the outward forms and the inward spirit of our holy religion.

After sermon, the Bishop was assisted in the administration of the Communion by the Rev. Mr. Bronson.

The parish in Lyme, a year ago last winter, suffered the loss, by fire, of a building then just completed.—With a zeal worthy of the cause, the people immediately proceeded to the erection of the present edifice, which is larger than the former, and was opened for worship the first time last winter. It is a neat and commodious structure, some 50 feet long by 25 wide; adorned with a belfry and spire, and having a vestry room in the rear, about 12 feet square.

The parish at present suffers from the want of a minister. United, as formally, with Bellvue, 4 miles distant, we know not where a clergyman could be more useful, or where one could find a pleasanter field of labor.

On the day following, the Bishop consecrated St. John's Church, Wakeman. The same clergy in attendance. The instrument of donation was read by the rector, the Rev. Mr. Bronson, the sentence of consecration by the Rev. Mr. Winthrop. The latter read Evening Prayer; the Rev. Mr. Cracraft reading the Lessons. The Bishop preached from 2 Cor. vi., 1:—"We then as workers together with him, beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain."

The good Church people here have labored for a long time under many discouragements. Their house of worship (which is finished with the exception of some fixtures about the chancel, and entirely paid for,) does credit to their liberality and perseverance. The Rev. Mr. Bronson, who has more than reached his "three score years and ten," at present divides his services between this Church and that of Hudson.

The Bishop closed his visitation to this section of his diocese, on the forenoon of the 30th inst., at Milan, where he consecrated St. Luke's Church, and held confirmation. The same clergy present as on the occasions above mentioned. The instrument of donation and sentence of consecration, were read by the rector, the Rev. Mr. Taylor. Morning Prayer was offered by the Rev. Mr. Winthrop, the Rev. Mr. Freeman reading the Lessons. The Bishop read the Ante-Communion service, and preached an impressive and searching discourse from Prov. xxiii, 26:—"My son give me thy heart, and let thine eyes observe my ways." At the close of the sermon, which was listened to by a full and attentive congregation, seven persons were confirmed; four of the candidates having been received into the visible fold of Christ by baptism, on the Sunday preceding. The season has been one of unusually solemn and refreshing interest, both to ministers and people, and they feel encouraged to say, that through the grace of God, their bread has not been cast upon the waters in vain.—West Epis.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—Rev. Joseph Adderly, having resigned the parishes of Wayne township and Red Bank, and accepted a unanimous call to the parishes of Boardman and Canfield, Mahoning Co., Ohio, requests that all letters and papers for him be directed to the last named place.

The Rev. George S. Gordon having been received by transfer from the Diocese of Connecticut, into the Diocese of New York, has been called to the Rectorship of St. Peter's Parish, Peekskill.

The Rev. J. S. Covell has resigned the charge of St. John's Church, Essex, and accepted a call to the rectorship of Christ Church, Bethlem—to which place he requests his letters and papers to be directed.—Calendar.

Shelby College, Shelbyville, Ky.

This Institution, which has just closed a prosperous session, is located on the McAdams road between Louisville and Frankfort, in one of the most desirable and healthful regions of the West. It is under the control and patronage of the Diocese of Kentucky. Arrangements have recently been made for the completion of extensive additions to the present College buildings, for the accommodation of students, and for the erection of an Astronomical Observatory. Every facility will be furnished for the thorough instruction of youth in this Institution, and due diligence will be required of every class of its pupils in the prosecution of their respective studies. Those who have the control of Shelby College are resolved that it shall contribute its full share in forming and perpetuating an elevated standard of collegiate discipline and scholarship. The President will receive the sons of members of the Church in his family, and give special attention to their religious and moral, as well as to their literary education.

Strict attention will be given to the training of the pupils of this Institution in the various branches of English education, as well as to classical and scientific instruction. Candidates for the ministry and sons of clergymen will receive the benefits of the College gratuitously.

FACULTY.

REV. WM. J. WALLER, M. D., President, and Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy, and Natural Science.

W. W. THEOBALD, A. M., Professor of Ancient and Modern Languages.

JOSEPH WINLOCK, A. M., Professor of Mathematics and Mechanical Philosophy.

PRINCIPAL OF THE PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT.
An able and efficient officer will be engaged for this department before the beginning of the next session. The ensuing session will commence on the first Wednesday of September next.

There is already belonging to the College one of the most extensive and most judiciously selected Theological Libraries west of the mountains, which will be gradually enlarged. And as it is the design of the Faculty and Trustees, that the exact and natural sciences shall be thoroughly studied by its pupils, the institution has been furnished with an elegant Chemical and Philosophical Apparatus, as well as an extensive assortment of the best text books in these departments.

ANNUAL CHARGES.

For instruction in the Classics and the Sciences, per session of 10 months, $40 00
Modern Languages—French, German, Italian or Spanish, each 20 00
English Studies, in the Preparatory Department, 25 to 30
Board, Fuel, Washing, &c., for a session of 10 months, 110 00
Fuel, and Servant's hire for Public Rooms, 3 50
Music and Drawing, if desired, 15 00

The expenditures of all the boys who may become members of the President's family, will be exclusively controlled by him. This rule is absolutely necessary, and will be insisted on in every case. Its firm, but mild enforcement, is found to operate, so as to effectually prevent the vexatious consequences which never fail to attend youthful extravagance and folly.

Those who may desire further information, may obtain it by addressing the subscriber, Shelbyville, Ky.

Fewell, or Essays of Opinion for Churchmen.—a book

The theory of conversion, as held by very many professing christians of every non-Episcopal denomination, is unphilosophical and unscriptural; and by consequence subversive of the Truth. It is held that the assurance of the pardon of sins, is given before Baptism; that the reaction of the mind under deep conviction, producing tranquillity and peace, is the only reliable evidence of conversion; hence all the appliances of revivalism are brought to bear upon this point; men are taught to look for the assurance of pardon, in this tranquilization of feeling. To say nothing of the entire want of Scriptural authority for this doctrine, it is at war with sound philosophy. It is to mistake a natural effect of organization for the influences of divine grace: all persons, of what temperament soever, are expected to undergo the same process, to realize the same overwhelming conviction, the same depression; and upon the removal of the superincumbent weight, to feel the very same swelling emotions of joy; many a man has abandoned all hope of salvation, who having been brought under the influence of this theory, and finding within his own mind nothing like the transports of bliss spoken of by others, as the evidences of their conversion, came to the hopeless conclusion that God had in store no mercy for him. How absurd is this notion! where in the word of God can be found one scintilla of authority for it? It is a wicked obliteration of all the teachings of holy scripture, and substituting "for doctrines, the commandments of men." In a previous article, it was argued, that it laid profane hands upon the ordinances of God's house; that it superseded baptism; that it erased confirmation, the Eucharist, orders and all the positive institutions of the Gospel covenant. As an instance of the practical operation of this thing, an intelligent gentleman in one of the dissenting denominations, had been a communicant seven years, and had never been baptized. He was brought to his senses by the perusal of a sermon by one of the bishops of The Church. Why desire baptism, if sin is already pardoned, and the converted sinner assured, that God is reconciled, and that he is safe? I can but regard this notion as a stroke of policy; an attempt to make amends for radical defects in organization; defects to be repaired only by the renunciation of darling systems, and the return to the apostolic folds. A melancholy end resulting from this doctrine is, that persons of thought and discernment are often made skeptical by it. The writer of this communication had once a memorable instance of this tendency. A young man was conversing with him upon camp-following singular narrative, quoted by the (London) Gleaner, is taken from a note to the new edition of Sharon Turner's "Sacred History of the World." It is a communication from Sir Claude Wade to the editor.—ED. BAN.

"The impression entertained by the author that the total cessation of bodily action, internal and external, which is usually the accompaniment of death, is not its infallible token, nor inseparably accompanied by it, is countenanced by the very curious performance of the celebrated Hindoo fakeer, mentioned by the Hon. Captain Osborne in his work upon the Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh, as having allowed himself to be buried in a chest under ground at Lahore, and as having been brought again to life when disinterred at the end of forty days. Captain Osborne appears in the first instance to have had no reason to suspect the real occurrence of the fact, extraordinary as it was; but he states that on the proposition being made to the fakeer, that he should be buried again in a similar manner for one week, with the conditions that the chest he was enclosed in should have two padlocks, the key of one of which should be in Captain Osborne's keeping, and that the place of his interment should be watched by sentries from the guard by which the English embassy was attended, he objected to the proposed arrangement, and declined to make the trial on such terms. Captain Osborne adds, however, that shortly afterwards the fakeer sent to signify his consent to what had been proposed to him; but that his consent being accompanied by the declaration that he was sure the object of the English officers was to destroy him, the latter did not think themselves justified in being parties to an experiment which they thought certain to prove fatal.

"The following statement of the circumstances attendant on the previous interment of the fakeer spoken of by Captain Osborne, has been kindly communicated to me by Sir Claude M. Wade, then political resident at Loodianah, and chief agent of the English Government at Runjeet Singh's court, with permission to insert it here. The well-known ability and character of Sir Claude Wade not only guarantee the certainty of the facts which his account relates, but give great force and doctri to the conclusion which he appears to have come to, St. Pl at however hard to explain the causes or means of the ance, s extraordinary performance, there is no reason to doubt gift of ty.—

After our examination, and when we had seated ourselves in the verandah opposite the door, some of Rujeet Singh's people dug away the mud wall, and one of his officers broke the seal and opened the padlock. On the door being thrown open nothing but a dark room was to be seen. Runjeet Singh and I then entered it, in company with the servant of the fakeer. A light was brought, and we descended about three feet below the floor of the room, into a sort of cell, into which a wooden box, about four feet long by three broad, with a square sloping roof, containing the fakeer, was placed upright, the door of which had also a padlock and seal similar to that on the outside. On opening it we saw a figure enclosed in a bag of white linen, drawn together and fastened by a string over the head, on the exposure of which a grand salute was fired and the surrounding multitude came crowding to the door to see the spectacle. After they had gratified their curiosity, the fakeer's servant, putting his arms into the box, took the figure of his master out; and closing the door, placed it with his back against the door, exactly as he had been squatted like a Hindoo idol, in the box itself. Runjeet Singh and I then descended into the cell, which was so small that we were only able to sit on the ground in front, and so close to the body as to touch it with our hands and knees. The servant then began pouring warm water over the figure; but as my object was to watch if any fraudulent practice could be detected, I proposed to Runjeet Singh to tear open the bag, and have a perfect view of the body before any means of resuscitation were attempted. I accordingly did so; and may here remark that the bag, when first seen by us, looked mildewed, as if it had been buried for some time. The legs and arms of the the body were shrivelled and stiff, the face full as in "life, and the head reclining on the shoulder like that of a corpse. I then called to the medical gentleman who was attending me to come down and inspect the body, which he did, but could discover no pulsation in the heart, the temples, or the arms. There was however, a heat about the region of the brain which no other part of the body exhibited. The servant then recommenced bathing him with hot water, and gradually relax- ing his arms and legs from the rigid state in which they were contracted, Runjeet Singh taking his right and his left leg to aid by friction in restoring them to their proper action, during which time the servant placed a hot wheaten cake about an inch thick, on the top of the head—a process which he twice or thrice repeated. He then pulled out of his nostrils and ears the wax and cotton plugs with which they were stopped, and after great exertion opened his mouth by inserting the point of a knife between his teeth, and while holding his jaws open with his left hand, drew the tongue forward with the forefinger of his right, in the course of which the tongue flew back several times to its curved position upwards, that in which it had originally been placed, so as to close the gullet. He then rubbed his eyelids with ghee (clarified butter) for some time, until he succeeded in opening them, when the eyes appeared quite motionless and glazed. After the cake had been applied for the third time to the top of his head, the body was convulsively heaved, the nostrils became violently inflated, respiration ensued, and the limbs began to assume a natural fullness; but the pulsation was still only very faintly perceptible. The servant then put some of the ghee on his tongue, and made him swallow it. A few minutes afterwards, the eyeballs becoming slowly dilated, recovered their natural colour; and the fakeer recognising Runjeet Singh sitting close by him, articulated in a low sepulchral tone scarcely audible, "Do you believe me now?" Runjeet Singh replied in the affirmative, and then began investing the fakeer with a pearl necklace, a superb pair of gold bracelets, shawls, and pieces of silk and muslin, forming what is called a khalat, such as is usually conferred by the princes of India on persons of distinction. From the time of the box being opened to the recovery of the voice, not more than half an hour could have elapsed; and in another half an hour the fakeer talked with myself and those about him, freely though feebly, like a sick person, and we then left him, convinced that there had been no fraud or collusion in the exhibition which we had witnessed.

"I was present also when the fakeer was summoned by Rujeet Singh to Lahore, from a considerable distance, some months afterwards, to again bury himself alive before Captain Osborne and the officers of the late Sir William Macnaughten's mission in 1834, which after the usual preparation, he offered to do for a few days; but the term of Sir W. Macnaughten's mission having nearly elapsed, some doubts were expressed and observations made by Captain Osborne as to keeping the key of the room in which he was to be buried in his own possession, which the fakeer, with the superstitious dread of an Indian, considered ominous of his fate. He became alarmed that, if once within Captain Osborne's power, he would not escape alive. His refusal on that occasion will naturally induce a suspicion of the truth of the transaction as witnessed by myself; but to those who are well acquainted with the character of the natives of India it will not be surprising that, where life and death were concerned, the fakeer should have manifested a distrust of what to him appeared the mysterious intentions of an European, who was a perfect stranger to him, when he was ready to repose implicit confidence in Rujeet Singh, myself, and others, before whom he had exhibited. I am satisfied that he refused only from the cause I have mentioned, and that he would have done for me what he declined doing for Captain Osborne. It had previously been observed also, by Sir W. Macnaughten and others of the party, and very truly though jestingly, that if the fakeer should not have survived the trial to which he was required to submit, those who might instigate him to it would run the risk of being indicted for murder, which induced them to refrain from pressing the subject farther. I share entirely in the apparent incredibility of the fact of a man being buried alive, and surviving the trial, after various periods of duration; but, however incompatible with our knowledge of physiology, in the absence of any actual proof to the contrary, I am bound to declare my belief in the facts which I have represented, however impossible their existence may appear to others. I took some pains to inquire into the mode by which such a result was effected, and was informed that it rested on a doctrine of the Hindoo physiologists, that heat constitutes the self-existent principle of life, and that if the other functions are so far destroyed as to leave that one in its perfect purity, life could be sustained for considerable lengths of time, independently of air, food, or any other means of sustenance. To produce such a state the patients are obliged to go through a very severe preparation. How far such means are calculated to produce such effects physiologists will be better able to judge than I can pretend to do. I merely state what I saw and heard; and think, when we consider the incredulity and ridicule with which some of the most wonderful discoveries of modern times have been regarded—viz., galvanism, Harvey's system of the circulation of the blood, mesmerism, &c.—that it is presumptuous in any of us to deny to the Hindoos the possible discovery or attainment of an art which has hitherto escaped the researches of European science."

Ever bear in mind, that thou hast been born into the world for this end, to do good to thyself and to all others, as far as possible, on all occasions.

It is marvellous to behold, as the excellent Bishop Andrewes observes, how from the laver of regeneration, to the administration of the Vaticum, this Good Spirit helpeth us, and poureth His benefits upon us; having a grace for every season. When we are troubled with erroneous opinions, He is the Spirit of truth; when assaulted with temptations, He is the Spirit of Holiness; when dissipated with worldly vanity, He is the Spirit of compunction; when broken with worldly sorrow, He is the Holy Ghost the Comforter. It is He, who, after having regenerated us in our baptism, confirms us by the imposition of hands; renews us to repentance when we fall away; teaches us all our life long, what we know not; puts us in mind of what we forget; stirs us up when we are dull; helps us in our prayers; relieves us in our infirmities; consoles us in our heaviness; gives signs of joy in the darkest night of sorrow; seals us to the day of redemption; and raises us up again in the last day; when that which was sown in grace shall be reaped in glory; and the work of sanctification in spirit, soul, and body, shall be completed.—Bishop Horne.

I can but regard this notion as a stroke of policy; an attempt to make amends for radical defects in organization; defects to be repaired only by the renunciation of darling systems, and the return to the apostolic folds. A melancholy end resulting from this doctrine is, that persons of thought and discernment are often made skeptical by it. The writer of this communication had once a memorable instance of this tendency. A young man was conversing with him upon camp-meetings, and unhesitatingly declared that he had no faith in them, or in any thing connected with christianity; and he had been brought to this conclusion by the following train of circumstances. He had been a very wicked man, and at a camp-meeting was brought under conviction; he went into the altar, and continued under powerful emotions for some days; at length, the mind began to rally its powers; the feelings became more tranquil, and when asked how he felt, he replied that he was rather less depressed, that he was more tranquil. He was told that he was converted; this was just that which he had most earnestly desired, and when thus informed he became happy; and when at length he was assured that no man had ever better grounds to predicate the assurance of pardon and acceptance, than he had, his transport overleaped all bounds, and he became frantic with delight; in this frame he continued as long as the appliances of shouting and singing were kept up; but upon retiring to the solitude of his own thoughts and feelings and looking into his mind for grounds upon which to rest his hopes, and finding nothing upon which to fasten, being wholly unable to "give a reason of the hope that was in" him, he relapsed into moody skepticism, and to all human appearance it was utterly impossible to reclaim him. This unhappy condition was but a legitimate effect of a ruinous cause; he had been told by persons to whom he had learned to defer, that no man had ever a better ground for hope than had he; that no man had ever a more happy conversion; and by this rule, he adjudged christianity; he well knew, that he had nothing upon which to rely for eternal life, and if none had a better hope, there was nothing in the gospel upon which to rest one's hopes of happiness hereafter. And this is but one of the very many instances of overturned hope, of perverted faith. When men go away from the gospel, and fashion out some theory that has in it nothing akin to revealed truth, they must needs err. The doctrine has been recently promulgated, that religious truth is constantly developing; that systems of faith now held in certain quarters, are nearer the standard of perfection than when the gospel came from the hands of Christ and His disciples. I ask, Mr. Editor, whether the credit of originating this theory is due to Mr. Newman? Had not the sects long since taught it?

Agreeably to this doctrine, it is impossible for any one desirous of doing the will of God, and being embraced within the covenant of grace, to know the grounds of his hope. St. Peter, when asked by the first converts, what they should do to be saved, spake to them not in an unknown tongue, but clearly pointed out the way of salvation, "Repent and be baptized for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." Let us imagine that St. Peter had held the novel doctrine now taught, and when asked of the plan of salvation, that he had told them to come and prostrate themselves before him, that he might pray for them; that after being deeply convicted, for a greater or less time, God would speak pardon to them, and that their feelings would recoil and be happy, what reliance, I ask, could they have placed upon this test? What a multitude of causes, stealing into the mind might have produced the effect, and God the Holy Ghost have had no part in it? And if this be the mind of The Spirit now, it had surely been then. It was not then, and who so bold as to say a "change has come over the divine mind," and caused a thorough and radical alteration in the cardinal doctrine of conversion? This doctrine conflicts in every essential feature, with that taught by St. Peter and the other apostles. St. Peter spake of Repentance, and Baptism, and Confirmation, ("ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost.") This doctrine speaks of feeling only. I ask then, must it not be radically and ruinously defective?

Convocation of Northern Pennsylvania.

The Convocation held its Summer Session in Lewistown on the Juniata, during the 18th, 19th and 20th inst. The exercises commenced on Tuesday evening the 18th inst. The following members present, viz: Rev. Messrs. Natt, Clotworthy, Lightner, Morris, Field, Downing, Clark, and Heister, Rector of the parish. Evening prayers were read by Rev. Mr. Clark, the lessons by Rev. Mr. Field. The Convocation sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. C. Lightner, from 1 Cor. 9: 16.

On Wednesday morning, divine service was performed by Rev. Mr. Clotworthy reading prayers, Rev. Mr. Morris the lessons, and Rev. Mr. Downing the ante communion service. The Rev. Mr. Clotworthy preached; and the Holy Communion was administered, on request of the Rector, by Rev. Mr. Clark, assisted by Rev. Mr. Downing.

In the afternoon, the Rev. Mr. Field read prayers, the Rev. Mr. Clark the lessons. Addresses were then delivered by the Rev. Messrs. Downing and Lightner, and the benediction was pronounced by the Rev. Mr. Clark.

At the third service, the Rev. Mr. Lightner read evening prayers, and Rev. Mr. Clark preached.

On Thursday morning, prayer was read by Rev. Mr. Field, and the Lessons by Rev. Mr. Clotworthy. The Rev. Mr. Downing preached.

In the afternoon, the Rev. Mr. Morris read the prayers and lessons. The Rev. Mr. Lightner addressed the children of the parish, and was followed by the Rev. Mr. Clark in an address to the congregation on the subject of Christian education.

At night, the Rev. Mr. Clark read divine service, and the Rev. Mr. Morris preached. The services were closed, at the request of the Rector, by an address from the Rev. Mr. Clark, who also pronounced the benediction.

The private sessions of the Convocation were held during the intervals of divine worship, and were full with interest and instruction. Muncy was selected as the place for the autumnal session; our special convocations were ordered for the present quarter, at Philipsburgh and Lewisburgh and Milton. The Rev. Messrs. Natt, Clotworthy, Heister, and Field, were deputed to the former, and the Rev. Messrs. Lightner, Downing, Marple, Morris, and Clark, to the latter.

A resolution was adopted to endeavour to procure through the Bishop, from churchmen in the city, one hundred dollars for the present year, towards regular services in Milton and Lewisburgh. Milton is an old parish, but has long been considered as defunct; through the unwearied exertions of the Rev. Mr. Morris, a congregation has been gathered together, and a prospect is opened for a resuscitation of the parish. The prospect at Lewisburgh is also a bright one. Will not a few churchmen hand in the sum to the Bishop with reference to these two points? We can engage that no better appropriation of this sum could be made.

The value and efficiency of these convocations, are now beginning to be seen. As regards this whole district of country, the convocation is missionary in its character; as regards each particular parish, it lends the countenance and sympathy of the other clergy to the Rector; and as regards ourselves they are means of improvement, and tend to refresh us by mutual counsel for the work to which we are set apart. But for it, isolated as we are from each other, we should seldom enjoy the pleasure of social intercourse. As it is, we meet at least each quarter, and thus ensure that intercourse four times in the year. Will not our friends in other places, pray for us while thus engaged?

Essays on the Rubric.

Mine be the task, unfainting to aspire
To illustrate the Rubric, that among
Our modern Churchmen is too little known
The purest laws upheld, my spirit bless,
With joys that change not in the circling years.

DUNLIN.

It has been considered that citizens of a free state should be instructed in that polity, whereby they have arrived at greatness, so that their actions might be conformable to the wisdom of their laws. Since such an opinion prevailed, the administrators of the laws were bound especially to a perfect acquaintance with them; and as an incentive to perseverance, rewards were offered suited to the dignity of the subject. Wherefore judges being in a free state fitly chosen, were of integrity more spotless than their ermined robe, not daring to violate what they had sworn so solemnly to administer with purest virtue. Now though they considered custom as the source of common law, founded as it was on right reason, would they regard another species of custom arising from a sensual nature as a sufficient excuse for the abrogation of the former.

In temporal matters the rewards being more tangible, and the violation of the laws destructive of the very bonds of society, caused even the general community to watch their observance with the utmost rigor. For so did it interest mankind to live in the enjoyment of their own labors uninjured by the crafty or the powerful, that they allowed not a vicious inclination to give rise to a degenerate custom. If then there were any so foolhardy as to allege custom for a violation of any law existing on the Statute Book, they were soon shown that the law remained in force by being condemned to pay its penalty. Nay even in acts passed in a barbarous age, when might prevailing over right, gave a color to injustice, a reasonable custom was not allowed to abrogate an injurious law; for it remained in force until repealed, and the penalty was adjudged though afterwards forgiven.

Singular is it that in affairs of the highest moment, exceeding the former in as great a degree as the spiritual surpasses the material, the same firmness should not be shown, nor the same integrity so highly prized. For surely in earthly laws regarding this present life alone, the end sought is temporal; the good desired a free and happy life; the reward momentary and limited to a few years of short existence; but in laws spiritual, divine, or ecclesiastical, the end is the noblest that can be conceived, since it raises the soul from this footstool of the Creator's throne to the sense of his surpassing glory, and unites it with the choir of angels and redeemed; the good so sought is an eternal life of utmost happiness; the reward an amaranthine crown of brightest joy.

Wherefore these divine laws were not, as human, left to the unaided light of reason, but required supernatural means to make our natural understanding apprehend their God-like truth. Nor could our corrupted nature by any act observe the supernatural law, or gain its primeval purity; therefore was required a sinless sacrifice to remove our original sin, even the Lord Jesus, who came into the world to save sinners. Through that atonement so incomparable the Holy Spirit aided in the grand work of Redemption, bringing light out of darkness, purity from corruption, and heavenly peace from the tempestuous war of struggling passions.

Since these laws ecclesiastical, ordained material ordinances for the advancement of our compound nature to the invisible and eternal good, they were not instituted without the sanction of the Holy Spirit, the author of order and not disorder in all churches governed by Apostles or Bishops, and preserving the fundamental principles of Christian doctrine.

In the earliest periods the priesthood was so highly valued, that kings and chiefs secured their tyranny by the influence it gave them over the minds of men; and in the Jewish polity it was the most glorious and highly honoured of all stations. As the Christian dispensation exceeded the Mosaic in importance and grandeur, so did the former surpass the latter in sublimity of rites and simple majesty. Wherefore on the establishment of Christianity by Constantine, the Bishops of the Church ranked even with Princes; and so highly did their office exceed the judicial, that some celebrated fathers of the Church were advanced from the station of a judge to the more eminent dignity of a bishop. For it was justly thought that one, who had faithfully administered human laws, would with the same fidelity uphold the divine.

Considering therefore in these purer ages of the Church, that stations of ecclesiastical dignity, required men of devoted energy, of simple habits and unimpeachable lives, they proposed temporal rewards for the purpose rather of adorning their station than recompensing their labours. For those noble spirits, honored throughout all time, the halo of whose sanctity still beams on a darker and more degenerate age, sought not the mitre for its earthly splendour, but so lived in the enjoyment of wealth and honour, as to check by the influence of their station the progress of depravity, and by their unwearied labours arouse men to a sense of their high calling.

The christian community being ardent in love, and earnest in zeal for heavenly things, perceived then that an ecclesiastical polity was of the utmost importance to their spiritual welfare, and when by their own consent to apostolic tradition, they had agreed on requisite forms, they obliged these by every law both civil and divine to be observed. The stewards of the mysteries of God being members of an eternal priesthood, were bound by the most solemn oaths, swearing even on the sacred elements to hold intact the constitutions of the Church, and see that they were observed by others.

College of St. James, Washington County, Maryland.

The next session will begin on Monday, October 2d, when all the students are requested to attend punctually. New students may then present themselves for examination and will be admitted into any class for which they may be qualified.

THE GRAMMAR SCHOOL will also re-open on the same day. Pupils who have acquired the elements of English and are twelve years of age are received into the grammar school and prepared for admission into the college.

The course of studies in the grammar school and in the college is full and thorough, and the location and discipline of the institution are highly conducive to industry and order.

A mercantile course of study is provided for those who desire it.

Application for the admission of pupils or for further information may be made to

"PEACE ON EARTH, GOOD WILL TOWARD MEN."—From the conduct and language of some, who would be highly insulted by any doubt of their christian character, we never would argue that "the tongues of angels" announced in the above words one of the great results of a Saviour's birth.

Although personal differences are allowed among christians to an extent altogether at variance with their high profession, these are trifling when compared with the animosities, actually cultivated by some as the proper growth of a patriotic spirit, which exist between christian nations. There never was a time in the history of this country, when it seemed more important to impress upon the public mind the duty and the blessing of "peace on earth, good will toward men." The martial spirit of our people has been roused by a successful war, attended with brilliant victory and conquest. The evils, the sad, the bitter woes which have resulted are hidden in the desolate homes where the afflicted mourn in silence. The public ear hears only the shouts with which a grateful nation welcomes back her heroes, the public eye sees but the garlands and the triumphal arches and the glittering processions. There is great danger now that this nation, which has prospered by using "the ploughshare and the pruning hook," may be tempted to exchange these peaceful implements for "the sword and the spear." It is now the duty of the christian patriot to encourage thoughts of peace, and to set forth, on every proper occasion, the duty of all who deserve the christian name, of striving to advance that blessed spirit which makes this its motto in all the relations of life, "GLORY TO GOD IN THE HIGHEST, ON EARTH PEACE, GOOD WILL TOWARD MEN."

Under these impressions, we have the greatest pleasure in publishing whatever seems likely to strengthen and extend this desire for peace, this feeling of "good will" toward other nations. And as there is no nation of the earth with which this country is more intimately connected, so it should be our highest aim to cultivate this mutual feeling between our country and Great Britain. A common Faith, a common language, and a common interest bind us in ties of love which should never again be broken. It was thus that we hailed with peculiar pleasure the address delivered at Burlington College on the fourth of July, because it spoke the sentiments worthy of Christianity, of philanthropy, and of patriotism. We have rejoiced to see the spirit with which that address has been received in all our religious journals. And with the same feelings we give the following extracts.

The Protestant Churchman, in its editorial correspondence, after describing the various points of interest on Lake Champlain, associated with the history of the last war with Great Britain, adds:—"But enough of war, and its monuments. These monuments mark a time which we trust has gone by forever. Never more, we believe in struggle, but ever in concord, in brotherly strife for good, in a noble emulation to bless the world in upholding the reign of peace, shall England and America contend together."

The writer then quotes from Bishop Doane's Address, with the accompanying remarks, the noble ode of Washington Allston, already given in the Banner.

"The Christian Witness" introduces an extract from the late speech of our minister, Mr. Bancroft, at the meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society, with the following excellent remarks.

The speech of Mr. Bancroft is we think worthy of the representative of this nation. He speaks words becoming a christian, a philanthropist, a patriot, because they are words which will tend to produce "PEACE ON EARTH, GOOD WILL TOWARD MEN."

The following are the remarks of "the Christian Witness."

"ENGLAND.—If we were to believe one half of what is written and said in England, and repeated in this country, in respect to English institutions, we should conclude that this 'Isle of the sea' was any thing but the 'home of the free'; that her civil and religious institutions rested like a dead weight upon the people, crushing their energies and exhausting that spirit of enterprise and independence, which is a vital element in the character of a people who would rise to the full enjoyment of their rights, and hold a commanding position among the nations of the earth. Few nations are more frequently and more unjustly misrepresented than England. She has her faults,—but with them all, she raises her head far, very far above all other countries. She extends her arms, until she holds in her embrace, territories on which the sun never sets. She has a moral and an intellectual power, by which she holds a proud pre-eminence, from which no nation can dislodge her. Enjoying such distinction, her faults, like those of a great man, become all the more conspicuous, by reason of her peerless greatness. Her defects are multiplied and magnified, until to the view of some, they eclipse her excellencies; and England is held up as a mother, who in her pride and self-will, neglects to provide for the temporal and spiritual wants of her own children. There are reforms which it would be vastly for her benefit to make, and we hope that the day is not far distant, when they will be made. There are mischief-making men there, as there are everywhere. These people find great fault with both Church and State. This class of men are radicals and agitators there, and so they would be radicals and agitators any where on the face of the earth, among either civilized or uncivilized men, unless from either fear or selfishness, they should think it good policy to be quiet. We have but recently had a remarkable demonstration of the state of popular feeling in London, on the part of the middling class, the bone and sinew of the nation, in putting down the Chartists, men, who, for the want of better employment, spend their money and waste their time in a foolish attempt to sweep away the principles of the English government, and to overthrow her time-honored institutions.

It is an interesting fact, that many Americans, who are republicans by birth and education, and who, as they ought to be, are devotedly attached to the free institutions of their own country, who scorn all notions of a titled nobility, and sneer at any union of the Church and State, when they visit England, are agreeably surprised by what they see about them. They behold, strange as it may appear, liberty in the State, and religion in the Church: something besides a cold formalism in the one, and an oppressive aristocracy in the other. The testimony of some of the ministers of the denominations around us, who have visited England, as to the state of the Church, and the piety and zeal of its members, is truly gratifying.

And we are glad to know that American politicians of the most radical school, are not so blind but that they can see clearly the liberty which the English enjoy, and in terms not to be misunderstood, can openly speak their admiration of what they see. Our present minister at the Court of St. James, who, as a politician, before he went to England, was ranked among the most radical, spoke at a meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society, on the 14th ult., after the following manner, as reported in the London Times of the 15th."

We prefer giving the whole speech as we find it in the (London) Guardian. [ED. OF BAN.]

The speech of Mr. Bancroft was full of elegant compliment, just sufficiently practical to come home to his hearers with a tact that seems to be equally the gift of all American speakers. In proposing the health of the President elect, he spoke as follows:—

"I esteem it not as any thing personal to myself but as an evidence on the part of the farmers of Yorkshire that you too, like the farmers of every other part of England which it has been my lot to visit—that you too cherish the sentiment of friendship and regard for that other nation beyond the Atlantic—(Loud cheers)—where Chatham's language is the mother tongue. (Continued cheering.) But let me seize the opportunity to express my grateful sense of the cordial welcome which I, in connexion with others, have received in Yorkshire. The invitation of your president brought me on a pilgrimage to this far-famed and world-renowned valley of Mowbray—to this land of abbeys, and I, in common with others, can testify that if the old monasteries are crumbled to the dust, the spirit of hospitality still survives, and has lost nothing of its strength. And to what an entertainment have we been invited? We assemble at the base of the most stupendous monument ever reared by the genius, the delicate taste, and the religious sentiment of our ancestors—(Loud cheers)—and which has been so carefully restored and preserved by the pious zeal of their posterity. Indeed, it seems as if centuries themselves descended round about us to welcome this living and moving panorama of the industrious of the English of to-day—it seems as if the centuries of the past welcomed the results of your farming husbandry—results which it would be idle to speak of as surpassing the beehives which grazed on the hills of the Palatine, or the snow white bulls which of yore graced the hecatombs of pagan Rome. You yourselves, coming together from all parts of England to witness the exhibition here made—you yourselves, farmers of the country which, beyond all others, excels in farming, are astonished as you contemplate the stock that is exhibited, in seeing what can be produced by the skill, the emulation, and the perseverance of the British farmer. Nor may I omit to add my mite of admiration of the wonderful results of the ingenuity of this people as exhibited in the yard where the implements have been shown, and which have been accomplished by the workmen of this ingenious nation, enjoying the blessings of liberty without restraint, and living in a climate which, for all you may say of it, is one of the very best in the world. It is surpassed by no climate in avoiding the excesses of heat and cold, and being on that account, above all things, friendly to industry. And I, too, as I come here, must add my sentiment of joy in my presence here, as bringing with it a reminiscence of home; for on the other side of the Atlantic we love the cities we establish and the towns we plant, we love to give to our villages that mark the line in which the English language proceeds towards the Pacific names that remind us of our ancient home. The beautiful emporium of American commerce, the city that gems the ocean side—that more than any other binds together the two hemispheres—takes for its name that of this city, and is a "new" York—(Cheers)—where people are not likely to forget the ties of consanguinity. And thus I am led by the manner in which you assent to these sentiments of friendship to congratulate myself, and to congratulate you, that we live in an age when nations exult in the prosperity of one another. I rejoice that we live in an age when, of all the trees that are planted in the ground, the husbandman of all lands invokes the choicest blessing of Providence on the tree of peace, praying that its roots may strike to the very centre of the earth, and that it may be so firmly rooted that its boughs may but rustle in the breeze of the stormiest revolutions. (Loud and reiterated cheers.)—It is with these sentiments and with this feeling I stand before you to-day. The kindness of your president has favored me with a toast, but I do not in putting myself forward as a diplomatist, speak as a privileged spy. (Laughter.) I can only say that any one who comes from any quarter of the world to spy out the nakedness of the land of England will have to go home again for his pains. He will find here nothing but an united people—(loud cheers)—he will see nothing but a nation that loves English liberties, and is determined to maintain and advance them, under the influence of judgment and reason and the public will. (Loud cheers.) He will see nothing but society in the firmest arch in which the keenest eye cannot detect a crevice. And I, gentlemen, speaking as an American—speaking as the representative of my country, tell you that we rejoice in your prosperity. I should be denounced by my country if I did not utter that sentiment. I tell you that the greatest delight I have had in this my happy visit to this far famed valley—this wide, rich, vastly extended valley, which has not its rival till you pass the Alps, and come upon the valley of Lombardy—I tell you the greatest pleasure I have had in this visit is to see that every where the fruits of your industry are likely to be rewarded—to see everywhere your teeming fields promise you a redeeming harvest before which the sorrows of the past year, which I too witnessed, will pass away like the shadow of a summer's cloud. (Loud and continued cheering.) I think I have in my eye the architect of the bridge over the river Conway. I shall say, then, in reference to the industry and perseverance of the English people, that their prosperity is assured; it is like the beautiful bridge over the Conway, which, by the heaviest burdens that can be imposed upon it, does not bend so much but that the first gleam of heaven's sunshine restores it to its true level."

Foreign Intelligence.

There is little ecclesiastical intelligence of general interest brought by the last steamer.

We take the following from the "English Churchman."

"On Tuesday last, Archdeacon Manning held his Visitation, in Chichester Cathedral, of that portion of the Archdeaconry which comprises the Deaneries of Boxgrove and Midhurst. There was an unusually large attendance of persons not actually summoned to the Visitation, owing partly to the desire of seeing again one who had necessarily been so long absent from ill-health, and partly from the expectation that late events would invest the Archdeacon's charge with more even than the great interest which commonly attaches to it. Nor had we any reason to be disappointed. The Charge, which occupied nearly two hours in delivery, contained a most luminous exposition of the question of Dr. Hampden's appointment to the See of Hereford, especially of its practical bearings upon the position and prospects of the English Church. The Archdeacon dwelt also at great length upon the present condition of the Catholic Church, and the attitude assumed towards it by the temporal powers, dwelling especially upon the position of the English Church as at present affected and as likely to be affected by the Government of the day. It would be a great injustice, however, to attempt any detailed notice of the Charge, and as it is likely soon to appear in print, it is much better that no unauthorized report of it should go forth, especially considering the nature of the subjects of which it treats."

Amid all the disturbances of Church and State, the churchmen of England are carrying on noble works of practical charity.

We give below the account of one, whose object though apparently an humble one, will indeed have an important influence. We need such institutions on this side of the Atlantic, and we trust it may not be long ere the noble example thus given us of Christian zeal and devotion, may be faithfully followed.

TRAINING INSTITUTION FOR NURSES.

A distinguished though not a numerous meeting was held, at the Hanover-square rooms, on Thursday afternoon, for the purpose of originating an institution for the training of nurses, and the encouragement of acts of pious charity, upon the system of the Sœurs de la Charité. The Duke of Cambridge presided, and Lord Nelson, Earl Harrowby, and the Bishops of London, Norwich, Salisbury, and Manchester were present.

The Duke of Cambridge briefly indicated the objects of the society, and promised it his earnest support—

"As in the general hospitals of London but very indifferent nurses are to be found, chiefly from the difficulty of getting efficient ones, he felt sure that the institution would be of immense benefit to the sick poor of London, while it would give opportunities to ladies of the higher orders of society to exercise works of charity and mercy. The plan was commenced some time ago by a German clergyman, and the King of Prussia is now at the head of a large establishment of the kind in Berlin."

The Bishop of London completed the programme—

"There is a very flourishing Protestant institution of the kind on the banks of the Rhine, but is intended to take as a model that in the Canton de Vaud, Switzerland. He wished to see women, urged by the religious feelings alone, giving free scope to their desires, uninterested as far as worldly matters are concerned—devoting themselves to attendance upon the sick and helpless—in a word, he wished to see the Protestant Sisters of Charity. But in the present institution no vows will be required, no poverty, no celibacy, no cloistered seclusion, no veil and superstitious forms, no tyranny over will or conscience. The woman acting will be, in all respects, a free agent. In training these nurses they must have the range of public hospitals; but in this he was sure no difficulty would be felt, for, from his knowledge of the hospitals, the officers would willingly assist and give every facility in their power. He moved a resolution concluding with the statement, that 'it is to be expected that women of the middle and upper classes will cheerfully devote a portion of their time to the welfare of society and the Divine glory, by administering to the wants and relieving the sufferings of those who are in sickness.'"

Earl Nelson seconded the resolution, which was adopted unanimously.

The Bishop of Salisbury moved—

"That an institution be now formed for training nurses for hospitals, families, and the poor; to be founded on the principles of the Church of England, and to be under the presidency and pastoral superintendence of the Lord Bishop of the diocese."

His lordship expressed his hearty concurrence in the objects of the institution, and urged, as a reason for its establishment on Church principles, the unanimity which such a system would induce among the inmates of the establishment, which would take the place of that difference and dissension that must always arise when persons of different sects of religion were in the constant habit of meeting.

The Rev. Dr. Wordsworth seconded the resolution. He believed that this institution would give the opportunity which many women longed for, of leaving the forms of fashionable life for the fresh luxury of doing good to their fellow-creatures. If such a safety-valve had existed some time ago, there would not be those yearnings for another Church. If ladies thus devoted themselves to attending upon the sick and consoling the afflicted, they would give a dignity to a profession now resorted to only by the lowest orders.

The Earl of Harrowby felt jealous that the Church of Rome only had an institution for attending to the moral and physical wants of the sick. We had borrowed from that Church its system of hospitals, endowments, and colleges, and why not borrow its Sisters of Charity?

The Bishop of Norwich moved a resolution appointing the members of council for the new institution:—

"He regretted that obstacles had been placed in the way of the institution, founded upon prejudices which he could not too highly deprecate. The first objection which had been made was that Les Sœurs de la Charité was a Roman Catholic Institution, and therefore was unfit to be adopted by a Protestant community. He, for his part, would take anything from the Church of Rome that was good; and would even adopt a Mahomedan institution, if it was acceptable to, and could be interwoven with, our own faith. The next objection was that it was a proselyting system. He denied that it was so, but saw no objection, even if such was the fact, for it would be securing converts to the right side. He had watched the Sœurs de la Charité on the continent, and had always felt humiliated in the presence of those ladies, because this country was without so useful an institution. He concluded by expressing his hope that from that moment he would find the Sisters of Charity of the Church of England doing as much good as the Sœurs de la Charité of the Church of Rome."

Dr. Todd, M.D., seconded the resolution. He expressed, on the part of the medical profession, their willingness to co-operate in the movement. The resolution was adopted.

The Bishop of Manchester moved the appointment of trustees for the funds. He was willing to co-operate with the Roman Catholics in all that was good, and did not object to the nature of the proposed institution because it had its origin among the professors of that religion.

The Earl of Harrowby briefly seconded the resolution.

All the resolutions were passed unanimously, and a vote of thanks to the Duke of Cambridge concluded the proceedings.

[In reference to the above meeting, the following, written previous to its taking place, urging the claims of the institution upon our readers, may form an appropriate context.]

The object proposed by this institution is of a nature demanding our sympathies, and led us to make inquiries that have fully borne out our prepossessions in its favour, and determined us to cordially recommend it to the warm support of our readers. The aims of the institution are set forth in the following paragraph of the prospectus. They will be:—

"To elevate the character of nurses by training them in a regular course, which shall fit them for their professional calling, and dispose them to discharge its duties in a trustworthy manner; and to hold out to them a prospect of a better social position than they could otherwise hope to attain; and to open a legitimate field of labour to those of a higher class who are ready to devote themselves to this work, as one of Christian love, without hope of earthly reward, and with more or less opportunity for employment of this description in exercises of piety and charity."

The institutions of "Sisters of Mercy" abroad, whether in Roman Catholic or Protestant countries, have often been appealed to, as supplying to our neighbours the fulfilment of a want long existent among ourselves. Scarcely a note book of a traveller on the continent has been published without drawing attention to the working of these societies in all parts of Europe, and drawing dark pictures of misery and woe, in which, "The Sister" stands out in bright relief, fulfilling the peculiar mission of women on earth—that of Mercy.

The Institution of Nurses is, at least, a beginning in the right direction, and sows the germs that will, with training bring forth blossoms full, we trust, of hope and charity. It is hardly to be anticipated that we should pledge ourselves to all the details of the plan which has, no doubt, been modified in many respects to meet the strong prejudices of the day—an expediency necessary to obtain a sufficient supply of funds from the grudging charity of an avaricious age. Yet, as it is rather in what is left undone than what is done that we should wish for alteration, there is every reason to believe that, with advancing maturity, a greater degree of perfection may be obtained.

The whole establishment is to be under the presidency of the Bishop of the Diocese, and will be managed by a resident master, a clergyman of the Church of England, who is also to be chaplain, and use the daily services of the Church. The members are to be divided into three classes, Probationers, Nurses and Sisters. The probationers are to be young women of the age of eighteen or upwards, who are to undergo training for two years, paying towards their board and lodging 10% to 15% per annum. The nurses are those who will attend the sick in hospitals, private houses, &c., under direction of the institution, who will remunerate them for their services. The remaining class is the one on which the success of the institution will depend, and we therefore extract from the circular the duties of its members at length:—

"Sisters—to whom, especially, the institution will look for the maintenance of a high moral and religious tone in the common family of the establishment, and, consequently, for the attainment of the important general objects which it has in view.

"They will either be resident in the establishment, in which case they will contribute 50% annually to it, and receive board, lodging, and washing within it; or they will live with their friends, or in some private family approved by the master.

"The resident Sisters will be admitted at not less than twenty-five years of age, and no one will be received as a sister without satisfactory testimonials of piety, industry, and zeal, from the minister of her parish.

"The resident Sisters, after six months' trial and approval, will be expected to continue in the institution for not less than two years.

"The duty of all the Sisters will be, to be examples to the two other classes; to visit the sick at their homes (as may be appointed by the lady superintendant), and in the hospitals, accompanied by one or more probationers; and to take part in the religious and other instruction and training of the probationers within the institution."

CONVENTION OF TENNESSEE.—We are much indebted to the kind correspondent who has given us the following interesting account of this Convention, and its attendant services.

Knoxville, Tenn., July 27th, 1848.

REV. AND DEAR SIR:—The twentieth annual Convention of the Diocese of Tennessee, met at this place in St. John's Church, on the 20th inst. Bishop Otey arrived here on last Thursday week in company with the Rev. Dr. Page, of Memphis, expecting to go on immediately to Greenville, a town of about 1000 inhabitants, some 75 miles east of this, where an interesting and promising parish has recently been organized. He received information however at this place, which induced him to abandon his intention, or rather I should say, to postpone his visit. He accordingly remained with us over Sunday. I rejoice to say that his health has materially improved within the last two months, and that there is good promise of its final restoration. Being now released from the responsibility and care of the Diocese of Mississippi, he will be able to devote himself more entirely to the church in Tennessee, to building up its waste places, and strengthening it at points where it is already established.

On Thursday morning, at 9 o'clock, the Convention met in St. John's church, the Bishop presiding. The number of delegates present was very small indeed. It consisted of the Rev. Dr. Page of Memphis, Rev. Dr. Wheat of Nashville, Rev. J. W. Rogers of Franklin, and the Rev. Thos. W. Humes of Knoxville, of the clergy, and five lay delegates from the two parishes of Knoxville and Greenville. Little else was done in the morning besides organizing the Convention. At noon the number of clergy was increased by the arrival of the Rev. Mr. Fagg of La Grange, and the Rev. Chas. Tones of St. Louis, Mo., who was the first rector and the founder of the parish. It would be difficult at a distance to account for the thin attendance at the Convention. But you will understand, that Knoxville is separated by a distance of 200 miles from Nashville, which is the nearest point to it, where the church exists, (except at Greenville in East Tennessee, where there is yet no minister,) and that the intervening Cumberland mountains and the long and fatiguing ride over a rough and difficult country which must be made in order to reach Knoxville from places in the middle and western divisions of the State, are enough to deter delegates from attending. A Diocesan Convention had never been held in east Tennessee, and the interesting character of this section of the state, and the feeble condition of the church within its limits, induced the selection of Knoxville for the present year, in the expectation that the meeting would not be large. On Thursday night, the Convention Sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Page, from Ephesians, 3d chap. 8th verse. It was an eloquent exhibition of the dignity and responsibilities of the Christian ministry. He "magnified his office," and showed wherein its great duty consisted,—“to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ.” On Saturday morning, the Bishop consecrated St. John's Church to the worship of Almighty God. The weather was very inclement and prevented many from witnessing the ceremony who were desirous to do so. At the request of the Bishop, the instrument of donation was read without the chancel by the Hon. Wm. B. Reese, one of the vestry. The sentence of Consecration and Morning Prayer were read by Rev. T. W. Humes, and the sermon preached by the Rev. Chas. Tones of St. Louis. The Church building is an architectural gem. The style is Gothic, after a plan drawn by Mr. Renwick, the architect of Grace Church, New York. The body of the Church is about 50 feet long in the interior, by 35 wide; and affords about 250 sittings. The tower in front is some fifty feet high, affording a sufficient vestibule, which corresponds in size with the vestry room at the northern end of the Church. The chancel is arranged with a communion table of pine wood of elegant workmanship, and two plain, neat lecterns; and is separated from the vestry room behind, by a handsome altar screen. The font of simple pattern in marble, stands in front of the chancel railing and altar. A gallery runs across the building at the southern end, in the centre of which stands the organ; and on either side of it seats are provided for servants. The clergy present from a distance were delighted with the whole structure and arrangements, and esteem it a model worthy of imitation in the erection of country churches, where the means of the congregation will admit of it. The building is of brick, as I ought before to have stated, with a triple roof, open above, and all the wood work, including the pews, is of pine, which it is intended to stain and varnish. The entire cost of the building is about $4,000.

On Saturday afternoon the Bishop confirmed eleven persons, making fifty confirmations in all, since the organization of the Church, some four years since. The Bishop himself preached on this occasion, a most able and touching discourse. On Sunday morning, Mr. Frederick Elwell of Knoxville, and Mr. Lawson, recently of Vicksburg, Mississippi, were ordained to the Diaconate. Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Mr. Tones, and the Lessons by Rev. Mr. Fagg. Rev. T. W. Humes presented the candidates. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Wheat, and was a masterly presentation of the argument in favor of the existence of three orders in the ministry, and the doctrine of the Apostolic succession. Its effect upon the audience was of the most decided and happy character; and I am gratified to hear that the Dr., at the request of the young men of the congregation, has furnished a copy of it for publication.

The Convention before adjourning on Saturday morning, adjourned to meet at La Grange, about 50 miles south of Memphis, on the third Wednesday of May, 1849. The Bishop started on Monday last upon a visitation to Greenville, and the same day the other clergy left us for their homes in the west. The meeting has been indeed a most delightful one. It has been a meeting of brethren. No jarring, nor discord, nor strife, marked its progress. All was harmony and peace. And however undistinguished in other respects, it would be well if larger and more influential bodies would follow its example in these particulars, and "follow after the things which make for peace and things wherewith one may edify another." Let us pray, my dear brother, for the peace of Jerusalem, knowing that they shall prosper that love her. For our brethren and companions' sake, let us now say, Peace be within thee!

Yours truly and respectfully, T. W. H.

COMMENCEMENT OF TRINITY COLLEGE, HARTFORD.—On Thursday, the 3d inst., the annual commencement of Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., was held: thirteen young gentlemen received in course the degree of B. A.; and seven of its alumni, that of M. A. The Honorary M. A., was conferred upon John A. Merrick, a candidate for holy orders in Pennsylvania, and graduate of the Central High School; also upon the Rev. Samuel Chase. The honorary degree of D. D., was conferred upon the Rev. Thomas Atkinson, Rector of St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, and upon two Scottish prelates. The poem was read by the Rev. Dr. Croswell of Boston; and the oration was delivered by the Hon. D. D. Barnard.

We have been asked to publish the following statement.

EPISCOPAL FEMALE INSTITUTE.—The Trustees have appointed the following Teachers; others will be appointed when needed.

The Rev. J. A. VAUGHAN, D. D., Rector,
Prof. FELIX DROUIN, French,
Miss E. M. CRAFTS, First Department,
Miss E. BUTLER, Junior Department,
Miss M. E. AERTSEN, to assist at Recitations,
Mrs. HILL, Drawing.

With the exception of the teacher of the first department, the above are favourably known to large circles of friends in this city, and enjoy their entire confidence. Miss Crafts, who will have charge of the first department, possesses much experience and has for some time past discharged, most acceptably, the duties of teacher of the highest department of Rutgers' Institute, N. Y., a female Institution, numbering more than 500 pupils. A strong preference for a Church Institution induces Miss C. to relinquish an honourable and lucrative post to engage in the present undertaking. The tried abilities, experience, and Christian character of this lady claim for her the confidence of parents, and the love and respect of the pupils about to enter her department.

Rev. Wm. Bacon Stevens, D. D., having taken letters dismissory from the Diocese of Georgia to the Diocese of Pennsylvania, and having entered upon his duties as Rector of St. Andrew's Church, Philadelphia, requests that all letters and papers may be directed to him accordingly.

CORRECTION.—In the notice of "St. Jude's Church," last week, the cost of the building was stated to be $3,000. It should have been given as $8,000.

The Rev. Herman Hooker of this city, has received the Honorary Degree of D. D., from Union College, at its late commencement.

We take the following from the last English Churchman. We trust the admirable Review of which it speaks may receive the patronage here which is thus well bespoken for it.

THE CHRISTIAN REMEMBRANCER. No. LXI.—We are glad to observe that the Christian Remembrancer has added the name of an American publisher to its title-page. Connected as we are with the American Church, a review which in this way claims open affinities increases its prospects of usefulness. The tone and character of the Remembrancer is just that which will tell on the American character. Refined and speculative—with a line rather suggestive than ad populum—its circulation among the zealous and active Churchmen of the West will have peculiar advantages. The present number shows a considerable range of subjects.

Have no strife nor enmity with any body, and even though any injure thee, bear it patiently; for this is true greatness.

A friend has sent us the following letter for publication. It has been the custom, and an excellent one it is, to address a letter of this character to the students of this Institution a few days after they have left the College for their homes in vacation.

We are assured that many students have acknowledged the beneficial effects of these letters.

VACATION, 1848. TO THE STUDENTS OF THE COLLEGE OF ST. JAMES.

My dear young friends:—According to my usual custom, and the promise I made to you on the morning of our Commencement Day, I now send you the Annual Vacation-Letter. My reason for delaying it until you should have reached your homes and begun to feel settled for awhile, you have already heard. I feared that the letter, when given to you here, was sometimes thrust into a pocket or laid by in a trunk, and thus forgotten. Or, at best, that whatever good advice it contained was less felt and remembered than it would be if it came to you in the calm moments which succeed the excitement of your merry journey and happy arrival at home. I beg you all to give some of these and the other calm moments of your vacation to the perusal (more than once) of words of counsel which you know are dictated only by a desire to do you good.

Our "breaking up" was in all respects so pleasant and peaceful, that most or all of you will recur to it, and the useful and orderly session just concluded, with feelings which will make a voice from your academical home not unwelcome. We think that on the whole, this has been the best session we have known. Not that it might not have been much better; and this some of you felt keenly, as the end of the session drew near. Still it witnessed in not a few of you a marked improvement, and it has left behind it the promise of much good for the next year. And such, surely, ought to have been its history. The year just closed has brought to you not only the usual number of faithful lessons, but some new ones beside,—sad and solemn lessons—taught to you directly by God Himself.

But vacation is a time of trial to all, and of loss to many. It is always so. It was therefore with serious anxiety for many of you, that we saw you depart. Some indeed were thus anxious for themselves, and for them, more than the careless or the confident do we cherish good hopes. But we dread the effects of vacation. Year by year we dread them only more, and therefore the more earnestly warn you.

And the first warning is the one always given—that the vacation suspends no duties but those strictly academical and peculiar to your residence here. All other duties are the same. College rules have so much engrossed your thoughts for many months, that upon the signal that they are suspended you are all too apt to feel as though all rules were suspended with them. Stop and think that this is not so. All duties save those of mere lessons and order are the same now as in the session.

Your duties to God are the same. It is true that all duties are duties to God, but I mean now, those which you owe to Him alone and directly; and not those due also to your fellow creatures. These peculiar duties, remember, admit no vacation.

PRAYER—regular and sufficient prayer, is a duty to God for every day alike. So is the reading of His word. And these duties are to be done not once only, but twice or thrice each day. Morning and evening of course should be thus hallowed: and I hope that at least those who choose to come to the Chapel here at noon, will still, wherever they may be, have their own "Mid-day service." Every one needs times of prayer, especially in a vacation of regular work. And these duties of devotion and reading are to be done every where and under all circumstances and in spite of every obstacle. No day can be safe or guiltless when they are neglected or slighted. The fear of God is another duty which allow no vacation:—such fear as will deter you from joining in or even listening to any irreverence towards the fearful Name of or holy religion of your God. Say openly that you are afraid to join with the scoffer in laughing at serious things; or with the wicked in doing what is wrong. The due fear of Him may now turn you away from the sins—sometimes secret ones—to which vacation exposes you;—and it may also make you faithful in the special duties which these days may bring with them.

The Lord's Day is as holy in the vacation as in the session. It is never to be a day of gloom, nor yet is it ever to be a day of frivolity and sport. What "is innocent fun," on other days is sin on Sundays. Go twice on each Sunday to the services of the Church if they are at all within your reach. If they are not, make up the deficiency by the private, devout use of your Bible and Prayer Book. You may thus meet God in His Church wherever you may be. And be very careful about your engagements and companions on Sunday. Indevout Sundays will corrupt the whole week.

I trust that all the Communicants will remember the charge they received to secure at least two or three opportunities of communing during vacation. Any schemes of pleasure and recreation should be altered or abandoned rather than this duty go undone.

Your company on Sunday and week-day is a matter of prime moment. Here is your great danger; the one by which so many are harmed every year. Associate with no one who lacks virtue and reverence. The more he pleases you, the more should you dread his influence. On no other point are those of your age so confident; so sure of their own strength to resist evil, as in this one of their company. Yet in fact here is their great peril. The companionship of the vicious and unworthy—especially when made fascinating—is the most powerful enemy to your virtue.

Do not be idle. Seek some useful engagement daily, and as a thing indispensable to your real enjoyment. Keep your minds awake; at least by profitable reading. A vacation which will admit nothing but mere amusement must become nearly as tiresome as it will be hurtful to you. Mere idleness or the exclusive pursuit of "fun" will expose you to many temptations to evil. Active and healthful exercises of body and mind will, next to the fear of God, be your best safeguards.

And forget not that you go home not only to enjoy yourselves, but to make your parents and homes happy.—Cheerful obedience and unselfish love should mark your intercourse with your families. The absence of them often disappoints those who anticipated your return home as fondly as yourselves did. Real affection, well trained and practised now at home, will prepare you to come back here resolved to keep the happiness of your homes ever before you as one of the ends you aim at in seeking your own advancement in whatever is good.

Hoping that you will pass your time of vacation both delightfully and innocently; and that you will return promptly on the day appointed, in good head health and with firm purposes, by God's help and blessing, to make the new session a good and happy one,

I am, in behalf of all your pastors and teachers, and of myself, your faithful friend,
August, 3, 1870. JOHN B. KERFOOT.

We take the following account from "the Daily Courier," of Buffalo, sent to us by some kind friend.

THE FREE EPISCOPAL CHURCH AT TROY.

The writer of this happening to be passing through Albany a few days since, and having business at Troy, was induced to yield, (not unwillingly,) to the solicitation of his friend Major D—— and take an earlier start than is usual for the purpose of seeing a gem-like little free Episcopal Church recently erected in Troy by the munificence of Mrs. WARREN.

The cars soon landed us at the best house in the city, (kept by COLEMAN, of course,—the best houses in the country seem to be monopolized by the Coleman family,) and we lost no time in starting for the church, a short distance off. A more eligible position for such an edifice could scarcely be imagined—at the end of an ascending street, with steep hills and deep ravines directly in the rear. The building is built of stone, in Gothic style, of cruciform shape, with stained glass windows. The seats made to accommodate about three hundred, are entirely free, and the church is opened for divine service every day throughout the year.

We had gratified our curiosity respecting the building, and were just returning from the high point in the rear, (from whence, by the way is obtainable a panoramic view of the city and country adjacent for many miles around,) when the tolling of the little bell gave note that the customary morning service was about to commence. We entered and took seats opposite the organ—an instrument of more than ordinary power and sweetness, a gift to the church from a son of Mrs. Warren, who himself is organist, and who, notwithstanding Providence has afflicted him with blindness, plays upon it with fine taste and skill and in the true style of substantial old English church music. We had but just seated ourselves when the little girls of Mrs. Warren's charity school, some forty or fifty in number, came in, plainly but tidily dressed, with uniform bonnets, and took their places on seats next the chancel. The Rev. Mr. Tucker, rector of the church, read the ordinary prayers, assisted by a brother clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Fairman. The chants (fine old Gregorian compositions,) were admirably sung by the children, the congregation generally uniting. On Sundays they chant what is called the "full cathedral service of the church," and instead of singing in the morning services such music as is ordinarily performed in Episcopal churches, they execute some of the most elaborate and difficult anthems of the old English composers, in a style as we are informed that elicits admiration from those who are fastidious in musical matters.

The Church, on Sundays is, as it should be, crowded to overflowing. Especially is it resorted to by the poor. It is a free church practically as well as in name, and so in all human probability will it continue for centuries to come. The liberality which prompted its erection has made ample provision for its future permanence; and after Mrs. W. shall have fulfilled her day and generation, many a humble worshipper will bless the memory of her whose christian thoughtfulness and liberality provided them the means of attending upon the ordinances of religion.

Obituary.

DIED, at Burlington, on Tuesday morning, the 18th instant, NATHAN W. COLE, M.D., in the seventy-first year of his age. These simple words record a death, which touches countless hearts, and leaves a void in many, which never can be filled. The writer of this has enjoyed the personal friendship of some of the great physicians of a former generation, of Post, and Hosack, and Physic; and of the great living names, Jackson and Warren, and Chapman, and Mütter; and he deliberately records the conviction, that, in Dr. Cole, the best of them had no inferior. This is said, after a daily intimacy of more than sixteen years; an intimacy, far beyond that which mere domestic opportunities could furnish: Dr. Cole having been, from their foundation, the faithful and successful physician of St. Mary's Hall and Burlington College. He has never known the man—he has said it long before his death, and says it now, deliberately—to whom he would commit, with a more perfect unreserve, save of God's blessing, the health and life of the most cherished darlings of his heart.

Dr. Cole was born at New Germantown, New Jersey, December 22d, 1777. He graduated at Queen's (now Rutgers') College, New Brunswick, at the early age of sixteen. He came, soon after that, probably in 1794 or 5, to Burlington; and was, for a time, a teacher in the Academy, then of much celebrity. After that, he returned to New Brunswick, and pursued the study of Medicine, in the office of Dr. Scott; and settled as a physician, in Burlington, about 1801. He received the honorary degree of Doctor of Medicine, from the University of Pennsylvania, in 1829; and it never was more worthily bestowed. For nearly fifty years, he continued in the practice of his profession, in this city, with an extensive country practice; and was in the full vigor of his usefulness, six months before his death.

Well does the present writer remember the first time he saw Dr. Cole. It was in December, 1832. He was then the guest of the Honourable Garret D. Wall, being then on the first visitation of his Diocese; having been consecrated Bishop but a month before. Contemplating the removal of his family from Boston, in the ensuing Spring, and their settlement at Burlington, he looked narrowly at the physician of the place; and, from that look, took confidence, which never was betrayed. Under the most trying circumstances, in cases that involved his "most dear heart-strings," and, in an extent and variety of practice, such as is seldom given to a man, Dr. Cole always sustained himself, as the faithful, skilful, and successful physician. "How happy we always felt," said one, "when we heard his foot upon the stairs; and, when he took his pencil, and a little bit of paper, we felt that all was well." Dr. Cole was an old-fashion physician. His remedies were few and simple, but most direct and efficacious. He was free from all pretence and trickery. His yea was yea, and his nay was nay. Never any man looked the profession more admirably. His bearing was majestic. His air was grave and manly. His manner was that of a perfect gentleman, of the old school. And, in later years, his long white locks made him the very impersonation of reverence and dignity.

But, great as was Dr. Cole's eminence, as a physician, it was but part of him, as a man. For integrity, and sincerity, and disinterestedness, he was unrivalled. A very boy wrote of him, to his mother, "Dr. Cole has closed a most disinterested life, by a calm and peaceful death." He was looked up to by the whole community. All respected him, all loved him. To the poor, he was the most steadfast friend. He knew no difference, indeed, of rich and poor; unless it were in greater service to the poor. He was a perfect devotee to his profession. With a most extensive practice, he contrived to be devoted to every patient. He saw all his patients daily. Those that were fairly sick, twice a day. If there were any thing serious, three times. A stranger would have been frightened by his attention. He made a conscience of every case. The present writer was admitted to his closest confidence, and was somewhat in the place to him of a professional brother; and he well knows how literally this is true. Dr. Cole had a rare faculty of observation. He had unusual presence of mind. He had most uncommon common sense. An ordinary man would have been tempted to rely on these great gifts. He did no such thing. He was a diligent reader; and was "up to the time of day," in every thing. One who had great opportunities to judge, and had long known Dr. Cole, remarked to the present writer, that his discrimination, in regard to all new remedies, was wonderful: that those, which he disregarded, soon blew over; while those, which were of permanent value, were sure of his adoption. He was an intuitive physician. And, yet, he studied every important case, as if it were his first. This, the writer knows. He ventures to say, that he made a religion of his profession. And he did right, to do so. What is more sacred, after the most sacred office, than that of physician?

Dr. Cole's practice was a most unlimited. To the poor he was a physician, indeed. He has attended some chronic cases, daily, for years; when he knew he never could receive a dollar. A worthy man, a servant, had had a sick wife. Dr. Cole had attended her long, most faithfully, and most successfully. When she recovered, he called on him. "I have brought you ten dollars, Doctor; it is all I have now; but, as soon as I can, I will bring you more." "Pooh, pooh, man," was his reply; "what are you talking about? Give me five dollars. That is quite enough." This is but a case of hundreds.

The present writer well remembers, what a gloom fell on this whole community, when, in the month of February, it was understood that Dr. Cole was seriously indisposed. Long and anxious was the struggle, with him, as to suspending, even for a time, the practice, to which his life was devoted, and on which his heart was set. His profession was a passion, in the best sense of the term. But the hand of disease upon him was relentless, and soon decided the question. He was treated, for a while, here; some of the most eminent of the faculty in Philadelphia, coming in aid of his professional brethren of the vicinity. Then, on urgent representation of its advantage, he went for a few weeks, to Philadelphia, parting from his beloved Burlington, as if he were going to his own funeral; and leaving very much the same feeling in our hearts. But it was all in vain. He returned, to die. Utmost skill, utmost attention, utmost love, were lavished on his case, with a profusion seldom paralleled. But, as he often said, the disease never relented for a moment; but went steadily on, till all the holds of life were loosened, and the exhausted body yielded up the spirit to its God.

It was the privilege of the present writer—a poor return for an unreserved friendship of sixteen years, and an entire devotion to the health and welfare of the dearest objects of his love—to be almost daily with Dr. Cole, during the last weeks of his life; and, on some days, several times. He was perfectly conscious of his condition, and entirely resigned to it. He was serene and constant. "In all his life," he said, "he had looked forward to the end; had never thought of worth or value in himself; but trusted simply and humbly in Him, 'whose mercy endureth forever.'" This was the language of his own selection. The closing days were days of the most sacred character. At his express request, the Holy Scriptures were daily read, and prayers were offered, by his bed-side. In the last night of his life, when the patient sufferer desired his presence, through the night, this was done many times. At five, the next morning, he said, "I am very low; pray for me!" These were very nearly his last words. He was commended to God, in the Church's parting benediction, with its precious words, "peace, now, and forever more;" and, in less than an hour, he quietly ceased to breathe.

Dr. Cole was emphatically a great man. His character was strongly marked. To those who did not know him, it might seem severe and rough. But a tenderer heart beat never in a human breast. This had been long seen and known. But it was especially manifest in his last illness. Seldom is a death bed so faithfully and tenderly ministered to. Seldom has a suffering man, with all the firmness of a man, betrayed so much, the gentleness, and thoughtfulness, and delicacy, of a woman. Never has the present writer received, from any dying friend, tokens so marked, of confidence and affection and devotion. The memory of them will dwell with him forever.

It was his melancholy privilege to minister to his departed friend, in the last offices of the Church. He was assisted by nine of his brethren of the Clergy. The whole country came in, to do honour to his memory; and the whole city followed him to the grave. The teachers and pupils of St. Mary's Hall and Burlington College were in the train. All sorts and conditions of men united in the tribute of affectionate respect. St. Mary's Church was filled to overflowing; and there were more persons, on the outside, than the building could contain. A solemn sadness pervaded the whole vast assembly, and manly eyes ran down with tears. His grave, in the Church yard, will draw feet and hearts to it, as long as any remain, of the generation, which his skill has relieved, and his kindness encouraged and consoled. "We shall miss him, more and more," one writes, who loved him well, "as we advance in life; and shall never have his place supplied." B. L. H. G. W. Dean

New York.—COLUMBIA COLLEGE.—At the Annual Commencement of Columbia College, held on Wednesday, the 26th inst., the degree of Bachelor of Arts was conferred on twenty-five young gentlemen, who had completed the course of study; and the degree of Master of Arts, on four of the Alumni of the College.

The Honorary degree of D.D. was conferred on the Rev. Samuel Roosevelt Johnson, D.D., of Allegheny College, Pa., an Alumnus of Columbia, Rector of St. John's Church, Brooklyn; and on the Rev. Francis Vinton, Rector of Emmanuel Church, Brooklyn, recently elected to the Episcopate of Indiana.

Mr. Morgan Dix, who delivered the Greek Salutatory, alluded, in a very beautiful and impressive manner, towards the close of his elegant oration, to the absent Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy, the Rev. Dr. Hackley. We are pleased to learn that the Professor's health has much improved, and that he expects to resume his duties at the opening of the College term in October.

On the Monday evening preceding Commencement, the Hon. W. A. Duer, LL.D., late President of the College, delivered a most appropriate address before the Literary Societies of the College, in the College Chapel. A more particular notice of this will appear in our next.—Churchman.

Maryland.—CONFIRMATIONS.—On Tuesday, the Feast of St. James, six of the inmates of the College of St. James, all students in the College or in the Grammar School, were confirmed in the College Chapel.

On Friday night July 28th, two persons were confirmed in St. Thomas Church, Hancock.

On the sixth Sunday after Trinity, July 30th, in the morning, seven persons were confirmed in St. Andrew's Church, Clear Spring; and at night, twelve persons in St. John's Church, Hagerstown.—Church Times.

Western New York.—EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN WEST UTICA.—It has long been the desire of the Protestant Episcopal Clergy, as well as of many others, that there should be a free Church in this growing portion of the city.—Divine Providence having favored the effort, a commodious room has been neatly fitted up and arranged in the building, formerly known as the Bethel, in Fayette street, a few doors from the bridge over the Chenango Canal, under the name of St. Paul's Church, the permission of the Bishop having been obtained.

Divine service will be held there, God permitting, on Sunday morning next, (August 6th,) at 10½ o'clock, when further notice will be given of the designed arrangements.

The seats will all be free, and there will be Prayer Books provided for such as may be disposed to use them, and do not feel able to provide them. All those who are disposed to favor this enterprise, and those destitute of regular places of worship, are respectfully invited to attend.

For further information, inquiry may be made of the Rev. M. A. Perry, corner of Fayette and Fay streets, and opposite the chapel.

BISHOP DE LANCEY'S VISITATION.—Tuesday 18th ult., Bishop DeLancey made his first visitation of the newly organized parish of St. Paul's Church, Springville, Erie Co. The services were held in an "upper room," temporarily fitted up until a church shall be erected which we trust will not be long hence. The Bishop preached and confirmed four persons.

Wednesday, the 19th, the Bishop visited St. John's Church, Ellicottville. The Bishop preached and confirmed six persons, including one from Trinity Church, Fredonia.

Thursday, the 20th ult., the Bishop visited St. Stephen's Church, Olean, preached and confirmed one person, and administered the Holy Communion.

On Friday, the 21st ult., Bishop DeLancey preached in the Presbyterian house of worship in Cuba, Alleghany Co.

Sunday, the 23d ult., the Bishop visited St. Paul's Church, Angelica. In the morning he consecrated the church which has been recently rebuilt. The request for consecration was read by the Rev. Mr. Weber, of Friendship: the sentence of consecration was read by the Rev. Mr. Thibou, the Rector of the Parish.

In the afternoon, in the same Church, the Bishop confirmed seven persons and preached.

The afternoon of Thursday, the 25th ult., the festival of St. James, the Bishop visited St. Mark's Church, Hunt's Hollow, preached and confirmed seven persons.

Wednesday, 26th ult., the Bishop visited the parish of Grace Church, Nunda. By zealous efforts the churchmen of this parish have raised the frame of an edifice, which we hope may be completed before long. As the Church was not ready for consecration, services were held in the Universalist house of worship. The Bishop preached.

Thursday, the 27th ultimo, the Bishop preached in the Presbyterian house of worship at Pike. The Bishop confirmed one person.

In the afternoon, the Bishop visited St. Clement's Church, Weathersfield Springs confirmed five persons and preached.

Friday morning, 28th ult., the Bishop visited St. John's Church, Mount Morris, confirmed eight persons and preached.

In the afternoon, the Bishop visited St. Michael's Church Genesee.

Sunday the 26th, the Bishop visited St. Peter's Church, Dansville. The Bishop preached. In the afternoon, the Bishop preached and confirmed six persons.

Monday July 31st, the Bishop visited St. Paul's Church, Allen's Hill. The Bishop preached.—Gos. Mess.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, ANGELICA.—Sunday, the 23d ult., Bishop DeLancey consecrated the new Church, which this Parish has recently erected upon the site of their former Church, which was burned in February, 1847. The zeal and exertion which have been so successful in their result, are worthy of commendation and imitation. The present building is of wood, and consists of a nave 67 by 35 feet, and a tower 11 feet square and 65 feet in height. It has no proper chancel, but a portion of the body of the church, is elevated, and raised off for the uses of a chancel. A very good feature of the building is the triplet of lancets, by which the chancel is lighted. In the tower is a bell, weighing 1100 pounds. The wood work of the interior of the church is grained to resemble oak, and the exterior is painted a dark brown.

This building will not bear criticism and should not be taken by other parishes, for a model. No architect was consulted in its erection. Still it is a neat and commodious church, and a great improvement upon the style of its predecessor.—Gospel Messenger.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Alfred M. Loutrel, of New York, has received and accepted a call to the Rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Columbus, Ohio, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. H. L. Richards, on account of ill health—and has entered upon his duties.

[VOL. X.—No. 33.—WHOLE No. 503.]

We might give some striking extracts from the German rethe friends of the College, from which no one would willingly absent himself. But we refrain from further remark to give place to the following very full and interesting account by a correspondent, who can speak with greater freedom than we should feel at liberty to use.

COMMENCEMENT AT TRINITY COLLEGE.—On Wednesday, 3d inst., the Convocation assembled in Seabury Hall, the Corporation opening their session at the same time. Almost the first business was the announcement of the demise of Mr. Munson, which threw a solemnity and gloom over the assembly.

There was a service in the chapel on the evening previous, after which the Rev. Dr. Fuller, of Litchfield, addressed the undergraduates on behalf of the Board of Fellows.

Early on Wednesday morning the Rev. Dr. Totten resigned the Presidency of the College. A vote was passed by the Corporation, requesting him to sit for his portrait, to be placed in the library with those of the former Presidents and benefactors of the College. When the resignation became known in Convocation, votes were passed expressive of respect and a communication of similar import was addressed to him by those members who had been graduated during his incumbency.

In the afternoon we had the Oration and Poem, the former by the Hon. D. D. Barnard, of Albany; the latter by the Rev. Dr. Croswell, of Boston. They will both be published, I suppose; but I must be allowed to say something about them beforehand. They were admirable and scholar-like productions, and in good keeping with each other. Mr. Barnard's Oration was professedly a sequel to the two former addresses before the House of Convocation, and like them it recognized the divine institutions of families, governments, and the Church of God. It was an admirable rebuke of the false theories of social reformers and levellers, and abounded in such practical maxims of ethical wisdom as are too seldom heard in our country from statesmen and politicians. Indeed—it was refreshing to hear from one of our laity such high and holy views of things human and divine; views which could not possibly have been adopted hastily, like the crude radicalism of so many public men, but which were evidently the seasonable fruit of reflection and reading, and above all of deep draughts from the fountains of Catholic religion.

I must not forget to mention his noble exposition of the organization of our Academic Senate, and the evident enthusiasm with which he regarded the efforts of Trinity College to infuse a truly academic spirit into all its members. His passing tribute to the great and good Chateaubriand was almost anticipated from the high strain of thought which introduced it; and but for the holy place in which we were assembled it would have been greeted with marks of earnest approbation.

Dr. Croswell's Poem was a satire—full of wit and epigram, and designed for immediate and practical uses. Those who knew him only as the laborious parish priest, or as the serious Christian lyricist, were hardly prepared for such a proof of the versatility of his genius, and perhaps there was a little regret among such persons, that he had not chosen a theme more kindred to his holier efforts. But the true poet loathes self-exhibition. It was a genuine poetical instinct in Dr. Croswell not to parade his deeper and holier feelings, but to perform his part with the unfeigned simplicity of one who consenting to do a duty, had but the one object of doing it for a useful end. As the result, we had something very different from Herbert and Keble, but quite in the vein of Crabbe, or of Cowper in his Review of Schools. It was a poem of purely academic character, abounding in classic allusions and pointed hits; and with epigrammatic couplets, which in the Senate-house at Cambridge would have drawn down continued bursts of applause. The versification was faultless—and the subject of the flowing thought was—Colleges as they are, and as they should be. If the Doctor will consent to its publication it will be found both for its manner and its moral, a valuable contribution to the literature of the Church, and in spite of its playful form not wanting in occasional passages which betray the deep sources of principles and feeling from which it gushed and sparkled as if it were only a thing of beauty and pastime. The most feathery fountain is often born of solid rock, and plays in the air because its unseen spring is both higher and deeper than dull fools suppose."

We trust the Convocation will maintain the high character of these academic feasts, by such appointments in all future time as will be worthy of what we have had heretofore. Sorry will be the mistake if ever the charlatany and vagaries which are too often exhibited on similar occasions, should be put forth under the patronage of our College, which is becoming more and more identified with what is conservative and sterling. This is the feeling, I am sure, which has led to the appointment of Bishop Potter for the next address, and of Richard H. Dana, Esq., for the poem. We hope neither of these eminent gentlemen will refuse to contribute their valuable aid in realizing the cherished plans of those who are devoting so many toils and prayers to the building up of a College which shall meet the future wants of New England. The time is not distant, perhaps, when Trinity College will be almost alone, in witnessing among the sons of the puritans the great doctrinal truth with which it is identified in substance and in name.

Thursday was commencement day. Early in the morning, the corporation proceeded to the election of a president; and when, after an hour or two, it was known that the result was ready to be announced, the House of Convocation became crowded with members and with strangers, who with the undergraduates were admitted as spectators. In a few minutes the message was received from the Corporation, and read by the Scribe. It appeared that the Rev. J. Williams, D. D., of Schenectady, an alumnus of the College, had been unanimously elected President of Trinity College; and the announcement was received with a burst of enthusiasm which made Seabury Hall ring again. A vote was carried by acclamation, by which Convocation confirmed the result, and pledged themselves to give their warm support to the new administration.

The commencement performances in Christ Church were of unusual interest. We are not falling into a stereotyped phrase; but must be permitted to say, (with honest regret that such expressions are too often unreal,) that the young men distinguished themselves and their Alma Mater, by the general tone of sentiment and style which was maintained throughout. We do not like to single out names, from a list in which none are unworthy of remark, but must be permitted to mention two or three in which we feel more especial interest because the subjects were in a manner sacred. The "Supremacy of law," (Francis B. Peabody) was a well chosen theme, and the young speaker seemed to have prepared himself with the wholesome study of Hooker. We were struck with the Eulogy of St. Columba, and Icolmkill (by Levi B. Stimpson) and the discriminating enthusiasm with which that ancient mission was commended to modern imitation. Nor must we forget the poem—"Conquerors in Youth," which for a college poem, was a production of unusual merit. We caught some pleasing lines and couplets, which drew silent expressions of approbation from members of the Corporation and their distinguished guests. Such was an allusion to Heber, as—

"The mitred saint of India's burning zone:"

and also—an allusion to Kirke White—

"See from the tower of high St. John's, a light Low burning dimly shoots its trembling ray."

The writer (William Rudder) permitted me to copy from his manuscript the stanza which immediately precedes—

"A poet-student while he forms his lays Wanders entranced amid fair nature's smiles,
Through Granta's classic scenes, and hawthorn ways,
By Trent's green banks, and Clifton's leafy aisles:
And busy fancy, with her thousand wiles
Draws the glad picture and the bright career
Of one, whom now slow Time with hope beguiles
That soon the priest's white raiment he shall wear,
And of Christ's holy Church the red-cross banner bear."

The Valedictory, by a son of the Rev. Mr. Paddock of Cheshire Academy, (Benjamin H. Paddock,) was of a very high order of merit, and was marked by genuine feeling, with not a particle of the sentimentality so common in such performances. It was gratifying that almost without exception the speakers distinguished themselves by a high and unaffected tone of christian sentiment—worthy of the College in which they have been bred, we trust for a long course of usefulness and honor in this world, and for immortality hereafter.

The music was a most imposing part of the performance. I was much struck with Gagliemi's fine Solo, (Grauias agimus tibi, propter magnam gloriam tuam;) which was sung by a lady.

You must not think I am a eulogist by choice. On the contrary I am too little apt to be pleased at college commencements; but positively I cannot find fault with anything this time. On the contrary, I must add yet another compliment, expressing the gratification which it afforded us to see among the distinguished guests seated at the right hand of Bishop Brownell the Rev. Dr. Wheaton a former president of the College, and the venerable forms of those patriarchal Presbyters, the Rev. Dr. Burhans, late of Newtown, and the Rev. Dr. Eaton, of Boston.

THE RELATIONS AND INFLUENCES OF THE TWO SACRAMENTS.—Now ye have heard, good children, how by baptism we are so planted in Christ, that by him we have forgiveness of our sins, and are grafted in him as the branch is in the vine. And as the branches have sap and life of the vine, that they may bring forth fruit, so we also (which believe in Christ and are baptized) have received of Him the Holy Ghost that we may be justified. And if it chance us to fall from Christ, through sin or unbelief, or to be put out of the christian congregation, for our open and manifest sins, yet ye have heard, how we are received again, into the bosom of the Church, and joined to Christ's Body, by the authority of the keys and absolution. But if we will be justified and saved, it is not enough to be planted in Christ, but we must also continue and abide in him. Wherefore now followeth that doctrine, which teacheth us how we ought to order ourselves, that we may still abide and grow in Christ, after that we are grafted into Him. And this doctrine is contained in the institution and receiving of the Supper of our Lord Jesus Christ. For as by baptism we are born again, and as by the authority of the keys and penance, we are lifted up again, when we are fallen into sin after baptism, so by the communion of the Holy Supper of the Lord, we are preserved and strengthened, that we may be able steadfastly to stand and fight, against the violent invasions of sin and the power of the Devil. Wherefore good children, forasmuch as ye be already planted in Christ by baptism, learn also I pray you how you may continually abide and grow in Christ the which is taught you, in the use of the Lord's Supper. Ye shall therefore diligently learn the words, by the which our Lord Jesus Christ did institute and ordain His Supper, that ye may repeat them word for word, and so print them in your memories, that you may bear them away with you home to your fathers' houses, and there oftentimes rehearse them. And these be the words of our Saviour Christ. Our Lord Jesus Christ the same night that he was betrayed, took bread, and giving thanks break it and gave it to His disciples and said, Take eat, this is my body which is given for you. Do this in remembrance of me. Likewise He took the cup also, after He had supped, and giving thanks gave it to them and said, Drink of this all ye. This is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you and for many, for the forgiveness of sins. Do this as often as ye drink in remembrance of me.

Now ye shall diligently labor not only to say without book these words of our Saviour Christ, but also to understand what our Lord Jesus Christ meant by the same, that ye may make answer when ye are asked any question herein, and that also in time to come ye may be able to teach your children, as ye yourselves are now instructed. For what greater dishonesty can there be, either in the sight of God or man, than to profess yourselves to be christian people, and to receive the sacraments, and yet not know what Christ's sacraments be, and wherefore they were ordained.—CRANMER.—Church Times.

A GOOD ANECDOTE.—A correspondent of the Troy Budget tells the following good story:—

"It seems that the person who blows the bellows of the organ at St. Luke's Church, also attends to the furnace for warming the building, and having occasion, during service, to 'mind the fires,' he left the bellows in charge of a coachman lately imported, and 'green' as the Emerald Isle of his nativity before the appearance of the potato rot. During his absence, the 'Gloria in Excelsis' came, in the order of the exercises, to be chanted, and Patrick was directed to furnish the organic element. A short time elapsed, but no music followed the touch of the lady who presided at the instrument. 'Blow,' whispered the fair organist. 'Blow!' repeated the leader; and 'Blow! blow!' echoed the entire choir, but not a puff found its way into the vacant pipes, to wake the slumbering harmony. An investigation now took place, and Patrick was found behind the organ—with both his hands tightly clenched around the bellows-handle, (a stick of some five feet long and two inches thick,) the end stuck in his mouth, his cheeks swelled to the utmost expansion, his eyes distended, and the perspiration streaming from his face—engaged in the vigorous but vain attempt to force his breath through the pores of the wood into the body of the instrument.

UNEXAMPLED GENEROSITY.—Mr. Warren, the author of Ten Thousand a Year, in the course of a recent lecture in the hall of the London Law Society, recounted the following incident:

"A short time ago," said Mr. Warren, "a gentleman of large fortune, a man, in fact, worth his £40,000, was indignant with his only child, a daughter, for marrying against his wishes. He quarrelled with her, he disinherited her, he left his whole property, of £40,000, to his attorney, and to two other gentlemen, all of whom were residing in Yorkshire. What did the attorney do? He went to his two co-legates, got them to sign their respective claims over to himself, and then made over every sixpence of the £40,000 to the daughter and her children!—When I mentioned this circumstance this very morning, to a friend of mine, one of the most distinguished men at the bar, he exclaimed, 'God bless that man!' The above gratifying circumstance is literally true. The gentleman of fortune was a manufacturer in a town celebrated for its linen manufactures, within the West Riding, and the disinterested attorney is one of the brightest ornaments of the profession in the West Riding of Yorkshire, enjoying the fruits of an ample fortune realized by his own industry and talents.

The Reputed Authors of the Creed.

MR. EDITOR,—I send you for insertion in the Banner, the following peice of information, new to most of your readers, yet, I think, sufficiently interesting to be worthy of transcription. As the dead languages, save a choice scrap or treasured line, are not often allowed a place in the columns of our hebdomedals, (possibly in fear of the dreaded XXXIX Articles!) I beg your patriarchal indulgence to permit for once a foreigner to appear in its native garb and relate its story in its own words.

The extract ascribes each article of the Creed to an Apostolic author, thus assuming the truth of the fancy that the Twelve assembled in Council, and framed the Creed as the Symbol or watchword of the Christian Church. Of its authority, it may be needless to say, it has little; of its antiquity, it claims at least to have seen the birth of popular Protestantism—an antiquity not desirable for religious truth.*

It is as follows:—Petrus nempe Apostolorum primus dixit: Credo in Deum, Patrem Omnipotentem, Creatorem coeli et terræ. Adjunxit Andreas; Et in Jesum Christum Filium ejus unicum Dominum nostrum.

*Jacobus major adjecit: Qui conceptus est de Spiritu Sancto, natus ex Maria virgine. Johannes Evangelista intulit: Passus sub Pontio Pylato, crucifixus, mortuus, et sepultus. Thomas addidit: Descendit ad inferna, tertia die resurrexit a mortuis. Jacobus minor subjunxit: Ascendit ad coelos, sedet ad dexteram Dei Patris Omnipotentis. Philippus superaddidit: Inde venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos. Bartholomæus dixit: Credo in Spiritum Sanctum: *Mattheus addidit: Sanctam Ecclesiam Catholicam; Sanctorum communionem. Simon subjecti: Remissionem peccatorum. Judas Thaddæus superaddidit: Carnis resurrectionem. Mattheus conclusit dicens: Vitam æternam. Amen.

The Theological reader at once discovers from its language and style its mediæval origin and foreign complexion.

PRACTICAL CHARITY.—Among our Selections will be found an interesting account of a Hospital, established to carry out a noble purpose of humanity. The spirit and life of such humanity flows from Christian charity. The instance we have recorded, is not the less worthy of admiration because the objects of its blessed mercy are the poorest and most wretched of our race. Although a kind Providence has ordained it that these miserable beings are ever the objects of tenderest parental solicitude, yet they have hitherto seemed below the reach of general sympathy. But what depth of human degradation is too low for the reach of Christian love; the love kindled by Him, who stooped from heaven to the deep places of earth that He might relieve our helpless misery? The highest, noblest charity is shown in humblest ministries to the lowest cases of want and wretchedness.

On these grounds, we esteem the establishment of this institution as a noble work of that mercy whose quality is twice blessed. And we record this and similar instances, in the columns of the Banner, not merely as interesting articles to read, but as affording lessons for practice, examples for imitation. We have already shown how barren our Faith and Love are in the promotion of such practical results.

The great and mighty blessings of christianity cannot reach the earth, by the appointed agency of man, as long as the followers of Him, who gave His own dear life for us, are content to do nothing more for His poor and needy ones, for Him, ("inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of these ye have done it unto Me.") than the trifling gifts they offer at monthly Communion! The Church should have, and must have, her Houses of Prayer, her Asylums, her Hospitals, her Schools and Colleges, for the lowest, the poorest, the most ignorant. And how are they ever to be built and sustained, unless Churchmen exercise a freer and more bountiful liberality? Before this is done, the day must come when the gift and endowment of a Church, an Asylum, an Hospital, a School or College, for the poor, shall be found among the offerings laid at one time upon the Altar.

The coming of such times is no Utopian dream. Even now there are some faint promises of this advent. We know at least of one such blessed sign. We know that very lately a deed for a valuable city lot was put in the plate, at the offertory, as a single gift of a faithful member of the Church. Having discovered that such a thing may be done, we trust many will be found to go and do likewise. Earth offers no better security than they obtain who make this the title deed of their possessions—"He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord: and look, what he layeth out, shall be paid him again."

There is no subject whereon there are more frequent misrepresentations, than in reference to the revenues of the Bishops and Clergy of the Church of England. As few persons are informed of the facts of the case, there is a fine field here afforded for those whose arguments have no better foundation than their own rash and positive assertions.

The enemies of our Church, who can find no fault with our Bishops and Clergy on account of their large incomes and extravagant habits, are very fond of falling back upon the Church of England. After the most exaggerated statements of the incomes of Bishops and Clergy there, the fact of our connection with this Church is used, as an argument against our claims to the regard of a people, who are to apt to think that poverty is a quality which highly adorns a clergyman!

There is little logic, to be sure, in such reasoning; but that does not impair the general effect of the argument! We have been asked to furnish some information on this subject, and we do not know that we can better comply with this desire than by giving the following article from a correspondent of the "Christian Witness." This will show in a striking light the wide difference between Fact and Fancy.

REVENUE OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

The 'Witness' has copied, as I suppose from the 'Puritan,' an article upon the above subject, so widely apart from the known truth, as should excite disgust in the mind of every honorably disposed person. Such, certainly, is the feeling it has created in mine. I was surprised, too, that so respectable a journal as the 'National Intelligencer,' should have given currency to so great a misstatement. It is unlike its general practice. Its appearance in the 'Witness,' was, I conclude, the result of inadvertence; and its publication in the 'Puritan,' a willing offering to that bitter hatred of Episcopacy, which so disreputably distinguishes the denomination to which it ministers.

In presenting the following exhibition of the real state of the case, I am impelled, first, by a desire to vindicate Truth, for its own sake; next, to repel a falsehood against the Church of England, for the sake of its Divine Head, whose chief minister on earth I believe it to be; and next, as a member of the Episcopal Church, in these United States, to show my sense of the injustice done towards that Church, 'to which, under God, we are indebted for our first foundation, and a long continuance of nursing care and protection.'

The Revenue of the Church of England, is stated in the article in question, to be, ten millions of pounds sterling annually!! The published authoritative account of its actual amount, put forth under the most grave and reliable responsibility, is as follows:

'The total number of Benefices, with and without cure of souls in England and Wales, is 10,718; the gross income £3,251,159; and the net income £3,055,451; the average income is £285 to each Benefice!!'

These facts will be found in a return made to the British Parliament in 1835, by a Commission appointed for the purpose, composed of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York; several other Bishops and Dignitaries of the Church; and a large number of the nobility, and principal lay gentlemen of the kingdom.

It will thus be perceived that the actual revenue of the Church of England is less than one-third of the amount which it is slanderously reported to be!!! But this is not all. The whole of the Christian Church in Europe beside, embodying 150 millions or more of people, is, by way of contrast, said to cost for its support the sum of £7,000,000. This includes of course, the Romish and Greek churches. Now I venture to affirm, that we have no means whatever of ascertaining in any degree approaching to certainty, any information on this subject. The English government publishes to the nation, and to the world the truth regarding the income and expenditure of the Church under its patronage. No other nation under the sun has done the same; and we have no authority beyond conjecture, to discover what the revenues of Churches in other countries are. I will not fall into the error I am condemning, by putting forth any vague estimate of my own. Most persons of intelligence will judge for themselves—and from their acquaintance with the splendor and extravagance of the two communions alone which I have adverted to, draw their own conclusions.

When will the time arrive when it may again be said with truth, 'see how these Christians love one another.'

The following article is good in itself, and still better when we regard the source from which it comes. The opening and concluding remarks are those of the Editor of "the Gospel Messenger," from which paper we copy it.

NEGLECT OF THE HOLY COMMUNION.

The following article which we take from the organ of the Methodist Communion "the Christian Advocate and Journal" presents a view of this subject, that we did not look for in that quarter. The administration of the Holy Communion to aged sick, and dying persons, we have always heard rebuked by "our good neighbors over the way." We have watched many a death bed, and heard many a fervent thanksgiving to God, for the blessing that accompanied the parting hour through the grace offered in the communion of the body and blood of our divine Lord and Redeemer, but we have rarely heard so full an expression of approbation of the custom always prevailing in the Church, from any non-Episcopal communion.

More we need not say on this subject now, and we leave our readers to ponder the matter, of the page below.

From the Christian Advocate and Journal.

THE LORD'S SUPPER—NEGLECTERS AND NEGLECTED.

To partake of this sacrament worthily, is to have eternal life, to dwell in Christ, and to have an indwelling Saviour. To "eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord unworthily, is to be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." To neglect it is to neglect Christ, to lose covenant relations with God, and to be cut off from his people, and yet many neglect it. There are many Church members who habitually neglect this sacrament, and there are many ministers who neglect to look after them, neglect to warn them, and neglect to cut them off.

The neglected are many. The aged and the sick are often neglected—shamefully neglected. Unable to attend where the sacrament is administered, they are left to weep over the neglect of their ministers, who are solemnly charged "to feed the flock of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." A case in point. Sister B. lived five or six miles distant from her class, in a neighborhood where spiritual death reigned. For several years her health had been declining, and consequently she was seldom able to attend the public means of grace, but was ever faithful in private duties, wisely improving the means she had. At length consumption, slow, yet sure, spoke with a voice which could not be misunderstood, that the time of her departure was at hand. It had been about three years since she had been to the table of the Lord. With great desire, she desired to eat the passover before her decease. Her request was made known to her minister, but, alas! he regarded not her request, although she sought it with tears—she was left to die without enjoying the favor!

This is not an isolated case, but it is only one of the many which call loudly for reformation. Dr. Clarke says, "in the primitive Church, that it is sufficiently evident that the deacons gave the bread and wine in the eucharist to the believers in the Church, and carried it to those who are absent." If it was important then that absent members should be served, is it any the less so now? The time was, when ministers instructed communicants as to the nature and design of this sacred ordinance, and urged upon all believers the infinite importance of attending to it. But the time now is, when it is often administered without one word of instruction before receiving it, and without one word of exhortation after. If members receive it, it is well—if understandingly, well—if not at all, just as well for anything we hear said on the subject. These things are not written in the spirit of fault finding, but for the purpose of calling attention to a subject of vital importance to the Church. The writer has seen the neglected weep, and he feels to weep over the neglecters.

COLONIAL CHURCH CHRONICLE AND MISSIONARY JOURNAL.

We have received, by the last steamer, the July number of this Journal, with a request to exchange. With this desire we cheerfully comply. We have read, with great interest, the articles of this missionary periodical, which are full of valuable information. The following article we have read with peculiar pleasure. No living person is so well qualified to speak of the late Dr. Howley as the Archdeacon of Maidstone, who was so long his private chaplain and confidential friend.

He is closely associated in our mind with this venerable prelate. By his kindness we had the pleasure of an introduction to one, whom we shall always rejoice to have seen, as one of the most perfect specimens of a christian prelate which our times have afforded.

A Charge, delivered to the Clergy of the Archdeaconry of Maidstone. By BENJAMIN HARRISON, M.A. in May, 1848.

Under the appropriate title of "The Remembrance of a departed Spiritual Ruler and Guide," the Archdeacon of Maidstone has drawn a faithful portraiture of the late Primate. Probably no one had such abundant and favorable opportunities of knowing the real character of the Archbishop as he who for a long series of years had the privilege of serving him in the capacity of domestic chaplain. It is well, therefore, that we have such a character as that of Archbishop Howley delineated by such a pen as that of Archdeacon Harrison. Of course he dwells principally upon the late Archbishop's Christian excellences,—his meekness, patience, and humbleness of mind; qualities, however, which are proved by his example to be not incompatible with courage and firmness. The gentler virtues, however, were universally conceded to him, and were in a manner impressed upon his countenance. Other qualifications were only known to those who were admitted to share the conversation of his social hours.

"He possessed," says the Archdeacon, "in remarkable perfection of each quality, and in rare combination, the faculties of imagination, of memory and judgment. The quickness of his imagination, so well was it controlled, hardly showed itself ordinarily, save in a certain characteristic pointedness, often-times, of expression, and in the exquisite feeling with which he entered into the finer beauties of thought and language: for in regard to him, too, it could be said, and in no low degree, that he was 'not a stranger to the more light and airy parts of learning;—poetry' in particular—all of which he had digested and made useful." The extraordinary retentiveness of his memory continually astonished those who heard him, in social hours, bring forth with such perfect ease, as the conversation held on its natural flow, the products of all times and ages,—the things which commonly, if men have known them familiarly (it may be) in boyhood or youth, they have long since forgotten, and the things which ordinarily in advanced age from their recentness leave but a faint impression. And his judgment could apply itself with equal exactness to greater matters or smaller; constituting him the kind yet accurate critic, of whose aid his literary friends, or learned men, no less gratefully and anxiously availed themselves, than those who sought for his counsel to guide them in important affairs of life, and posts of public responsibility; his nice and practised discrimination exercising itself as willingly and condescendingly upon the questioned turn of an expression, in some monumental tribute designed for a departed friend, as upon the weighty concerns which required his best and most intense consideration, as they affected the welfare of the Church, or the spiritual interests of the many millions of the vast empire of Britain.

"In the words which Bishop Jeremy Taylor has used in regard to a distinguished prelate of his own time, 'the Lord

Primate' of Ireland—Bramhall—and which may, in no unworthy sense, be applied to the case of our own Primate, 'it was greatly true of him, that the single perfections which make many men eminent, were united in this Primate, and made him illustrious.' There was not less striking a combination in our Archbishop in regard to intellectual powers and attainments, than in him of whom Bishop Taylor said, 'He was an excellent scholar, and rarely well accomplished, first instructed to great excellency by natural parts, and then consummated by study and experience.' In early life he had not only cultivated classical literature in a high degree, with peculiarly refined taste, and more than ordinary critical acumen; he had not only made himself familiar with most of the languages of modern Europe, in particular the German, Italian, and Spanish; but—what was rare at the time when he was a resident at the University, and demands especial notice in its connexion with that which was the crown of his varied knowledge, and must be the end of all our studies—he obtained such an acquaintance with Hebrew, as gave him that keen perception of the Divine beauty of the inspired compositions of prophets and psalmists, which contributed to make those sacred strains of holy prayer and praise his resource and his comfort to the last. And in the doctrinal, as well as the strictly prophetic, portions of scripture he was not less carefully studious. His Greek Testament was the constant companion of his journeyings; and in his solitary walks at Addington, divesting himself, as he did, with singular happiness, of the disquietudes of daily business, he could turn his mind at once to calm meditations in wider fields of thought; to deeper musings on Scripture and its varied contents, and that vast and comprehensive system of 'manifold wisdom,' which it reveals in the economy of the Christian Church. His conversation with those who were privileged at any time to have a share in the results of these his contemplations, revealed how continually and instinctively his mind was reverting to these and such like topics; to the general argument, perhaps, of some more obscure or recondite portion of Holy Writ, or to some, in particular, of the 'things hard to be understood' in the apostolic writings; as some new or clearer idea suggested itself to him, for the more satisfactory interpretation, or the more perfect elucidation of them.

"It might certainly be said of him, as it was said of the Primate already referred to, in the language of an ancient father, quoted by Bishop Taylor, he was one who divided his life between his work and his book—he was μερίζων τὸν βίον ἔργῳ καὶ βιβλίῳ; and it was wonderful how easily he could pass from one to the other."

When he first came to the see of London it was said of him, by one well qualified to judge, that "he had as much piety as Bishop Porteus, and more learning."

With our limited space we cannot of course enter upon a minute estimate of the character of the late Archbishop as a scholar, a theologian, or as the chief ruler of the Church during a season of uncommon trial and difficulty. For this we must refer to the Charge itself. Our readers, however, will be glad to have before them the following authentic narrative of his last illness.

"On Saturday, the 6th of November, he experienced a severe shock in the tidings which he received, without previous intelligence of his illness, of the death of his aged and highly-esteemed brother in the primacy of England, the venerable Archbishop of York, who had died on the preceding day. From the Monday following, onwards to the end of the year, the book in which he noted down the letters which he wrote from day to day, exhibits in the unvarying blank which it presents to the eye, with the exception of two days, where entries have been made with a feeble hand,—a too faithful reflection of the state of bodily health in which he found himself, with a feeling of inability to do more, in the way of business, than what the immediate occasions of each day absolutely called for, and which he did not neglect. On the 24th of November, he was even able to preside at the Jerusalem Chamber, in the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury; nor did he suffer from the length of the Session, though it occupied altogether not less than five hours. Some of those, however, who were present,—still more those of his family and household,—could not but feel much anxiety and apprehension from the symptoms of feebleness and discomfort which seemed now more heavily to oppress him. The weekly journeys to London, in particular, involving more fatigue and exertion than he was able to bear, the family removed to Lambeth on the 21st of December; and on that journey if I remember rightly, (if it were not on an earlier one), as well as on one or two other occasions, the Archbishop expressed to me, without emotion of any kind, what seemed to have impressed itself on his mind as probable, in the appointed order of Providence, that his own archiepiscopal chair would soon be vacant. During the early part, however, of the first week of the present year, there appeared to be brighter symptoms of returning strength; and on three days in the course of that week he was able to go out in his carriage. But the sudden change of weather to severe cold, on Thursday, the 20th of January, seemed to smite down his already enfeebled frame; and on the next day it was the advice of his medical men that he should not, on the following morning, or during the continuance of the intense cold, attempt to leave his bed.

"It was on the evening of that day, Saturday, the 22d, that, having been sitting for a while in the adjoining room, he desired me to write a few lines to one who was my immediate predecessor in the office of chaplain,* and who had, some little time before, sent him a volume which he had recently published; he desired I would tell him that he had delayed to acknowledge the receipt of the volume, in the hope of being able first to read it, but that this he had not been able to do, and, as he added, never should now; but that he was anxious he should know why it was that it had not been acknowledged. And then he went on to express, in his wonted calm and quiet manner, that he felt as if he could almost say, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation,' if only he could see things in a more comfortable position in regard to the Church. Thus, full of that kind consideration for others, which was so characteristic of him, and with humble aspiration for his own release, subject only to the higher welfare of the Church of God,—in the spirit of a meek and patient predecessor, Archbishop Whitgift, when his sovereign, visiting him in his last sickness, expressed his earnest desire for the continuance of his life, and his answer was, with uplifted eyes, 'Pro ecclesia Dei, pro ecclesia Dei!' and with the words on his lips of that elder saint who 'was just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel,'—our aged father in Christ seemed to take leave, with the close of that week, of the lesser concerns of earth; and, leaning with a tottering weight on the arm which supported him to his room, never left again that which, from being the chamber of sickness, was destined, before three weeks were ended, to become the chamber of death."

After referring to symptoms which seemed to indicate a transient revival, the melancholy narrative thus proceeds:—

"But the continued progress of weakness and emaciation revealed more and more distinctly, as days went on, what the appointed end was too probably to be; and mercifully at last, where hope had been fondly lingering, gave a strong foreboding of what was immediately impending, when, at an early hour on the morning of the day which was to complete the eighty-second year of his earthly pilgrimage, the desired release was given; and his honored head sunk down upon his breast, and, before the Church's commendatory prayer had been said, 'the spirit,' set free from its earthly prison, had 'returned to God that gave it.'"

We are all of us aware of the general feeling of sorrow and regret which was exhibited in this country at the loss of the good Archbishop; but we learn from the latter pages of the Charge, what indeed we should have anticipated, that a like feeling was manifested abroad. In Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland, the churches were put in mourning; and an American journal, recording, as it is believed, the words of a Bishop whose "praise is in all the churches," announces the Archbishop's death, as "the saddest news which could come from the Church of England at that time."

But we may not dwell longer on this melancholy and yet consoling subject; we will conclude our imperfect notice of the late Archbishop with the reflection of the Bishop of Newfoundland, "Honored in life—happy in his death! 'Felix opportunitate mortis.'"

CHURCH IN ASHEVILLE, BUNCOMBE COUNTY, NORTH CAROLINA.—We regret that the following urgent call for help has been overlooked. It should have appeared two weeks ago. We have been asked to say something of ourselves in behalf of the Church in this county. We can only say that this appeal, earnest, and from the heart of a faithful missionary, speaks more powerfully than any words we could add. We know, from the best authority, how great is the the spiritual need of this district, and we are sure that any aid bestowed will be most faithfully applied

For the Banner of the Cross.

The friends of the Church in Asheville, Buncombe County, North Carolina, take this means of presenting their claims to their brethren, in the distant states, where the Banner circulates, for assistance in the erection of a Church building. This is indeed, a worthy object for the benevolence of those whom God has blessed with this world's goods. Church benevolence hath this prerogative, above others, that it is monumental of itself. It survives on earth amid our dust. We solicit not only the pecuniary aid of Churchmen, but we hope, should God incline their hearts towards us, they will offer up also in our behalf the prayers of the righteous.

Asheville is the most thriving village in Western Carolina, but the Church as yet is hardly a year old, in its regular ministrations, though it is taking kindly, we trust, with the people. There is but one church consecrated to the service of Almighty God—west of the Blue Ridge, in North Carolina—St. John's in the Wilderness, in Henderson County. We hope for better things ere long. We invoke the Catholic spirit of Charity, which heeds not the barriers of mountains in its glorious march to spread the Redeemer's kingdom through all the earth.

Contributions, designated for benefit, may be sent to the editor of the Banner, who will kindly acknowledge them, and forward them to their destination. Or they may be sent immediately to Mr. James Norwood, Asheville, Buncombe County, N. C.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, PATERSON, N. J.—We acknowledge, with pleasure, the receipt of Ten dollars from S. B. B., for St. Paul's Church, Paterson, N. J. Our readers will recollect that this is the Church which was lately burned down. The congregation are trying to get the means to rebuild it, and not being able to do it without aid from abroad, such evidences of the Christian sympathy of Churchmen elsewhere will be very grateful, and will encourage them to persevere in their efforts, while they help to accomplish them. We shall be very glad to receive many more such contributions, for we believe they will be well bestowed.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—"H." shall appear in our next. We had not room this week for his communication, together with the remarks which it calls for.

Abstain not only from bad actions, but also from improper words, which hurt the ear.

EPISCOPAL ADDRESSES TO RECENT CONVENTIONS.—We make the following interesting extracts from the Address of Bishop Hawks, to the diocese of Missouri.

MY BRETHREN OF THE CLERGY AND LAITY:—

The annual return of this day finds us convened once more to deliberate upon the interests of this young and struggling diocese. Thankful that we are spared to meet again with our ranks unbroken by death, and deeply grateful for such tokens of his love as a merciful God has been pleased to vouchsafe to this portion of his vineyard, during the year now closing, I invoke the counsel and guidance of the Most High for the heart of every one of us here assembled in his name and presence. May he control every thought, and word, and action of this body, so that by "his holy inspiration we may think those things that are good, and by his merciful guiding may perform the same, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

The rite of Confirmation was administered in Grace Church, Jefferson City, to three persons; in the State Penitentiary to fifteen persons; in Christ Church, Boonville, to seven persons; in St. Mary's Church, Fayette, to three persons; in Christ Church, Lexington, to five persons; in St. Paul's Church, St. Louis, to one person; in St. John's Church, St. Louis, to ten persons; in St. George's Church, St. Louis, to twenty-seven persons; and in Christ Church, St. Louis, to twenty-two persons.

One of these occasions of confirmation was so novel and so deeply interesting, that I may be pardoned for speaking of it more distinctly. I allude to that in the State Penitentiary. The Rev. Mr. Hedges, late Rector of Grace Church, Jefferson City, had acted as chaplain to the prison, and was prepared to present to me fifteen of the convicts for Confirmation. At his request, immediately after the adjournment of the last Convention, I visited the prison in company with a number of the Clergy and Laity. The officers of the institution received us very kindly, and in a little time the prisoners were all assembled in the large dining room, where, after divine service, fifteen of their number were Confirmed. The demeanor of all present at the service pleased me much, and the visible emotion of those making their vows to heaven, was deeply affecting. Imprisoned within walls separating them from the rest of the world, these poor men had found quiet and peace. As they knelt before me on the hard pavement of that prison house, and I laid my hands upon them, I felt that I had never looked upon a group of such penitents. They were the penitents of the penitentiary. May God have them in his holy keeping always! To add to the interest of the scene, I found in the prison an aged mother who had arrived from a great distance to visit her imprisoned son. The young man had been a convict for some time; she had just learned the fact, and, with a mother's love, unbroken by the wickedness of her son, had started promptly from her home, for the double purpose of visiting her child and imploring his pardon of the Governor. That son was among the number confirmed, while with a heart whose emotions were too big for utterance, the old mother trembled and sobbed as she looked upon her kneeling child. I came away from the prison deeply affected, and as I walked in company with that old mother towards the village, thoughts of the unsearchable goodness and mercy of God pressed upon me—with an amazing love He drops the dew of his grace upon the prince on his throne, the beggar in his hut, the wayfaring pilgrim by land and sea—yea, upon the poor prisoner in his cell. In the multitude of his mercies there is this, also, that he showeth his "pity upon prisoners and captives."

I learned afterwards that the executive clemency had pardoned the poor woman's son, and that he was once more free. May God's restraining and preventing grace be with this young man through the remainder of his days!

I am satisfied that to meet the wants of Missouri, we must train up a native ministry—the sons of the soil must be enlisted. This was the main thought which prompted me, soon after I became your Bishop, to speak of my views and desires as to christian education in this diocese. My wish was to make a home (without expense to those who could not afford it) where the young might be trained in the ways of the Church, and some of them secured for the holy Office of the ministry. The expression of these views, as you know, called from Mr. George R. Clark, of Christ Church, St. Louis, the gift of three hundred and thirty-three acres of land in Montgomery county, in this State, for the establishment of a mission School. You are also aware that the proposed enterprise was designated by me the Gov. Clark Mission, and that in a journey east I received for it, from friends, the sum of $778 00.

In my last address, I used the following language: "From inquiry, I learn that the land bestowed for the enterprise is not so eligibly situated as I could desire. The donor, however, allows us to sell, and place the mission elsewhere. I have thought that the Mission would be well situated if carried higher up the river, and located near Fayette, Boonville, or Lexington, or even carried up to the neighborhood of Weston. If some friend of the Church, near either of these points, could aid us by a gift of land or otherwise, towards the establishment of this mission, what better service could he do at this time to the Church in this desolate region? May God put it into our hearts to think and to do the thing that is right."

I had scarcely returned from the Convention to St. Louis, when to my great satisfaction, I heard from certain citizens of Palmyra, in Marion county, that they were disposed to give a site for the Mission if I would place it among them, and begging that I would visit their town, and explain the plan and purpose of the Mission. This I immediately did, and am happy to say that the result was, that the citizens gave to me fifty-five acres of land, with a comfortable dwelling house thereon, on condition that the Mission should be placed on that spot. The location, about a half mile from the village, was admirable for the purpose, and I acceded to their proposal. I consider, therefore, that the site is ours, so long as the Gov. Clark Mission is there. If, at any time, for any cause, the Mission should be removed to any other point in the Diocese, then I conceive that the purchase money or the property should be at once returned to the original donors. Thus the gift was received.

In the fall of last year, I received further donations for the Mission. In the month of October, as you are aware, the General Convention of the Church met in the City of New York. Its proceedings have been published and placed before the Church. I have only to say that I was present during all the session of that body, and to express my thanks to our Heavenly Father that the session was so harmonious.

While in the East, as leisure permitted, I presented the claims of the contemplated Mission, and the result was, that I secured some aid in its behalf. To my friends the Rev. Drs. Berian and Price, and Mr. William Appleton, of New York, and Rev. Dr. Morton, of Philadelphia, I am especially indebted. Mr. Appleton presented to me many of his new publications for the Mission Library, and through the Rev. gentlemen above named, and some other friends, I received the aggregate sum of $404 38. To the Rev. Mr. Cox, of Hartford, I am also indebted for much sympathy with the Mission. In St. John's Church, in that city, at his request, I spoke of our intended purpose, and have since received from Mr. N. B. Kidder, of Geneva, New York—a transient hearer at that time—a deed for eighty acres of land in the State of Michigan, for our enterprise.

Thus upon my return home, I found that the property of the mission was as follows, viz; three hundred and thirty-three acres of land in Montgomery county in this state; fifty-five acres in Marion county, where the Mission is placed; eighty acres of land in the State of Michigan and funds to the amount of $1,182 38. For the library of Kemper College, then for sale, $750 00 was expended, and the remainder of money used in preparing to open the Mission. Mr. J. P. Doan, of St. Louis, became, at my request, the Treasurer of the Mission, and has the account of all the receipts and disbursements up to this time.

The Rev. William B. Corbyn, rector of St. Paul's Church, St. Louis, was by me appointed rector of the Mission. In the month of January last he resigned his parish, and immediately entered upon his new duties. I have been rejoiced to hear continued good tidings of the Mission, and believe that it is accomplishing more rapidly than I had anticipated, the purpose of its establishment. Pupils have been presented faster than they could be accommodated on account of our limited room. The necessity exists of immediately erecting a house containing a school room and dormitory, and without these we must be crippled in our work of love. The Chapel of the Disciples, too, I trust may ere long be erected on the Mission Grounds—serving the double purpose of a Chapel for the inmates of the Mission, and a village church. When it is remembered that, in this Mission a certain number of poor boys are provided for in every way, and that this institution is the nursery of the Church in Missouri, enough is known I trust to call forth your sympathy and your prayers. Beloved, if we will be true to this infant Mission, it will in time repay us an hundred fold.

The Rev. William B. Corbyn is now alone in the Mission, but he is hoping soon to be joined by a clerical brother from Illinois. I would remark that neither of these clergymen are expecting to receive one farthing of salary, and this will entitle them at least to the fervent prayers of all good people. Theirs is a work of self denial for Christ and his holy Church. May God bless them and reward their struggle! Their brethren in more favored regions will not I trust forget them or the holy Mission, to which one has already devoted himself.

While speaking of the gifts bestowed upon us, I should not forget to mention that we are indebted, during the past year, to the New York Bible and Prayer Book Society, the Female Prayer Book Society of Philadelphia, and the Protestant Episcopal Tract Society, for gifts in their kind. For these we should be grateful, and should be glad, according to our ability, to make some return to these noble institutions. This is the second donation to you from each of them since I became your Bishop.

To the Ladies' Parish Library Association, in Philadelphia, I owe my thanks, also, for a Parish Library given to me for Christ Church, Lexington. This is, the farthest western point, yet occupied by the Church, and their library is bestowed there. In another year, I trust, we shall have pressed on as far as Weston.

The Board of Missions have made their annual appropriations to the domestic field, for the year ending the 1st of October next, and the sum granted to Missouri is $1,000. This amount, totally inadequate to our wants, was all, I suppose, that they felt justified in giving to this Diocese. I must again, therefore, press upon you the necessity of a more liberal support of our own Diocesan Missionary Society. That Society has now been in operation three years, and the Treasurer's Report, for the year now closing, will be presented to this Convention. You will see that it has aided several of our Missionary Stations, and without this aid some of them must have been entirely abandoned. And yet there are other points in our field that we should occupy promptly, and which we will occupy if all the members of the Church in this Diocese will remember the claims of this Society. I request that the clergy will call the attention of their parishes to this Society, and that the record of another year will show that we are all active in our duty—that the funds of this institution are not all derived from one or two congregations only. Let us, beloved, strive together in this work. There is not one among us, rich or poor, who may not bear his part in it. Let then our blended prayers and offerings be presented henceforth, and then, beloved, we shall soon find comfort in our waste places, "God shall help us, and that right early."

The desire to aid this Society prompted me, formerly to establish in Christ Church, St. Louis, a Monthly Missionary Lecture, in which service I was aided by most of the city clergy. At the time of these lectures, the contributions of the people were received. Instead thereof, I have now instituted the regular weekly Offertory in Christ Church. This offertory will aid all good purposes, and among others, our own Missionary Society. I consider this the proper way in which the people should make their offerings to the Lord. It is in compliance with the Scripture rule—"On the first day of the week, let every one of you lay by him in store as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come." This was enough to guide us alone—but this plan presents decidedly these advantages; 1st, our offerings are made systematically; 2d, impulsive appeals and excitements are shut out of our Churches, and offerings are made upon principle; 3d, our offerings are made without ostentation, the left hand not knowing what the right hand doeth; 4th, we have the prayers of the Church with these offerings.

My hope is, therefore, that there may be a weekly Offertory in every parish in the Diocese. Thus acting from principle, I believe that the piety of our people will increase, and with this increase will come larger and still larger offerings, and over all will be God's blessing, sanctifying and expanding those offerings.

There is one subject of which I am constrained to speak, and I speak of it with great reluctance, because it in a measure concerns myself. I allude to the support of the episcopate. This Diocese, my beloved, has never contributed anything towards the support of its Bishop. In the Rectorship of Christ Church, St. Louis, alone, he has found the means of living among you. But fastened as I am in the Rectorship of that large parish, it is impossible for me to discharge fully the duties of the Episcopate. Your Bishop, in our present condition, should be your chief missionary in building up the waste places of this Diocese. Nor can we hope much for the growth of the Church among us, until the Bishop is free to discharge his duties. It is not that I disparage the work and service of our laborious and self-denying Missionaries—I know their worth too well to do this—and they will join me, I think, in the desire that their Bishop may be free to act his part among them.

Independently of the fact, that, fastened in a Rectorship, the Bishop is prevented from the full discharge of his duties, I may be pardoned for saying, also, that the labor of my position is too great for any one man, and some relief should be provided. Something should be done, and done promptly, upon this subject. I will say no more. I have spoken frankly, and now trust with confidence this whole subject to the christian feeling and good sense of this body.

In the prospects of the Church in this Diocese, we may now find some comfort. There are in the diocese at present, ten clergymen actually resident, besides your Bishop; twelve organized parishes; seven church edifices; three church edifices in process of erection, and we number about six hundred communicants. In the large territory of Missouri this is great weakness, but when we look back upon our former weakness, let us thank God and take courage. If the clergy and laity are alike true to duty in their respective spheres, richer comfort is before us. It is for us, my beloved, faithfully to discharge our duty, and trust for the results to God's never failing mercy and goodness.

Again I commend you, now and at all times, to the guidance of Almighty God, beseeching him that "all Bishops and Pastors may diligently preach His holy word, and that the people, obediently following the same, may receive the crown of everlasting glory, through Jesus Christ, our Lord."

May He mercifully impart to this Convention "the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and ghostly strength, the spirit of knowledge and true godliness."

C. S. HAWKS.

Bishop

The following is from Bishop Smith's Address to the Convention of Kentucky. The institution of which the Bishop speaks will be found more fully described in the advertisement of it in this paper. Its success and efficiency must have an important influence upon the prosperity of the diocese. From information we have received we are led to think that Shelby College will do good service to the Church in Kentucky. We understand a professor is needed, and if a clergyman could be obtained he could unite the duties of the ministry with those of instructor, and thus occupy a wide and important field of usefulness. A sufficient support would be given to one qualified for the part.

"The number of Confirmations, at twenty-one different times, has been one hundred and eighteen, of which, that at Frankfort was remarkable (twelve) as being the largest ever held there.

Another encouraging indication of the healthy state of the parish in Frankfort, I take great pleasure in noticing,—the free schools for the poor, sustained by the bounty of a few of its liberal and benevolent members. It is astonishing at how small a cost two institutions of the kind, for males and females, numbering about thirty each, can be sustained; about one hundred and fifty dollars for each, covering the entire expense. Next to parochial schools of a high order, for our own sons and daughters, where like pains can be taken with their religious training, a nobler charity can hardly be conceived! Taken up with like enthusiasm, could they not almost everywhere become equally efficient?

But our main interest and our higher energies, are called for in behalf of the institution within whose walls we are now meeting; and with whose interests most of our time and our counsels will be taken up. And where a supply of clergy is to come from, and what will be the destiny of this diocese, if we remit our efforts in this direction, God only knows! In answer to many prayers, may he make us wise and strong to build it up, to his honor and glory."

New Publications.

JOURNALS OF LATE CONVENTIONS.—We have received the Journals of the Conventions of the following Dioceses, viz:—Maryland, Rhode Island, North Carolina, Missouri, Massachusetts, Delaware, Georgia, and Kentucky.

All these Journals present a favorable condition of the Church in their respective Dioceses. We have already presented some of the particulars found in these journals, to our readers. We have also given portions of some of the Episcopal Addresses. We shall give parts both of the Journals and Addresses, not already quoted from.

Along with the Journal of Delaware, we have received a sermon by Bishop Lee, preached at the opening of the convention, and entitled, "SALVATION BY GRACE THROUGH FAITH," as held by the Protestant Episcopal Church."

We have also received the July and August number of the Spirit of Missions. It is filled chiefly with a report of the proceedings of the last Annual Meeting of the Board of Missions and the accompanying documents. The Reports of the two Secretaries are of such general interest that we shall insert a portion of them in our columns.

Obituary.

DIED.—In this county, on the 16th June last, Miss AGNES M., daughter of the late Samuel Endicott, of Ky.

With the bereaved sisters and brothers of this young lady, many in this community have mingled their tears. She was born in Cynthiana, Kentucky, on the 26th of March, 1826, and had been a resident of this county only a few years. To her mind—of much native vigor and ingenuousness—the culture of an extensive education furnished a lovely development; and this, "pure religion and undefiled before God" adorned with the beauty of holiness. And then her intellectual strength was expanded in tutoring herself under the divine blessing, to love the Lord her God with all her heart, and with all her soul, and with all her mind, and to love her neighbor as herself; her simplicity of character became "a thinking no evil," and her natural buoyancy of spirits was chastened into saintly serenity. A year previous to her death, she was admitted into the holy Communion and Fellowship of the Protestant Episcopal Church—a step which she had contemplated taking, for some time. At that time, she was but too surely marked the victim of consumption.

The writer of this notice saw her, for the first time, but a week previous to her death—to his heart, her memory is fragrant of the heavenly—she was as humble as a little child, as regards her attainments in holiness, fervently thankful to God for all His benefits, (ranking this visitation a prominent one) ready to be offered, yet patiently abiding the Master's call, grateful for every attention, and kindly affectioned to all.

Earth has now a daughter less—Paradise we humbly but confidently hope, a saint more. The day succeeding her decease the burial service of the church of her love was read over her remains. Her favorite Hymn, "I would not live away," &c. was sung. A sermon from the words, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord," &c., was preached by the Episcopal minister of this city. And we buried her in the green prairie, "looking for the General Resurrection in the last day, and the life of the world to come through our Lord Jesus Christ."—Lexington, Mo. Express.

Mobile, July 31, 1849.

DEPARTED this life on Sunday the 9th inst., at 10 o'clock, P. M., the Rev. SAMUEL SEYMORE LEWIS, D. D., for eleven years Rector of Christ Church in this city.

The death of this holy man of God, demands more than the usual brief record. I trust some one may be found who shall benefit the Church by a memoir of his life. In the meantime, as no other has yet been published, I would ask room in the Banner for the following communication.

If he is truly great who effects great results, few men are greater than was the lamented Dr. Lewis. Endowed by nature with a good mind, he had spared no pains to cultivate and develop all its powers. He improved diligently his opportunities at Trinity College—at which he graduated—and at the General Seminary of the Church, and entered the ministry with a warm heart—and well stored mind unreservedly consecrated to its holy duties.

His first charge was Christ Church, Tuscaloosa. Thence, after a useful ministry of nearly three years, he removed to this city, and became assistant minister of Christ Church. Soon after, the Rector resigning, he was chosen to succeed him, and entered upon the duties of his office. The prospects of the Church in Mobile were then, for peculiar reasons, very discouraging. Dr. L. felt the difficulty of his position, and set himself to accomplish all that man might as God's instrument. He gave himself wholly to the work, and very soon his prohibiting began to appear unto all.

He found a congregation not numbering over one hundred persons, worshipping in a small frame building; he left one of the largest in the southern country, worshipping in a commodious Church, which is an ornament to the city. He found a little band of ten or fifteen faithful communicants; in five years the number reached two hundred, and very soon his people acquired a reputation for good works and general benevolence, which extends through the length and breadth of the land. In him we saw another Barnabas, as described by the Apostle. "He was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith: and much people was added unto the Lord." None more fully than Dr. L. believed in the necessary connection between a holy life and a fruitful ministry. All among whom he lived bear witness to his blamelessness and purity, and those who knew him most intimately, know that an individual is seldom found of stronger faith and more simple hearted trust in God's promises. To this feature of his character in connection with his faithful exhibition of the truth, is to be ascribed his great success as a minister of Christ. He held the truth in its integity, he delivered it in simplicity, and followed it with earnest and frequent prayer for God's blessing. He was diligent as a Pastor, and lost no opportunity to deepen the impressions of the pulpit by faithful conversations in private. These were the sole instruments upon which he relied for success in the ministry. His own language, a few years ago was, "this prosperous condition of the Parish," (speaking of his own,) "is solely to be attributed to the faithful preaching of Christ and Him crucified. While there have been frequent seasons of unusual attention to religion, no attempt has ever been made to produce an effect through the means of spurious and pernicious excitements, or any equivocal system of expedients; but there had always been an exact and uniform observance of the Rubrics and Canons, along with the unwearied performance of ministerial duty out of, as well as in the pulpit." We have here in his own words a true view of his churchmanship. In the pulpit his great theme was Christ and Him crucified, while he manifested his ardent love for the distinctive features of the Church, by explanation and defence on all suitable occasions, and by a literal adherence to her Rubrics and Canons.

For many years previous to his death, Dr. L. had been a sufferer from a disease, whose consuming power is rarely staid. Long did he continue to do full duty, when a less devoted spirit than he would have thought it impossible to ascend the pulpit. His desire of usefulness was so ardent as often to carry him beyond his strength, and make him appear determined never to yield to bodily weakness till life itself was extinct. But about two years ago, he became satisfied that he ought not to continue his labors longer. And with sad heart relinquished his Parish, which he had long loved with all the devotion of the fondest father. He was literally its spiritual father. He then journeyed north, to visit relatives, and seek relaxation and medical advice. But finding all efforts to restore his health unavailing, he returned to Mobile last winter, as he said, to die among his people and lay his mortal remains beneath the chancel of his beloved Church.

For three months he was entirely confined to his bed or chair, and exhibited without the slightest intermission the meekness and humble submission of the most perfect Christian. He often said his only desire was, that God would keep him here till he was prepared for heaven. As his end approached, his faith grew stronger, and his views of religious truth clearer. A cloud seemed never to interpose between him and the Sun of righteousness, but he appeared always assured that He in whom he had trusted in life, would be his rod and staff through the dark valley, and his position in the eternal world. Indeed death was to him completely disarmed of its terrors. He regarded it as the messenger by whom he was to be called home. The very last sentence he uttered in the hearing of the writer was, "almost home."—In this heavenly frame of mind, he sweetly, without pain or suffering, fell asleep in Jesus.

OBITUARY.—Most sincerely do we sympathize with the afflicted parents, whose distressing bereavement is here recorded. These mysterious dispensations of Providence, are evidences by which he constantly reminds us that He rules in the affairs of men, and ordereth all things according to His gracious will.

Thus doth He give consolation to those whom He afflicts, and enables them to kiss the rod with which He smites them.

Drowned, August 7th, George Townsend Fox, the eldest son of Rev. Charles Fox, of Grosse Ile, Wayne County, Michigan, aged 3 years, 11 months, and 23 days.

Diocesan Intelligence.

From the Parochial Report to the last Convention.

Pennsylvania.—Report of the Rev. W. M. Carmichael, Rector of Christ Church, Meadville, Crawford county, Pa.—Congregation, families, 50; adults, 130, children, 100, total, 230; baptisms, adults, 4, infants, 24, total, 28; confirmed, 25; communicants, added, 4, died or removed, 1, present number, 75; marriages, 1; burials, 1; public services, on Sundays twice, other days occasionally; children catechised, times 10; Sunday Schools, 1; male teachers, 5, female teachers, 11; pupils, 100; collections, Christmas Fund, $10.01, Convention Fund, 5.50, Missionary Fund, $7.31, total, $22.82.

In addition to the above, there has been about $100 collected for the purpose of increasing the Sunday School library, and the purchasing of Tracts, which are distributed monthly by the rector to every family of the parish, and frequently, as the opportunity offers, to the destitute in the surrounding country.

Within a short period, the ladies of the Female Sewing Society, have made a donation to the church of a splendid bible and prayer book for the desk, besides their constant and repeated benefactions to the poor and needy.

It may be proper also here to remark, that there has been a debt accumulating against this church for several years past, until it amounted in all, principal and interest, to the sum of $900 and upwards. This was found to be a most grievous burden, as well as a most serious obstacle to the prosperity of the church. It was in fact, an evil which could not be borne any longer than the circumstances of the case should imperatively demand. That time has recently transpired, and the consequence has been, that by the determination and co-operation, of a few energetic ladies of the congregation, the whole amount of the debt has not only been subscribed, but more than two-thirds of it has actually been paid off within a short period, and the remainder is so secured, as to be—beyond the reach of any contingency,—forthcoming some time during the next year.

During the past year, I would also state, that I have preached several times at Greenville, about twenty-five miles distant, in the adjoining county of Mercer, twice at New Castle, in Butler county, about fifty miles distant, and once at Wilmington in the same region, at the request of the Bishop. Other and more frequent services would have been rendered at other points, but owing to the badness of the roads and ill health, I have been able to perform no more than those mentioned above, and then only as I might be favored with the assistance of the Rev. Mr. Lord, to whom I am under many obligations for the performance of duties during my repeated indisposition during the past year.

Report of the Rev. Samuel Cowell, Rector of Christ Church, Brownsville.—Congregation, families, 58; adults, 125; children, 85; total, 209; baptisms, adults, 4; children, 13; total, 17; confirmations, 2; communicants added, 8; died or removed, 11; present number, 62; marriages, 3; burials, 8; public services on Sundays, 96; other days, 57; total, 153; Bible class, 1; Sunday school, male teachers, 5; female teachers, 8; male scholars, 33; female scholars, 59; total teachers and scholars, 106; collections, general missions, $65 82; benevolent purposes, $197 28; total, $263 10.

This Parish under the favor of Divine Providence continues to be prospered, as will be seen by comparing the present statistics with those of former years.

The unusually large number of removals from the communion arises from several sources, one of which, it may be proper to mention, is the official displacement of sundry persons whose names I found on the list when I took charge of the parish, but who have not been in the habit of communing with the church. The Rector deeming it his duty to present to the Convention, those only whose life and conduct was in accordance with their profession.

Among the auxiliaries to the preached word which have exerted a beneficial influence upon the Church the past year, is the Parish Library. This institution, humble though it be, has yet been fruitful in much good, and gives fair promise for the future. The books, containing useful knowledge, with purity of doctrine and attractiveness of style, have not only been the means of guiding some in the way of peace, but also have been more extensively circulated among the people than might at first have been expected. Forty volumes, at least, are out nearly all the time, which considering the size of the parish, augurs favorably for the institution.

Report of the Rev. J. M. Childs, Rector of St. David's Church, Radnor, Delaware county.—Congregation, families, 65; baptisms, adults, 1; infants, 4; total 5; communicants, added, 6; removed, 1; present number, 49; marriages, 1; burials, 14; public services on Sundays, 141; other days, 19; collections, Convention fund, $2 70; other purposes, $37 26; total, $39 96.

Rev. Mr. Bacheller resigned on the third Sunday in Advent. The present Rector received a call the 12th of January, but did not enter upon the discharge of his duties regularly until April. In the interval, the place was supplied by the kindness of the Rev. Thomas G. Allen, who besides other offices, admitted all those who were added as new, to the Communion. There is much to encourage the Rector, in the attendance and interest manifested by the Congregation.

Report of the Rev. William J. Clark, Rector of Christ Church, Williamsport, Lycoming county.—Congregation, families, 16; baptisms, infants, 7; communicants added, 1; total, 16; burials, infants, 1; public services on Sundays, 105; other days, 25; total, 130; children catechised, 20; every Sunday morning; Sunday school, female teachers, 5; female pupils, 23; male pupils, 24; Bible class, 1; members, 5; collection, Episcopal fund, $5; Missionary purposes, $14; other Church institutions, $5 50; Church debt, $346 23; fence for the church, $40; incidental purposes, $35.

There is but little to record respecting the condition of the parish at the present time. The general aspect of the parish has improved, although we have added but one family to the church during the year. Our Church debt has been reduced by the kindness of our friends, and the persevering industry of the ladies of the parish, to a little over two hundred dollars. I must not omit to record the generous and timely gifts by the American Sunday School Union of two libraries for my Sunday school, comprising two hundred volumes.

Report of the Rev. John B. Clemson, Rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, West Chester.—This parish is united and harmonious, and gives evidence of a healthy and encouraging growth and prosperity.

The Sunday Schools maintain their usual standing and numbers.

The children of the parish and schools are catechised openly in the church once a month, and are the objects of a constant particular regard.

The church has undergone extensive repairs and embellishments, which has been greatly to its improvement.

The parish is now erecting at a liberal expenditure, on a beautiful and commodious plan, and adjacent to the church, a rectory. The several flourishing boarding schools in the borough, now numbering six, render the position of the parish of peculiar importance.

Baptisms, adults, 1, infants, 2; marriages, 10; burials, 2; communicants, added, 10, removed, 3, died, 1, whole number, 50; collection for Society for the Advancement of Christianity in Pennsylvania, $16 00, Episcopal Fund, $4 50, Convention Fund, $1 50, domestic missions, $48 58, foreign missions, $47 00, repairs of church, $450 00, other objects of benevolence, $63 78, total, $634 36.

Report of the Rev. William C. Cooley, Rector of Trinity Church, Pottsville.—During the last conventional year, we have by the Divine blessing on our labors, been able to build a church suited to the wants of this place. It stands upon the site of the old one, and will seat exactly nine hundred and eight adult persons comfortably, and has every third pew throughout the body of the edifice set apart to remain permanently free, thus making room for three hundred worshippers to come and partake of the water of life freely. This is a feature in church accommodation indispensable to the successful discharge of that most bounden duty of preaching the gospel to the poor. And I desire in this report to record my sincere thanks first to the Great Head of the Church, and then to those into whose hearts He has put the benevolent desire of so contributing to this church, that it is perfectly adapted to the circumstances of the people of the place and its vicinity.

The church is built of stone, in the early English Gothic style, in every way church-like, and when completed will be well calculated to attract worshippers, and also to predispose them to be solemn and devout within its hallowed courts. Already has the attendance upon service nearly doubled, though we have been worshipping in the church only a few months, thus giving an earnest of the rich harvest that may yet be gathered by the faithful laborer in this field.

Besides the building of the church, we have been enabled to accomplish another object of great importance to the interests and prospects of the parish. We have obtained a lot for a cemetery, containing some four acres of ground conveniently located, for the purposes of burial, and shall in a short time have it fenced and prepared for use. This will enable us to gather many who have strayed away, but who in all their wanderings have not been able to forget the Church's solemn burial service, or to banish the strong desire to be buried in ground consecrated by the same rites which gave peace to the ashes of their fathers.

Services have been regularly held on Sundays, but owing to the fact of our being obliged to worship in a house not at other times under our control, I have not been able to have service on Saint's days and holy days as usual. For the same reason our Sunday school was discontinued for a season, but it has been reopened with about the same number of teachers and pupils as formerly, and I trust it will continue to increase until the lambs of the flock shall all be brought under the salutary discipline and teaching of the Church.

As we have so recently commenced worshipping in the new church, it is impossible to give an accurate report of the present number of stated worshippers. For missionary and other purposes we have made the following appropriations.

To the Rev. Mr. Starkey, missionary in parts adjacent, $200.00 Bishop's fund, $10.00; Advancement Society, $5.00; domestic missions, $12.00; for an organ in the new church, $875.00, being the proceeds of a fair held by the ladies. I have had 2 adult baptisms, 87 infants and children; 17 funerals, 12 marriages.

Western New York.—BISHOP DE LANCEY'S VISITATION AT ROCHESTER.—On Sunday, Aug. 6th, Bishop De Lancey visited St. Luke's church in the morning, and confirmed twelve persons, (making with one confirmed in private before service thirteen; preached and administered the Holy Communion.

In the afternoon, at Trinity church, the Bishop confirmed fourteen persons and preached.

In the evening, at St. Paul's church, the Bishop confirmed ten persons and preached. Twenty-three persons were confirmed in this parish at a visitation in February, one for it since at Grace church, New York.

Total confirmations in the three parishes, at this visitation thirty-seven. The Bishop seemed in excellent health notwithstanding the incessant labours, and the peculiar anxieties that have marked the year. May he be spared to us these many years, and may they still be years of unity and peaceful edification, is the prayer of many Churchmen.—Gos. Mess.

Maryland.—The number of clergy canonically resident is with the Bishop, 113 priests and 6 deacons. The ordinations of the past year have been 8. There are 15 candidates for orders in the diocese. Twenty-four Parishes and 17 congregations have been visited; in these visits the Bishop officiated in 47 churches, administering the Holy Communion 43 times; baptism to 11 infants; 251 persons confirmed; 2 churches consecrated; 2 institutions into parishes, and 1 corner-stone laid.

From the Journal we gather that in 105 parishes reporting, 86 adults, 1223 infants, and 666 not specified, have been baptized; communicants, 6206; marriages, 418; burials, 763; Sunday school teachers, 336, pupils, 2322; total amount of contributions to Church objects, $9134,97½.—Journal.

Connecticut.—The holy rite of confirmation has been administered to 541 persons; ordinations 9; Candidates for Orders 19; one church consecrated, by the name of St. John's Church Waterbury. This noble building is the most perfect in the diocese. Journal.

North Carolina.—Number of clergy 53; of Candidates 7; Ordinations 9; churches consecrated 3; confirmations 128; six adults and six infants have been baptised by the Bishop in 8 parishes; the reason of the small number of confirmations is probably that the head of the church has seen fit to deprive her for a season of the services of her Bishop.—Journal.

Missouri.—The number of clergy besides the bishop is 13; Ordinations 1; churches consecrated 1; confirmations, 93; organized parishes 12; church edifices 10; parishes visited 11. In eleven parishes reporting, 163 infants and 67 adults have been baptised; marriages 46; burials 85; communicants 516; contributions to church objects and missions $2580.00. Daily services in three parishes. The Bishop recommends the weekly offertory throughout the diocese.—Journal.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. James Chipchase having resigned Stepney and Wicomico Parishes, Somerset County, Maryland, has accepted an invitation to the rectorship of All Faith parish, St. Mary's County, in the same diocese.

The Rev. W. Hodges, has resigned the rectorship of Bruton parish, Williamsburg, Va.—S. Churchman.

Boarding and Day School for Young Ladies.

254 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.

MISS H. M. PHELPS, PRINCIPAL.

The duties of this Institution will be resumed Sept. 1st. The location of the school being intermediate between the northern and southern sections of the country, together with the superior literary advantages it enjoys, recommends it favorably to the notice of southern parents who wish their daughters to avail themselves of the system of education pursued in northern schools. Philadelphia affords facilities for acquiring the ornamental branches of learning which few other cities possess, being the centre of refinement, literature, and art, in our country, and hence, masters of eminence may be obtained for the departments of Music, Drawing, and Foreign Languages, with more certainty than in most other places. A lady from Paris is a resident Teacher, and the French will be the current language of those who study it. The whole course will be systematic, thorough and extensive. The arrangements for boarding pupils are those of a well regulated Christian household and home. The conventional forms of polite and refined society are taught as a part, not unimportant of the education of the young, while their moral and religious culture will be most carefully attended to.

Academy of the Protestant Episcopal Church,

341 Market Street.

The Autumnal Session will begin on Friday, September 1.

An addition having been made to the number of the Teachers, the schools, of which the Academy consists, (from one to another of which the pupils pass every forty minutes,) will be increased after the present vacation to six. The whole, as heretofore, will be superintended daily by the Principal, and from time to time by the Bishop of the Diocese and a monthly Committee appointed for the purpose by the Board of Trustees. Circulars may be had at the Bookstore of Messrs. E. C. & J. Biddle, S. W. corner of 5th and Minor sts., and after the present month, of the Janitor at the Academy.

G. EMLEN HARE, Principal.

Extracts from Bishop Potter's Annual Addresses to the Convention of the Diocese.

To the Convention of 1846.—"It gives me great pleasure to inform the Convention that some important measures have been adopted during the last year, towards securing to our youth the advantages of superior classical instruction, in connection with proper religious training. The classical department of the Protestant Episcopal Academy, which was established in this city more than fifty years since, through the agency of Bishop White and others, has been re-opened under the auspices of the Rev. Dr. Hare, and will afford to parents in this vicinity the means of educating boys in the most approved manner. Its funds have enabled the Trustees to make liberal provision for the sons of Clergymen, and others, on whom the charges of instruction would fall heavily, and it is hoped that the Academy will prove rich in blessing to many families."

To the Convention of 1847.—"I had occasion in my last address to call the attention of the Diocese to the provisions, which had just been made, to secure to the sons of churchmen a superior classical training, in connection with proper religious culture. The Episcopal Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, had then just been opened. The anticipations entertained of its usefulness have been more than realized. Its numbers have increased beyond expectation, and its discipline and course of instruction are worthy of all praise. In its influence, generally, and especially in its care of the manners, morals and religious principles of the young, it vindicates its claims to the confidence of all the members of our Church; and having occasion frequently myself to visit the school, I feel the greater assurance in recommending it to general favor."

To the Convention of 1848.—"The Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, has had a career, thus far, of great and uninterrupted prosperity; and it is exerting an influence on the principles and character of our children which will be felt for good long after our own earthly course has terminated. It now numbers nearly one hundred pupils." Aug. 19—5v. E

Episcopal Female Institute.

This Institution is to be opened for the reception of pupils, as day scholars, Sept. 1, in Oak street, West Penn Square, three doors north of Market street. It will be under the management of a Board of Trustees (the Bishop being Chairman), and is designed to offer to parents the opportunity of a thorough education for their daughters, under the religious training and influence of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The terms will be moderate. Parents intending to place their daughters under its fostering care are referred for further information to the Bishop, or to the Rev. J. A. Vaughan, D. D., Rector of the Institute, Oak street, or to either of the following gentlemen, Trustees, viz: Jas. C. Booth, Joseph Cabor, Samuel V. Merrick, Caspar Morris, M. D., William Welch.

It is important that, prior to Aug. 1, notice should be given to the Rector of those pupils who expect to enter at the opening of the Institute.

TERMS, (including French, Latin, Drawing, Stationery, &c.) viz: For pupils from 9 to 13 years of age, $25 per session. Over 13 years, $40. Primary Department, $12.

This Institution, which has just closed a prosperous session, is located on the McAdams road between Louisville and Frankfort, in one of the most desirable and healthful regions of the West. It is under the control and patronage of the Diocese of Kentucky. Arrangements have recently been made for the completion of extensive additions to the present College buildings, for the accommodation of students, and for the erection of an Astronomical Observatory. Every facility will be furnished for the thorough instruction of youth in this Institution, and due diligence will be required of every class of its pupils in the prosecution of their respective studies. Those who have the control of Shelby College are resolved that it shall contribute its full share in forming and perpetuating an elevated standard of collegiate discipline and scholarship. The President will receive the sons of members of the Church in his family, and give special attention to their religious and moral, as well as their literary education.

Strict attention will be given to the training of the pupils of this Institution in the various branches of English education, as well as to classical and scientific instruction. Candidates for the ministry and sons of clergymen will receive the benefits of the College gratuitously.

FACULTY.

REV. WM. J. WALLER, M. D., President, and Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy, and Natural Science.

W. W. THEOBALD, A. M., Professor of Ancient and Modern Languages.

JOSEPH WINLOCK, A. M., Professor of Mathematics and Mechanical Philosophy.

PRINCIPAL OF THE PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT.

An able and efficient officer will be engaged for this department before the beginning of the next session. The ensuing session will commence on the first Wednesday of September next. There is already belonging to the College one of the most extensive and most judiciously selected Theological Libraries west of the mountains, which will be gradually enlarged. And as it is the design of the Faculty and Trustees, that the exact and natural sciences shall be thoroughly studied by its pupils, the Institution has been furnished with an elegant Chemical and Philosophical Apparatus, as well as an extensive assortment of the best text books in these departments.

ANNUAL CHARGES.

For instruction in the Classics and the Sciences,	$40 00
per session of 10 months,
Modern Languages—French, German, Italian or Spanish, each	20 00
English studies, in the Preparatory Department,	25 to 30
Board, Fuel, Washing, &c., for a session of 10 months,	110 00
Fuel, and Servant's hire for Public Rooms,	3 50
Music and Drawing, if desired,	15 00

The expenditures of all the boys who may become members of the President's family, will be exclusively controlled by him. This rule is absolutely necessary, and will be insisted on in every case. Its firm, but mild enforcement, is found to operate, so as to effectually prevent the vexatious consequences which never fail to attend youthful extravagance and folly.

Those who may desire further information, may obtain it by addressing the subscriber, Shelbyville, Ky. WM. J. WALLER, President. Shelbyville, Ky., July 6, 1848. Aug. 5—6m

FRUITFULNESS AT HOME.—CONCLUSION.

"For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God; whiles, by the experiment of this ministration, they glorify God for your professed subjection to the Gospel of Christ."—2 Cor. ix. 12, 13.

Glistening with showers, or bright with morning dew,
Earth's fragrant breast, sweet witness, breathes around
Of power deep hid within her, to renew
Her fruitful strength, with golden harvests crown'd.
So round Augustine's honoured walls may cling Memories and hopes of fond imagining;
And England's pardoned Church may yet reveal
Her own high pledge of charity and zeal,
Returned in thankful joy from those far lands,
Where God's own work is prospering in her hands.
Their faith may kindle hers; their fervour high
Restore her broken bonds of unity;
And all the blessings of salvation, shed
Along their path, may gather round her head.
Oh! may the Missionaries' world-wide praise
On thee, dear guardian of their earliest days,
And on thy Church, descend! while love for love,
And grace for grace, Christ, from His throne above,
Awards thee still. In all thy wealth or need,

In the conversion of the world? A very important question, and bearing directly upon the object of this discourse. Can the sailor be evangelized like other men? It is a promising undertaking! Ought it to be done? I take the affirmative side of all these questions. In the first place, it ought to be done, if it can. It ought to be done out of regard to the great interests of Christianity, in evangelizing the rest of mankind. The Christian Church has undertaken the great work of missions to the Heathen. She has sent forth Christ's ambassadors to the near and the remote lands of Heathendom. She has addressed her best energies to this as her chief work on earth. I am not going to defend the propriety of Christian missions. I take this as an axiom of all true Christian practice. But if it be right to prosecute this great work, it is our duty to remove all obstacles and hindrances to its success, and one of the chief of these is the influence of seamen in foreign ports. There are it is estimated, 2,000,000 of sailors in the world, of whom 150,000 are from our own land. On the great highway of the world, they traverse up and down, and leave no port unvisited. They mingle with the people on shore; they carry, wherever they go, their characteristic vices, and they vent them with characteristic violence. They, themselves, conduct forth the ministers of the Gospel, and set them down on unchristianized shores, and then by their protuberant vices do all they can to neutralize their influence. The standard of the cross is erected in the sight of the nation, and they are the first to defame it. The minister opens his lips to proclaim a religion of holiness, and their practice gives it the open denial. The simple minded people turn from the Christian preacher's words to the Christian sailor's lives, and they shake their heads in suspicion and doubt. They cannot distinguish between professing and non-professing Christians. They judge of the tree by what they suppose to be its fruits, and they condemn both the teacher and his doctrine, and refuse to be saved. They have been known to declare, that if the sailor is going to the Christian's heaven, they have no wish to go. One foreign missionary in a frequented port has felt himself obliged to resign his proper work, of converting the Heathen and devote all his labors to the reforming of foreign seamen. Another informs us that the instructed Heathen who are under his charge, have organized a society to improve the character of the seamen from abroad. A missionary in the northern part of China, congratulates the friends of missions that ships from Christian lands are excluded from their ports. The grand commissioner of China inquires of the British Ambassador, if something cannot be done to improve the character of seamen; for, says he, "they corrupt our people, and our people abuse them." Capt. Wilkes of our own Navy has uttered, as the fruit of his large observation, this strong declaration, "that if a tenth part of the labor, means and prayers, which are bestowed upon the missions, were given to the seamen themselves, the benefit to

I have indeed been a great defaulter; but your last has recalled me from my forgetfulness; so I hope you will freely forgive, and receive my present communication with your accustomed kindness. I had prepared the enclosed rough sketch of Bethlehem for you, taken from a position at which it is never seen except by persons, who like myself, are sojourners here; a position selected because it combines with Bethlehem itself two other interesting objects. You will observe the towers of the convent, in which is the church of the Nativity nearly in the centre, and the mountains of Moab in the back ground, at the feet of which is the Dead sea. Of the village itself, just at the rising of the hill to the right of the convent, you see but little: just in the centre of the drawing is the tomb of Rachel; one of, perhaps, the best authenticated memorials of the olden time to be found in the country. The sketch shows it is "but a little way from Ephrath, which is Bethlehem" (Gen. xxxv. 16-20). A pillar was then set upon it: the spot was evidently still known familiarly in our Lord's time, by the application of an ancient prophecy, of her mourning for her children, to the circumstances of the slaughter of the Innocents; and, since then, so far as I can discover, tradition has never wavered, and the spot been marked by Jews, Christians, and Moslems, as the last resting-place of the good old Jacob's beloved wife. The present building is evidently modern, part of it very lately erected; but that it stands on the real spot where the remains were deposited some 3,500 years ago, no one seems to doubt. The conical hill on the left is now denominated the Frank mountain, or El Fureidis: it has all the appearance of having been a sharp-pointed cone, the summit of which has been cut off to afford room for a strong fortress, the massive ruins of which still remain: apparently it was a quadrangle, with huge circular towers at the corners, and of that admirable masonry exhibited in all the remains of Herod's numerous erections. Accordingly it has been supposed to be the site of Herodium, a city and castle which you will find mentioned in Josephus (Antiq. Jew. xv. 9, 4). He seems there to intimate that the hill was rather raised to, than cut down to, its present shape: he mentions the circular towers, foundations of which are very plainly to be seen. There are also many foundations, as of a city, at the base, and much which bears the appearance of huge water-works. And Josephus especially mentions that these structures on the plain were "well worth seeing, both on other accounts and also on account of the water which is brought thither from a great way off;" and the distance of three square furlongs from Jerusalem," agrees well with the position. Not far beyond it (I may mention in passing, for it will give interest to the sketch) it is a very remarkable natural feature of still-unexplored depth, which is pointed out as David's tomb of Adullam. Nor is there any improbability in the idea: it is at no great distance from Bethlehem, where his family lived; and it was there (1 Sam. xxii.) that they joined him, when Saul's insane persecutions forced him to take refuge in the wild and solitary scenes where so much of his time was for a long time spent.

So far for the view at present. I am about to carry you in another direction, because the scenes are fresh in my recollection, and I hope it will be amusing to you to have a description of a travelling expedition here, so different from anything you have experienced; as well as to hear something from a friend who has seen scenes as interesting as any which can be viewed by a human eye. I am just returned to Jerusalem from an expedition to Jericho, Jordan, and the Dead sea; and thither I desire you to accompany me.

How, however, can you picture our setting out; such a rout, and swearing of Arabs (for truly they are a race whose language is "full of cursing and bitterness"), snorting and neighing of horses, &c., &c. We were ready by six in the morning; and as Arabs are never to be trusted, where time is concerned; it was long past ten o'clock before we got in motion. And when I got on the terrace to watch the preparations, I was apt to ask, is it only a quiet, poor man going out for a walk with his family and one or two friends? or some king about on a royal progress? You know, like the snails, we must carry their houses, aye, and all their furniture along with them; and then, also, we must be guarded. The king of Abu-dis was to go with us for our protection, and a large number of his people. My own family, with servants, was ten; and three friends joined us, with their attendants, making in all seventeen; and all had to be mounted: all on mules to transport their tents, &c.; and all mules needed so that on setting forth, and counting heads, I found—human beings 42, horses 16, asses 11, mules 10. The first starting is always the worst: once in motion, it went on very tolerably; and, leaving the Jaffa-gate, we found the walls in a northerly direction, and then descended the valley of Jehoshaphat, crossed the Kedron, near the virgin and the garden of Gethsemane, and commenced the ascent of the Mount of Olives. Our road (for in these lands, so MacAdams have ever arisen, roads remain the same from generation to generation)—our road (and the recollection resting) was probably the same which David took as he fled from the capital, in Absalom's rebellion; so we must though unconscious of the precise locality, have passed a spot, where took place what I consider one of the most remarkable transactions of his remarkable life—his refusal to permit the ark to be the companion of his wanderings, and his ordering it to be carried again into the city. "And the king said unto Zadok, carry back the ark of God into the city; if I shall find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again, and show me both it and his habitation; but, if he thus say, I have no delight in thee, behold, here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good to him." We cannot doubt for a moment how he would have prized such a companion, as the seat of the divine presence, in his flight and wanderings, and may therefore estimate the extent of his self-denial and submission to the work of God, when he refused what the friendly zeal of Zadok had provided. I have ever thought this one of the most touching scenes in the bible; and it was presented to my mind with a very lively interest on the morning I passed the spot. I could not forget, too, how often the Son of David must have passed over the very ground we then trod, in his frequent visits to a spot which soon came in sight—Bethany. We passed it on our left, lying on the eastern slope of the Mount of Olives, beautifully situated amid gardens and olives and fruit-trees beginning to display their blossoms. Except the beauty of the situation and its recollections, the place has nothing to boast; it is a filthy Arab village. And Lazarus's house, the ruins of which are pointed out, is evidently a modern structure, built for defence; and his tomb (for the good people have got it too), unless my eyes deceive me much, is nothing more nor less than an old water-tank: still this folly of always fixing a spot does no harm here, except exciting a good deal of kissing dirty stones, and scratching crosses, and putting a few stray piastres into the pockets of the villagers. We were sure it was Bethany; we knew that there dwelt the family whom "Jesus loved," and often visited, and that there he raised Lazarus from the dead. We knew too that the ascent behind it was the mount of Olives; that as far as to Bethany the Son of man had led his disciples, after he was risen from the dead; and that it was somewhere very near the spot we were slowly passing that he blessed them for the last time on earth, and in the very act of blessing ascended, and a cloud received him out of their sight.

Proceeding onwards to the east the road winds down a steep declivity, at the bottom of which is a slender fountain, now covered over with a rude building, probably of the time of the Saracens, near which are the ruins of a khan. The spring is called "The well of the apostles"; and, doubtless, they and their blessed Master have drunk of its waters in their travels to and from Jericho. After this, the road is for this country excellent, but the scenery far from interesting; lame, round, verdant little hills on either side, and the dry bed of a torrent in the bottom. But, if uninteresting in point of scenery, it is interesting in the highest degree, as having been passed over by our Lord, and being in truth the very last road he trod in his journey from Jericho to Jerusalem, immediately previous to his passion. Here, too, must have been the scene of the narrative in Luke x. 30-35; a circumstance which would lead us to imagine that the regions were inhabited at that distant period by a race as wild and rude as at present. Somewhere about ten or twelve miles from Jerusalem there is a khan, now in ruins, which is said to be the πανδοχειον of St. Luke. Nor is there any improbability in supposing it stands on the same site; it is just at a narrow pass, in an ascent between two valleys; and above it are the remains of a castle of considerable strength, commanding the pass, styled by the ominous name of the Castle of Blood. I could obtain no intelligence of its history: a deep ditch forming a quadrangle of about 200 feet each way, is cut down into the solid rock, all round the fortress, isolating it completely on every side. Here we spread our carpets, and reposed for an hour or two, and then proceeded towards the plain of the Jordan. The first view of it is very striking: emerging from the mountains, all at once an almost interminable plain bursts upon the sight, clothed with the richest verdure, and at least in all the places where the numerous streamlets cross the plain, well wooded. At a distance across it rise the mountains of Moab; and on the right, as you descend, are the dark waters of the Dead sea. The circle of barrenness and desolation which everywhere environs it is here out of sight; and it presents only the aspect of a lovely lake or inland sea, in a rich and productive country. A more minute inspection, however, dispels the charm: it is soon discovered that the verdure of the plain is only the rank weeds which spring spontaneously from the soil. Man's neglect has rendered useless perhaps one of the most productive spots on the earth; and for several miles round the lake there is nothing but sand, and salt, and desolation; attesting that awful change which man's sin has entailed on a land once as the garden of the Lord in beauty and fertility. Turning northward as soon as we got upon the plain, we soon reached the Ain-es-Sultan, or fountain of Elisha, where we pitched our tents, which formed a very respectable-looking encampment, being seven in number, close to the stream which issues from the fountain, and directly in front of rocks at the south-east end of the mountains of Quarantania, the supposed scene of our Lord's temptation. It was on the evening of the 7th of March we arrived: the 8th therefore was Ash-Wednesday. You may fancy then how very appropriate the lessons for the day appeared. We chose, as we always have done in all our encampments, a particular spot under good shade which retained among us the name of "the church tree." And you may fancy the interest with which I read, and my congre-

The office of this paper has been removed from No. 89 South Fifth street, to the Book store of Mr. R. S. H. George, No. 16 South Seventh street, between Market and Chesnut streets.

Mr. George will act as Agent for the receipt of subscriptions, etc.

LAY READING AGAIN.—We have received the following communication in reference to our editorial on this subject.

For the Banner of the Cross.

In the Banner of the 5th inst., an editorial opinion is expressed adverse to the right of a layman to read the services publicly in any part of the church, when authorized by the Rector, or even by the Bishop of the diocese, or by both. Now Mr. Editor, do tell me if the heat of the weather prevented much reflection upon the queries of your correspondents, or whether you have abandoned all idea of any divine right appertaining to the Episcopal office? The three Bishops that have ruled in the Church in this diocese, have repeatedly given their cordial assent to lay reading when the services of a clergyman could not be had, and many of the soundest divines have authorized laymen to read the service and a sermon when sickness or unavoidable absence prevented their attendance. Having authority from the gentleman who received the following note, I furnish your readers with a copy of it. The writer is one of the oldest and most sagacious presbyters in this diocese, his vote is always calculated upon by those who consider themselves the most rigid adherents to rubrical propriety.

"If no other arrangement shall have been made for the afternoon service, I hope you will have the goodness to attend upon the occasion. I shall be very glad, if the rector of — who ever he may be, can perform service with as much acceptability, as have been yours in this place, and the circumstance furnishes me with an additional item of deep and long continued regret, that so many of our churches should be without a similar provision, and often have I feared that a culpable jealousy on the part of the clergy, may have, in some instances at least, contributed towards it. But why our Bishops, and indeed, our ecclesiastical bodies have not devoted more attention to this point is, to me, quite surprising. There have been several instances, such as those of Mr. Pierce, of Poplar Neck, Mr. Sitgreaves, Easton; Mr. McElroy, Bristol, &c., &c., in which the beneficial effects have been great and permanent. May we not hope that this subject will yet command due attention? I should attach more importance to it, than to the new order of deacons."

Perhaps the tenor of your remarks apply with more force to the want of authority in any Bishop to give permission to a lay reader than to an obedient layman deferring to his Bishop.

H.

To the above we remark as follows:

In the first place if "H." will read our editorial again, and it is not very just to condemn what we have not read, he will find that he has not stated the fact, when he says, "editorial opinion is expressed adverse to the right of a layman to read, &c." We said nothing about the right, we merely, expressed a "decided opinion" against "the practice." We admitted the right when we gave the Canon which legalizes what we must still call an "anomaly."

In answer to our correspondent's question about the effect of "the heat of the weather," we have only to say that while the temperature has not been very favorable to cool reflection, this did not prevent "much reflection upon the queries of our correspondents." We have thought long and calmly upon this important matter. Painful experience of the evils resulting from this practice, forced "reflection" upon the subject long ago. And in return we would ask our correspondent whether "the heat of the weather" prevented him from stating correctly the opinions of our article, or replying at all to its arguments.

Our opinion on this subject is not a proof that we have "abandoned all idea of any divine right appertaining to the Episcopal office, it is rather an evidence that we hold firmly and consistently to the Jus DIVINUM, and will suffer no infringements upon its high and awful prerogatives in deference to expediency or even supposed necessity. If our correspondent had read a little book, small only in size, entitled "Episcopacy tested by Scripture," (written by one of the Bishops whose judgments we are thought to oppose,) we will find that "the Divine right appertaining to the Episcopal office," was conferred by the Great Head of the Church, not to sanction lay ministrations but to convey that commission which alone can give virtue and authority to this solemn ministry on the part of man.

If our correspondent means to infer that in humbly and modestly expressing an opinion at variance with the practice of some of our Bishops we thereby abandon "all idea of any Divine right appertaining to the Episcopal office," we can only say that the Banner under its present Editor, is not high enough for such notions.

We challenge "H." or any other correspondent to show any lack of respect in our Paper for "the Episcopal office." We do not think it was either implied or expressed in our "Editorial opinion." We did not voluntarily obtrude this opinion. Questions were asked us, and it is generally thought to be an Editor's duty to reply to queries addressed in such a spirit. And if we speak at all it must be our honest thoughts. When we may not longer do this, we may at least abandon all idea of exercising the Editorial office!

Had it not been for "the heat of the weather" perhaps "H." would have discovered that the note he gives from one of "the oldest and most sagacious Presbyters in this diocese," affords one of the strongest arguments in favor of our "Editorial opinion" and strongly corroborates one of its positions, viz:—that the practice of lay reading has the evil result of lowering the practical estimate of the importance and necessity of a duly commissioned ministry." A doubt is expressed in this note whether the Rector of —, a minister of Christ can perform service with as much acceptability as this layman! We ask no other argument. We thank "H." for this conclusive one! "The oldest and most sagacious Presbyter of this Diocese," declares that a case within his own knowledge shows that the evil result of "lay reading," is to make the people regard more the gifts of oratory and good reading than those gifts of the ministry which are conveyed from Him to whom "all power is given in heaven and earth" through His Apostles to whom He said "Lo I am with you always even to the end of the world." Thus "H." has most clearly proved against himself what he asserts of our "editorial opinion," viz:—that those who are in favor of lay readers, as an order in the Church, "have abandoned all idea of any Divine right appertaining to the Episcopal office."

We copy the following interesting letter from THE CHURCHMAN. The friends of the writer will be pleased to learn that such "peaceable fruits of righteousness" have been produced from the good seed which he has planted.

St. Croix, July 29, 1848.

Rev. and Dear Sir:

It will be gratifying to you and my numerous Christian friends in the United States, to learn that so far as I have been able to ascertain, (and I have made a personal examination of the four hundred criminals arrested, and now confined in our prisons,) not one of the nine hundred communicants of my congregation, seven hundred of which belong to the laboring population, have, during the disturbances that have followed the emancipation of our rural population, so far committed themselves as to have been arrested.

This remarkable fact has greatly surprised the community here; while its knowledge has been hailed with joy and thankfulness by the zealous and self-denying teachers of my congregation, who, delighting in their labor of love, have, under the blessing of God, with the greatest fidelity, instructed and prepared them for admission to the Holy Communion.

Other communions here have not been equally fortunate. Out of one hundred and eighty parishes that I have examined at the "New Prison," I found nine communicants of the Moravian Missions—six communicants of the Roman Church, and three communicants of the Danish Lutheran.

Rightly to estimate the importance of the above fact, it should be known that for three days the whole country was in possession of the rural population, (the white inhabitants having taken refuge in the towns,) and that the worst portion of them, were collected in bands of hundreds, and in some instances thousands, going from estate to estate pillaging, plundering, and sacking the proprietor's and manager's residences. With the wine and spirits found in the cellars, they became intoxicated, and ready for any deeds of violence and crime.

Yet, notwithstanding, these temptations to which our rural population was exposed, our communicants have remained faithful to their Christian profession, and in numerous instances that have come to my knowledge, they defended and saved the properties of their former owners, at the peril of their lives, against the threats and attack of the godless gangs, by which they were assailed. How great this "godless multitude" is, will readily be seen, when it is known that all the churches in the Island will not afford sittings for more than six or seven thousand souls, leaving a surplus population of fifteen thousand unprovided for.

A fact like the above, should convince the most skeptical—the most prejudiced, of the urgent necessity there is of increasing the number of our church clergy, and of church accommodations, in order that our whole rural population may share equally in the blessings of Christ's Holy Gospel;—that the house of God may be opened to all, and that all may be invited, nay, commanded, to come and hear the Gospel of peace and good will preached. Although the Island is still under martial law, yet quiet and peace are restored. The people have generally returned to their work on the estates again, and the appearance of things improves every day.

With much esteem and respect, yours truly,

FLETCHER J. HAWLEY.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.—In another part of our paper will be found a large portion of the Report of the Secretary of the Domestic committee of Missions, made at the last annual meeting of the Board of Missions. It presents facts which should call forth the practical charity of the members of the Church. Wants are here presented which not only ask, but demand with authoritative voice, the liberal bounty of all who are sincere and earnest in desiring the support and extension of Christ's kingdom within the borders of our own land. Whatever doubts may exist in the minds of any with respect to their individual duty, in helping forward general missions, there can be no doubt in the minds of any faithful members of the Church, as to their obligation to aid in spreading "the Gospel in the Church," throughout the wide limits of their own country. The commands of duty designate most plainly the country where our earthly lot is cast, whose weal or woe is a portion of our present heritage, as the field wherein our most devoted labors are to be given for the glory of God, and the good of man. As the citizen owes his first allegiance to his own country, and is to advance its temporal interests before all others, so the Christian is bound by the first obligations of duty and of charity, to labor for the spiritual welfare of his own nation.

In this view of her duty, our Church has much to do. Her Great Master has given her a mighty and a glorious work to perform. This all will own who read the Report of the Secretary of Domestic Missions. The slightest knowledge of the religious state of this country, connected with due reflection upon its present political condition, and its future prospects, will give strength to these convictions. But what is the Church doing to fulfil her duty, to discharge her assumed obligations in this behalf? Let the Report answer! Let the vast regions untrodden by the foot of the missionary, let deserted stations, let half-supported, unpaid, starving missionaries swell the response!

A late conversation with the Treasurer of the Domestic Board of Missions, has impressed these unpleasant facts more forcibly upon our mind. He says that if the members of the Church could only read the letters he is constantly receiving from the missionaries, telling the wretched story of their wants and privations, occasioned by stinted or unpaid salaries, they would not be so slow, as now they are, in sending in their contributions. There has been of late a greater deficiency than usual in this income. Is it that the members of the Church of Christ have had more need for their own use, in this season of travel and amusement, of the offerings they usually bestow to keep poor missionaries and their families from want and privation?

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The Editor of the Banner has been absent from the city for the last two weeks. He has discharged his editorial duties under this disadvantage. He has to thank a young friend for faithfully superintending the publication of the Paper. Some communications may have thus been delayed, as they could not conveniently be forwarded to the Editor, nor could they be inserted without his approval.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We are obliged to disappoint a "LAYMAN," and "A SOUTHERN," this week.

New Publications.

"The Motto," for the present month, comes to us from the shades of Jubilee, containing the Episcopal address to the Convention of Illinois, and letters from and to the London Society for the discouragement of duelling, &c.

"The Constitution and Address of the Cincinnati Society for the promotion of Evangelical knowledge. The Cincinnati Society is the firstborn, in Ohio, of the so-called "Protestant Episcopal Society for the same object." We welcome the appearance of "The Literary World," for Aug. 12th and for the 19th; and of "Littell's Living Age," numbers 221, and 222. In the former "Age" we are pleased to see Tupper's Loving Ode to Brother Jonathan, as published in the Banner of July 15th.

"The Young Churchman's Miscellany for August is enriched with a kind letter from its Editor, now in London. His health is improving. The present number is not a whit behind any of its predecessors.

FROM EPISCOPAL ADDRESSES TO RECENT CONVENTIONS.—Georgia.—We extract the following important remarks from the Addresses of Bishop Elliott to the Georgia Convention. BRETHREN OF THE CLERGY AND LAITY:

Again am I permitted at this annual meeting of our Ecclesiastical body to rejoice with you at the continued and increasing prosperity of our Diocese. If, at some points, our Churches have suffered from the depressing effects of emigration, and an absorption of property into a few hands, at other and more points have they been steadily enlarging their number of Communicants, and planting themselves upon a firmer and more permanent basis. With one or two exceptions, our Parishes are entirely freed from Church debt, and our Diocesan Missionary Treasury is in better condition than it has been for years. Every thing promises a season of decided enlargement in our operations, and of increase both of Parishes and Clergymen. May the counsels in which we are about to engage be so overruled by the guidance of the Holy Ghost as that these prospects may be more than realized, and we be enabled to say at its close, that God has been with us of a truth.

Much of this prosperity is owing, under God, to the adhesion of our Clergy to their places of labour. Instead of perpetually shifting their Parishes, they have been, for the times in which we live, uncommonly permanent. During the past year, no Clergyman has transferred his Canonical residence from the Diocese, and but very few changes have taken place within it. Our larger Churches are, with one exception, occupied by the same Rectors who filled their pulpits at my election, and I trust the bond may continue until Death shall call away the incumbents to the rest of their Lord. Permanence in his field of labor is much more an element of ministerial success than is commonly supposed, and it should be a very important and providential development of circumstances that would induce a Minister of the Gospel to forego its advantages. Let me dwell, for a little while, upon this topic, as it needs very earnest consideration and a much deeper incorporation into the spirit of our minds than it has obtained.

The distinctive feature of our Church, in its external organization, is its Episcopacy, and our American branch of the Church of Christ has thought the permanence of the relation between the Bishop and his Diocese to be of such paramount importance, as to determine, by legislative enactments, that there shall be no transference of a Bishop from one Diocese to another, and has surrounded his resignation with checks of the most stringent kind. The second order of the Ministry has been left more free to act, according to its inclination and sense of duty, but still the spirit of the Church, as manifested in its view of the relation of Bishop and Diocese, must more or less shadow forth her view of the relation of Pastor and people. Although for very wise and sufficient reasons she has not undertaken to regulate by law the separation of a Minister from his people, except under very peculiar circumstances, yet has her legislation in regard to the Episcopal office, exhibited her sense of the sacredness of the ties which unite the Pastor and his flock. Her voice has been uttered, at least indirectly, against any frequent or rash severance of the Ministerial relation, and her whole spirit forbids the supposition that her sanction is given to the frequency of change which is beginning to render the Pastoral tie a matter merely of convenience or of interest. By not forbidding the change of the relation, she has declared, that there are circumstances which make it not only expedient, but proper, while at the same time, by making the Episcopal tie almost irrevocable, she has pronounced against a too ready dissolution of the relationship which binds her lower Ministry to the Flock over which the Holy Ghost has made them overseers.

In this, her solemn judgment, the Church is acting in strict accordance both with Scripture and the highest reason. Scripture teaches us that it is the Holy Ghost who guides the Church in her Ministerial arrangements, moving the smitten creature to take upon himself the sacred office, and then leading him into his field of holy labor. The Minister theoretically places himself under the guidance of the Holy Ghost, and moves neither forward nor backward, neither to the right hand nor the left, save as he may discern the pillar of cloud and of fire, lifting and settling itself. Wherever the Holy Spirit places him by those marks and tokens which he has given us for judgment, there should he abide until the same Divine presence as palpably directs him elsewhere. This is the theory, but how little is it regarded in practice; and every day are we called upon to witness in the Church the most hasty abandonment of a Flock upon grounds altogether insufficient. The merest matter of convenience is enough to determine a point of eternal importance, and souls are weighed in the balances with earthly considerations that should never be permitted to conflict with their interests. No wonder that with such a contradiction of the whole theory of Scripture and of the ordination offices of the Church, there should be a lack of blessing upon their ministrations, and that our Zion should be called to mourn, in her length and breadth, the unsteady growth of her principles and the slow development of those fruits of the Spirit, which stand very much connected with a permanent Pastoral relationship.

The highest reason, too, is in harmony with this Scriptural view of the Pastoral office. Our Lord knew what was in man, knew how much he was a creature of affection and of sympathy, and in the arrangement of the Church linked the Ministerial office as closely as possible with the hearts of his creatures. While our Holy Religion, from its incipency to its consummation, is a religion of love, no where is that love more manifest than in the intimate connexion which has been established between the Pastor and his people. The offices of Christianity stand connected with all the tenderest associations of human life, and their administration brings the Pastor into contact with his people at all those moments of joy and of sorrow which become the treasures of the heart. From the cradle to the grave, there is nothing in the family circle of most solemn and interesting which is not associated with the Minister of the Parish, and as he advances in age, he becomes the depository of feelings and of affections which never can be given to another. There gradually cluster around him an interest and a love which are the growth of years, and which swell his influence far beyond any mere improvement of his powers or his experience. His people no longer sit in judgment upon an aged Pastor, as he goes in and out among them, bearing them before the Mercy Seat, but they look upon him as children upon a parent, and listen to his counsels with hearts warmed towards him by the holiest affection. They no longer consider whether he is the eloquent orator or the accomplished scholar—he has been their friend, their guide, their counsellor in times when their hearts were buoyant with joy or smitten with grief, and they feel resting upon them all those associations which disarm criticism and make his very presence pleasurable. Those who are now the chief actors upon the scene in which he has labored, were children whom he received from their mothers' arms, and introduced into the congregation of Christ's Flock—whose religious education he has directed in the Sunday School—whose plans of life he has counselled and assisted—whose weaknesses and infirmities he has borne and covered. Complete confidence has been bestowed upon him—such confidence as nothing but time and experience can gain—and his plans and even wishes are readily adopted and cheerfully carried out. Such influence as this no man should lightly give up—he can gain it no where else, for it takes almost a lifetime to gain; and he severs, in a whole generation, feelings and associations which they never can create again in an equal degree. The increase in influence is not merely in proportion to the duration of a Minister's connexion with a Parish, but after a certain confidence has been gained, it increases with a rapidity that can scarcely be estimated by the Minister himself.

DELAWARE.—Bishop Lee gives the following interesting account of the general state of this Diocese:

DEAR BRETHREN:—The kind Providence of Almighty God permits us again to meet in annual Convention, for fraternal conference on the interests and concerns of our branch of the Church of Christ. It is not merely, I conceive, for the discharge of the ordinary business that may come before us on such occasions that we assemble, but for ends still more important; the revival and strengthening of our common interest in the welfare and prosperity of our household of faith, and the presenting with one accord our common supplications for the blessing of our glorified Redeemer. The mingling in free and friendly intercourse and joint participation in religious services of our Clergy and Laity ought to keep alive and strengthen our feelings of brotherhood, and make us realize more sensibly that we are one body in Christ. Small though our State be in geographical extent, it is yet so separated by the position and business relations of its different sections, that intercourse between its extreme parts is very limited. Without such a bond as the meeting of our Convention, from year to year, in different parishes, there would be danger of our losing that sense of community and oneness which is so essential to general prosperity. And the consideration of these advantages should induce our brethren of the Laity cheerfully to make that small sacrifice of personal convenience, which is required to ensure at our Conventions a full representation.

The year of official duty, which I am now called to review, has not varied particularly from the even tenor of the years that have preceded it. The usual amount of labor has been performed, through the kind assistance of God, ministering strength and health for his work. Did we look for great things we should be disappointed. But, despising not the day of small things, we can "thank God and take courage." Our parishes have, with very little interruption, enjoyed regular ministerial services, although at present, I must report some as vacant. The continuance of such services more constantly than had been known in many churches for a long period before, has not been without manifest beneficial effect. Our Church, I have reason to believe, is better known and more generally respected, and an increased confidence is felt in the permanence of her worship and the happy character of her influence.

On my spring and autumnal visitations, I have, with little variation, found large and attentive congregations, and a more general conformity to our mode of worship. And although the application of candidates for full admission to the privileges of our Communion, by the right of Confirmation, has not been as frequent and large as we could desire, yet fruit of this kind hath not been withheld, and, so far as I can judge, there does not so widely exist that spiritual deadness and coldness which I have heretofore had occasion to notice and deplore.

Indians.—The Committee regret to report that the Rev. Solomon Davis has been compelled from ill health, to resign the station he has long held, so honorably to himself, as Missionary to the Oneidas.

He has been succeeded by the Rev. F. R. Haff, who has been living among, and officiating for them during the last twelve months. He already has considerable knowledge of their language, and is otherwise well qualified to discharge his present duties. The Missionary Bishop of the North-West recently visited Duck Creek. He found the Oneidas very much attached to their new spiritual teacher, and quite solicitous that he should remain with them. The Bishop adds: "It is somewhat remarkable, and I feel exceedingly thankful, that a young man of good education and talents, should be ready to devote himself for life, to these people. I confirmed 17 persons. The congregation, as well as the nation, is steadily increasing in numbers, and in the arts and virtues of civilized life."

During the past year, the Committee pursued the course suggested, in order to obtain a title to the missionary property at Green Bay, until they were notified of the inability of government to grant it under existing laws. In this case, however, of admitted equity and justice, the Committee were advised to apply to Congress for relief. This has been done. A bill has been introduced, and is now in progress, which provides for this and similar cases which exist.

While attending to this, the Secretary was informed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that the Chiefs of the Chickasaw nation had recently applied for Manual Labor and Mission schools, to be conducted among them by the Episcopal Church; and that he had communicated their wish, at their request, to the Bishop of Tennessee.

The Government of the United States propose to advance out of funds belonging to this nation, $6,000 towards the erection of necessary buildings, and an equal sum annually, for 20 years, towards the current expenses of the Mission.

No answer had then been received from the Bishop, nor is any additional information in possession of the Committee, except of a general nature, obtained by the Secretary during interviews with a deputation of said chiefs at Washington.

But the Committee earnestly trust that this favorable opportunity of establishing Missions among the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi, will not be disregarded. The Committee have sought, though in vain, to rouse the Church to a proper sense of this duty. And now, these natives of the forests themselves come, knock at the portals of our Church, and with money, the price of the soil where the bones of their fathers lie, they offer to pay for the privileges of the Gospel, in possession of the white man, and for the instruction to be given them and their children, in the arts and blessings of civilized life.

Condition and Liabilities of the Treasury.—Since the meeting in June last, $28,635 90 have been received. This sum is $5,540 46 more than was received during the previous year.

And but for the fact that the indebtedness of former years rests as an incubus upon all its operations, it is confidently believed, a sum fully equal to the estimates of the present year would have been realized.

In the effort to bring up arrears to the present time, the Treasury is still indebted to the Missionaries for salaries due on the 1st of April last, $7,325. This is about $3,500 less than was due them at this period of last year.

The Committee also state, that less has been received than was reasonably expected, by this time, in payment of voluntary pledges made last year, and due on or before the 15th of June inst.

Local or temporal reasons have delayed, and in some instances, perhaps, will prevent a full redemption. At least it is not prudent to rely upon them.

The time appointed by the Triennial meeting for a general collection throughout the Churches, (on Advent Sunday,) was too early in the season, and too soon after the adjournment of the General Convention to produce the desired result. Many had scarcely reached their spheres of duty ere the time arrived. While in more distant parts of the country it had passed before the resolution of the Board was known.

Many parishes also postponed the collection until a more convenient season. This has not yet arrived, or at least no returns have been received.

It is worthy of note, that a considerable portion of the amount, in answer to the appeal of last year, was received from new parishes, from missionary stations, from self-supporting, but still feeble parishes, which once received missionary aid, and from some which have never before contributed.

The annual contribution of some of the larger parishes has not yet been received; that of others has unexpectedly diminished; while others have contributed of their abundance, with their accustomed liberality. It will also be noticed, that the fundamental principle, of contributing as well as of receiving, has been much more fully recognized, in the liberal returns this year made by portions of the country receiving missionary aid.

In January last, the Missionaries were paid the amount due them on 1st April previously, after a delay of nine months.

In May last, the salaries due on 1st October previously, were all remitted, being four months after the former were paid. And now, the Treasurer is endeavoring, and beyond the means provided by the Church, to discharge the debt due the Missionaries on the 1st of April last.

The Committee thus again, place the condition of their affairs before that body, to which it is their duty annually to present them; and from which it is right, to expect judicious counsel, cordial sympathy, and firm support. These, they are grateful to record, have heretofore been given.

They submit their report therefore for acceptance; and they ask the counsel and efficient action of this Board, upon the momentous interests entrusted to them.

If these were solely of a temporal or worldly nature, they would, long ere this, have resigned them for other and less anxious cares.

But remembering the position which the Church of their affections has assumed before Christendom, as a Missionary Church; when they note the indications of His Providence, who condescends to use it as His honored instrument for the salvation of men, distinctly pointing to the field of labor lying at our very doors, and stretching far beyond our present occupation, to the remotest boundaries of this continent; when they reflect upon the elements destined to exert a mighty influence for good or evil upon the character of this nation, which are now being cast upon its shores; when they attempt to measure the consequences to this nation and to the world, if this people shall not be taught to acknowledge, and in all their ways to honor God; when, too, they remember that He will judge each member of His Church, and will estimate the value of their deeds according to the opportunity and the ability which He has given—they dare not look back—they would not, if they could, relax their efforts in His service. They again lift up their voice in earnest appeal, and ask that the cause of Domestic Missions may receive the attention it deserves, and so imperatively demands.

On the Death of Mrs. Eliza J. R. Barney.*

BY A LADY.

She died,—the beautiful and young,
While life's fair morn was gay and bright;
Ere hope had ceased her syren song,
Or joy was lost in sorrow's night.

She died;—an Angel plucked the flower,
Too lovely, long on earth to stay,
And bore it to the heavenly bower,
To bloom in everlasting day.

Prayer rose on her departing breath
Ere yet the spirit took its flight;
And Faith, victorious over death,
Unclosed the blissful gates of light.

No tear henceforth the eye shall dim,
No sorrow swell the anxious breast;
In heavenly Jerusalem
Awaits a pure, unbroken rest.

There let our fervent wishes tend,
Our holy hopes, sublimely rise,
To gain the spirit's noblest end,
A blest reunion in the skies.

Loved friends, whose memory still is dear,
Long gone before us into bliss,
Shall at the threshold, then appear
To lead us to the realms of peace.

These bodies, though in dust arrayed,
Transformed,—shall join the throng above;
Like Christ's most glorious body made;
And live an endless life of love.

On Wooden Churches.

A Paper read before the Ecclesiological Society, on the evening of the 7th June, 1848. By the REV. WILLIAM SCOTT, M.A., Incumbent of Christ Church, Hoxton, England.

In more respects than one the subject which has been laid upon me is not only invested with a practical interest as connected with the immediate wants of the Church in the Colonies of this Empire, but it is one which in itself would demand some careful thought. Wooden churches are important not only historically, but, as may be thought, under a higher view, viz., symbolically. The very first type of the Spiritual Church was the ark, made of "gopher wood": and S. Ambrose and S. Augustine, as may be known to many of you, seem but to represent the general mind of the Patristic Church, when they teach that the actual material ark, formed immediately under Divine command, was in some remarkable minute particulars, both of construction and proportion, an exact type of great Christian mysteries which few in this place will be disposed to doubt are reproduced, at least in the general, in every Christian church. The symbolism of churches—the mystical import of the temple and its measurement—the significant decorations of the tabernacle and its furniture, are but instances of a law which was for the first time promulgated in the building of the wooden ark. And if S. Augustine confutes the Manichæan by instancing the ark itself, as in many particulars of construction—especially in its door—typical of our Lord Himself, and in our Lord also of that Holy Church which is His Body, it would be thoughtless in ourselves to conclude that its material of wood were not invested with some peculiar claims upon Christian consideration.

Again, as long as the ship is the emblem of the Church—as long as one of every church's more familiar parts, the nave, is identical with the name of a ship navis—as long as we see in the inverted hull of a ship and its arched timbers the image of the church's wooden roofs, we shall in the reverse way not only detect in wooden churches a recurrence and witness to the first type of the Church itself—that great material prophecy, the wooden ark of Noah; but we shall at the same time find that a wooden church, with somewhat more vividness than even one of stone, suggests to us the great hold of Christian souls—the ship of the Christian Church.

But apart from these considerations—which I only choose to hint at—there is a scientific aspect under which wooden churches become an important study. In decomposing architecture the ultimate term is always wood: and it is, I suppose, not too much to say that the very first and primary elements of construction will be found to be wooden. The simplest, because most natural building is of wood. Trees were felled before stone was quarried.

*See Obituary Notice.

I am not asking your assent to that pretty and sentimental theory which derived Pointed architecture, directly and immediately, as though by some sudden impulse of vitality, without any intermediate stages, from a living forest; or to Sir James Hall's application of it, who sees in crockets and foliated pinnacles but the sprouting buds of wicker-work, inserted for ornament, on, or round, long poles, and who tells us that all Gothic art is only a kind of fossilized basket-work: but it is well to bear in mind this plain series of chronological facts; that Pointed architecture can be traced step by step, and almost year by year, from classical forms, and that classical temples, even in their most elaborate guise, are nothing but the translation into stone of that simplest and most elementary construction of wood. A colonnade and pediment, however gorgeous, is nothing elementarily, as has been often shown, but a row of wooden posts thrust into the earth, with a roof of timber logs triangularly imposed upon them, forming a pediment of three pieces of wood, and horizontal entablature of wooden beams for the flank: and if the wooden shed developed into the stone colonnaded temple,* and if the temple developed into the basilica, and the basilica into the Pointed church, by regular and known steps, then in every church, however gorgeous, we may still recognize the original wooden idea, which was the primary one.

It seems to me that it was almost with difficulty that the Church could forego the wooden element. In Saxon churches the long and short masonry has been already termed "stone-carpentry": the triangular windows and doorways of this early period of art, mere straight slopes without curves, are instances of the same wooden construction. The ends of the roof-rafters exposed in the flank of a classical building, which are often ornamented with a lion's head, a patera, or a wreath, and are termed modillions, survive in the grotesque heads of the corbel-tables which always occur in Norman architecture below the eaves.† And throughout all periods of ecclesiastical art wooden roofs have reluctantly yielded to stone groining: and while the great Suffolk open timber roof yet competes, and some think not unsuccessfully, with vaulting itself in pictorial effect, it must be owned that the stone ribs of the latter are scarcely so true to fact, and are scarcely so real,—the first essential of constructive art,—as the wooden braces from which they are plainly transferred.

If wood then has, merely as a material, these dignified aspects both of symbolism and of being unquestionably the primitive element of all practical construction, and from which all architecture, as far as that of the Christian Church is concerned, has been legitimately developed from a classic origin. I think that we are bound to attempt to raise it from the sordid character which it has hitherto borne. We have looked at it as a defective and inferior material, which in a sense it is: development, if true, involves the notion of improvement. The discovery of the principle of the arch, for example, enables us to span spaces for which a block of stone or beam of wood were insufficient. I am not going to say that a stone church as such is not better than a wooden church. But what I would suggest is, that if a stone church is developed from a wooden church, therefore the stone church implies and assumes the wooded idea; and if we would build wooden churches properly, we must proceed by analyzing our existing stone churches, and endeavour by successively throwing off the accidents, the long array of elaborate beauties and ever-varying combinations which are peculiar to a stone construction, to arrive at last to the archetypal plan, which seems wooden. But here I would guard myself against being supposed to have adopted what I cannot but think a very extravagant opinion, that there was any time in the ecclesiological history of this and our neighbouring islands in which all, or even the great majority of, the churches were built of wood. Perhaps in its broadest form Mr. Paley has adopted this sentiment, when he tells us "That there can be no doubt that the great majority of Saxon churches were of wood," which is going far beyond the cautious, yet still in my judgment somewhat exaggerated position of one of the authorities whom he cites, the author of the "Introduction to the Churches of Yorkshire," who thinks that "there is reason to believe that the churches of the British were little better than buildings of wood": though he only goes so far as to say "that Anglo-Saxon churches, even of some note, were often built of wood." Until lately, it was the fashion to believe that there were no stone churches in England until the eleventh or twelfth century. Grose, in the preface to his Antiquities, says that "the Saxon churches were mostly built with timber: and the few they had of stone consisted only of upright walls, without pillars or arches." Sir James Ware, on the authority of a passage in S. Bernard's Life of S. Malachy, expresses a decided judgment that no stone or mortar building in

* This derivation of classical architecture from a wooden construction, and the resolution of the Parthenon itself into its shed type is beautifully brought out in Hope's Essay on Architecture, pp. 20, 21—27.

† The ends of the transverse beams forming the poop of the Chinese Junk now exhibiting in London, which project from the decks, are carved in monsters' heads, and present a perfect wooden corbel-table, highly enriched with decorative colour.

Ireland is older than A. D. 1148; while for Scotland Pinkerton follows the same line, and affirms that all Celtic buildings, houses and churches, up to the twelfth century were only constructed of wattles. The chief authorities usually cited in behalf of this notion of the universality of wooden churches, are the Venerable Bede, who tells us that S. Finian, on becoming Bishop of Lindisfarne, A. D. 652, "built a church fit for his episcopal see, not of stone, but of sawn oak covered with reeds, after the Scottish [that is Irish] manner." Two manuscript authorities,—one quoted by Ussher from a life of S. Patrick, the other from a MS. life of S. Monenna, go to the same extent; viz., that the Scots, that is the Irish and Scotch—for it is known that the same nation is meant—were accustomed to erect buildings only of smoothed timber.

Another passage of Venerable Bede has been produced for the same purpose, speaking of the baptism of S. Edwin by S. Paulinus at York, on Easter-day, A. D. 627, in the church of S. Peter the Apostle, which while a catechumen he had built of wood. But surely the least reference to the original would have shown that this was rather an extraordinary case: this wooden church was run up extemporaneously expressly for this baptism—"quam de ligno cum catechizaretur atque ad percipiendum baptismam instruere citato opere construxit." And then the historian goes on to say that S. Edwin immediately prepared to build a noble basilica of stone. On the other hand, in well-known passages, the same Bede speaks of a British church built at Verulam, A. D. 300, fitting to the dignity of S. Alban's martyrdom and of the church built at Witherne, Candida Casa, in Galloway A. D. 412. But it seems we are not left to the uncertainties of literary evidence on the occasion. We are in possession of what is more decisive than a few passages from MSS. or from authors whose testimony is, whichever way tending, only incidental, and who certainly never had the question itself placed before them. Mr. Petrie, in his well-known work (from which the above citations are taken,) has indisputably connected the erection of the Round Towers, as Christian edifices, with the times of S. Patrick himself and of his immediate successors. These edifices we all know are of stone; and in England we have a complete series of actual stone buildings, extending from the Roman foundations of Dover and Brixworth, in an unbroken series, through both British and Saxon times. Roman Britain was by no means a barbarous country: and though the Saxon invasion destroyed most British churches of the Basilican plan, yet it would be contrary to all likelihood and experience that the old rules and types of ecclesiastical buildings were so obliterated that at or before the period of the Heptarchy an indigenous style, without reference to a classical origin, grew up spontaneously in Saxon England, which first covered the land with some 50,000 wooden churches, and that gradually this style developed into stone.

The truth seems to be that all along wooden churches have been built pretty much as they are now. I suspect that generally speaking they were the exception rather than the rule. The rude and small Cyclopean ecclesiastical buildings actually existing in Ireland, and of the most remote antiquity, prove that stone was used not only for very small churches, but even for oratories, among a people who certainly were not in the arts of life superior to the British, so long associated with the presence of Roman civilization. Probably very many of the first British churches were Basilican in plan, stone in construction. Besides this, while such churches as Brixworth certainly represent the occidental type of the Basilica, I would suggest that the Irish churches, of a Cyclopean construction, and which certainly are not Basilican in plan, and perhaps such a church as Daglingworth, might possibly represent a class of churches which are still more indigenous to the faith, and which, of oriental derivation, represent the ante-Basilican churches which perished in the Dioclesan persecution. We have therefore in these islands actual specimens of two vast classes of churches all in existence before the Saxon invasion, which were not of wood. After the Saxon invasion of England had destroyed most of the existing churches, their immediate successors followed the prevailing occidental development of the Basilica, and were probably as close imitations of the ante-Saxon English Basilica as the unpractised architects of those times could command, standing perhaps in as near a relation to the Basilican structures of Roman and Romano-British art, as our first attempts at revived Gothic did to a genuine Pointed church. Contemporaneously both with British and Saxon and Norman churches, arose in poor places, deficient in materials, quarries, and roads, wooden churches, just as they are required in Canadian forests, or at Newfoundland fishing-stations. Or if a sudden call upon the Church's energies, like the baptism of King Edwin, demanded the immediate erection of a church, a temporary wooden building arose at York, just as it does now in the Finchley fields, or on the shores of Hong Kong.

Nor was the wooden church confined to British or Saxon or even Norman times; probably it was constantly being erected. Occasions for this opus tumultuarium would habitually recur in all ages of the Church. The perishable material of which wooden churches were constructed is a sufficient reason that so few have survived; yet it is remarkable that the two, which are most familiarly known as remaining in England, are of dates so widely separated. There was a third wooden church in existence near Worcester a few years ago, of which I believe some drawings in Mr. Butterfield's possession have been made. Two other wooden churches are known to Mr. George Scott, both of the timber and plaster construction; one has a clerestory. The chancel of the little chapel at Little Greenstead in Essex, in which the wooden construction survives, sheltered the remains of the martyr S. Edmund in their translation from London to S. Edmund's Bury in the year 1013, thus giving the eleventh century as the date of one wooden church still existing: while there is extant documentary evidence, quoted by Ormerod in his history of Cheshire, that the parochial chapel of Nether Peover in Cheshire, the other authenticated wooden church, was "built by the parishioners in the reign of Henry III., and dedicated to S. Oswald."* (The Tower was built of stone, A. D. 1582.)

It is remarkable that we have thus a range from Saxon to Middle Pointed art in these two structures; and I do not know that I am generalizing too rapidly if I conclude that had time spared them we should have seen stone and wooden churches rising contemporaneously through every period of ecclesiastical art. Wood and stone had been running a parallel course; and if they are destined again to do so, as it is now generally admitted that Middle pointed is the perfection of Christian art, at least for temperate climates, if we are called upon in these days to construct a wooden church, our plan will be to attempt to resolve or decompose into its simplest elements a Middle pointed church, to translate back the complex development of stone into its germ of construction—the wooden one—common not only to all churches but to all buildings.

To say then, which would be my first canon with respect to a new wooden church, that it must show its real construction, is only to put in another form what I have already suggested. If wood is the natural and primary constructive element, all that is true in stone and not mere ornament growing out of an accidental material, will be found in wood. We must remember what we are working with, wood, and discard rigorously and unceremoniously all that is essential to stone. Though even in this matter I should be perhaps disposed to go further than some among us would advance, in saying that after all there is very little in the way of principle, of which wood is incapable. For all the essential parts of a church we have actual examples in wood. Facts prove that it is plastic enough.

The roof of wood exists in such familiar notoriety that it is needless to do more than to allude to this feature.

Lychgates will furnish a sufficiently abundant number of instances, together with the halls of the timber mansions, the rows of Chester, &c. for the practical construction, as I think, of piers and arches, as will the fine old barns, which consist of nave and aisles. Wooden porches are far from uncommon, and these will give us both arcades and windows.

Of wooden walls we have actual English instances, in the two churches of Greenstead and Nether Peover, together with the strange Norwegian fabrics to which I shall presently allude.

And though unquestionably there is a difference between stone and wood as a material of construction, we must either admit that most of our wooden-screen work is very unreal, or that wood and stone are not so incapable of being applied to the same purpose, when we bear in mind the parapets, the buttresses, the weather-tables, the pinnacles, the battlements, which are unquestionably external features, and as we should therefore conclude, to be restricted to stone, but which as a fact do occur in almost every piece of wood-work with which we are acquainted. Nay even instances exist of screen-work in which the mouldings are exactly the same as of the contemporaneous stone-work. The wooden rood-screen of Stanton Harcourt, said to be the earliest existing in England, has mouldings exactly identical with those of the chancel-arch in which it is placed. A Middle-Pointed chapel in Willingham church, Cambridgeshire, exhibits the original high-pitched wooden construction of roof, with its plain canted ribs, executed in stone; while on the other hand Warmington, in Northamptonshire, imitates the ordinary First-Pointed stone groining and bosses, being in fact what looks like a regular vaulted roof, but actually executed in wood.

Wooden belfries, either in the shape of bellcotes, as in Hampshire, dwarf spires as in Essex, small square turrets as in Surrey and Sussex, and the class of wooden campaniles which have been called frame-towers, and which are nearly peculiar to the two last counties, represent another essential of a church in wood.

With all these actually existing portions of a church among us of a wooden construction, which taken together do certainly seem nearly if not quite to exhaust all the constituent members of a whole church,—belfries, walls, windows, piers, arches, roofs: the difficulty in composing out of such an abundance of materials, a wooden church of given and definite character and of an harmonious style will surely not be great. And if it be objected, as I conjecture that it may be, that I have gone too far in admitting the mutual convertibility of wood and stone, I would ask the objector to point out definitely in the features which I have mentioned what is peculiar to stone and what to wood?

If I am asked the question myself I would suggest that the peculiarity and inconvertibility, if I may say so, of the two materials of construction, consist not so much in details as in the mind and general character, the moral bearing, so to say, and ethos of the stone church and wooden church respectively. As to the details what is proper and peculiar to each style, I am not at all competent to go into the question; but when I see a large compartment of a wooden screen filled with Middle pointed tracery, monials, and so on, I do not myself see why this should not be glazed, in other words, why a wooden window, even of flowing tracery is utterly inadmissible. I must put the dilemma strongly and forcibly, without committing myself to either horn of the difficulty. Either you must allow wood to advance one step further than it has done hitherto, and admit it to window tracery, and to a vast deal of external work now restricted to stone; or you must consistently confine wood to a very narrow range indeed: you must deprive screen-work of that generous and large flow which it has enjoyed: you must retrench its buttresses and pediments: you must check its luxuriance in arches which support nothing: you must deprive it of its piercings which admit no light, and of its niches which can be no practical defence from any weather. To be consistent you must either admit the claims of wood, or you must pronounce much more strongly on the utter unreality of the very finest ecclesiastical wooden work in existence than I have yet found realists to do. But quitting this subject for abler and more competent judges to enter upon—though θεῖον Φυλάττω I have thrown out a claim for the extended application of wood—I will just mention what seem to me in some instances to be the chief requisites for a good wooden church.

First, however, let me premise that, such as they are, there are abundance of wooden churches both in the United States and in the North American provinces, belonging to our own empire. Their chief value to us will be in the way of warning, since they practically exemplify almost every error which is possible in such a building. They may be divided into two classes: 1. the frame church; 2. the log church.

1. For an account of the Frame Church, I am indebted to a communication from the Bishop of Newfoundland, which I will read in extenso.

"The number of churches belonging to the Anglican communion is between forty and fifty, and the Romanists have as many more—but all are of wood, except one belonging to our communion at Harbour Grace. The condition of that one is not such as to encourage us to attempt more stone ones till we possess larger means and have had longer experience.

"It must be premised that the forests are almost universally of spruce or fir; pine is rare, and hard wood of any good size almost unknown, except to the north-west of the island, where the inhabitants are few.

"Sticks for the frame are cut in the woods, and hauled out in the winter over the snow. They could not be got out at any other season for want of roads. When the pieces of framing are brought to the spot, they are put together and put up by the natives. These pieces vary from four to eight inches (seldom however being six inches) in thickness, the sills commonly being a little stouter than the uprights. The frames sometimes stand on a footing of stone, i. e. a low wall of rough stones laid on the ground, with or without mortar; but most commonly are only supported or shored up, on a few stout piles or posts just sufficiently near for that purpose, to keep the frame from the ground. The frame thus put up, is covered with rough planks or boards, also cut from the woods, and these again with clap boards or weather boards, feathered in with a feather edge, and lapping one over another, and presenting a succession of horizontal lines, four inches apart, which at first is very strange and painful to English eyes. The frames are covered also inside with plain boards, called 'ceiling,' and these and the upper floor are generally American spruce or pine. The floor is commonly double on account of the cold, as the wind circulates freely under it. The roofs are covered with shingle (of wood) which is of course very light, and is not any way objectionable. The outside walls are painted to preserve them. Nothing like an ornamental timber roof has been attempted, partly because there is little large or good wood in the island, and partly because few or no persons know how to construct them. There is commonly a flat ceiling of plank or plaster, or occasionally a little coved: this is done for warmth, and the people not knowing better, think an open roof unfinished. The tie-beams go across at the first side piece about halfway down, and are merely rough sticks or poles nailed to the couples. Light open roofs might easily be constructed if we had any good models or drawings not elaborate or expensive. The pitch of the roofs is commonly very flat. Galleries are almost universal, and one excuse is made for them which does not apply in England. The frames, as I have said, are merely placed on a footing of stone, or on piles, and are not otherwise fastened or united with the ground. They are consequently liable to be shaken or moved by the winds, the stroke of which in this country is exceedingly powerful, and require to be stayed and strengthened. Now the upright posts of the galleries run from the floor to the roof at intervals of about ten or twelve feet, and cross pieces to support the front of the galleries go from upright to upright the whole length of the church, from west wall to the east. These greatly strengthen and support the frame. The upper floors, ceiling, and seats are generally of American spruce or pine. The steps to the altar are of wood: and font there is none. The windows, strange to say, are numerous and large, without mullions or tracery of any kind, and filled with large square panes. Diamond panes are unknown. All glass is imported. The heads of the windows are commonly pointed, sometimes round. The walls when completed are from six to ten inches thick. Sometimes the clap boards are put on the frames without the under plankings, of course only for economy. You might erect a decent shell of a church, fifty feet by thirty, for £150, with the help of the inhabitants; that is, not having a tower. The tower would cost from £60 to £90 more, and is generally much desired by the people. It is merely ornamental, not carrying a bell, or being otherwise of use, except that it commonly serves for a porch, and also for a way of ascent to the gallery. Here is the principal entrance to the church, though very frequently there is an entrance also at the east end. The fittings up are, as might be expected, very bad, for besides the galleries which run to the very east end, (there being no chancel,) we have narrow high pews running up also to the east wall, and enclosing the rails of the altar. The pulpit and reading-desk and clerk's seat stand in the middle passage or alley if there be one, not small by degrees and beautifully less, but rising from the clerk's seat to the preacher's towering eminence (a bad eminence, as my friend P. calls it). All these are of course immediately in front of the altar and east window.

Sometimes they are within the rails and against the centre of the east wall, between two windows, the holy table being then in front of the reading desk. The towers are either finished at the top with a pyramidal capping of shingle, which is appropriate and pleasing to the eye, or with a parapet and battlements, which, as everybody knows and sees to be of inch or half-inch deal, look very ridiculous. There are now at least twenty churches in the island at a stand for want of funds, as the poor people cannot do the inside work and fittings-up themselves, and have not the means of paying for materials or work. These might be completed decently at an average cost of £250 each, and if I had the means at my command, I might banish the abominable pews and galleries, by the sale of which the churches are generally finished and fitted up, and might put some good models before the people. I shall be thankful for plain correct patterns. It would be a great thing to get one perfect pattern (in wood) made in England, I mean, to be, and be used as, a church; or, at least, windows, doors, and roof; and set it up in a crowded suburb of S. John's, where one is very much wanted, and the Clergy and others coming from the out ports might see and copy it. The wall plate is here carried all round the building, and prevents the east window running up, as it should do, into the roof, and we want skill to alter this, which is a very great defect. The remedy commonly applied here is to make the east window longer, i. e. lower down, and larger than the rest! I have sent drawings to explain this detail, which however are not made to a scale: particularly they are too high considerably."

2. The Log Church, which both on the score of economy and reality I am disposed to prefer, is described in Dr. Beave's "Recreations of a Long Vacation," &c. (Toronto: Rowell, 1846.) It appears that the most simple kind of wooden church is formed of trees laid horizontally one on another like the log-houses. This mode of building has at least tradition in its favour; for the old heathen temples of the Canadian Indians were of this construction. The Canadian log churches are nearly square in plan, with huge windows; and the walls being thin, their frames are only nailed on the surface of the walls.

It is obvious that the prevalence of flat horizontal lines in both the frame church and log church is fatal to the great principle of Christian architecture, its verticality.* I see no reason why, not perhaps the same extent, but still a considerable amount of verticality, should not be obtained in wooden, as in stone churches. The ordinary timber and plaster houses of England, whose construction for the walls was also used at least in the wooden churches of Cheshire, and still remains in Nether Peover, displayed the actual constructive timbers in situ, viz. the frame-work, the uprights, diagonals, and horizontal pieces, while the interstices were filled up with plaster. The same holds of the Swiss chalets. There would of course be no objection to recommend this mode of construction, where the climate will admit of plaster. But as I find, at least in British North America, that the frost destroys plaster and cement, we must look out for walls which shall be all timber, and as a rule I should prefer the log church. Here the opposite mode of construction in Greenstead will help us. The walls of this church are composed of plain trunks of oak trees, disposed, not horizontally, but vertically. This construction might most reasonably be suggested for Canada. To save expense, to bring out the reality of the construction, I would, after constructing an ordinary frame-work, pin to the outside plain trunks of fir trees, split or sawn down the middle, with the rough unbarked side outwards. This wooden wall should be double, with a sufficient space between the two series of trunks to be filled up with the ordinary non-conductors so essential to the warmth of a building in Canada or Newfoundland. The inner row of timber would of course present their sawn faces to the interior of the church, and if these trunks were placed alternately, with their broad and narrow ends corresponding, and the space between the rows, of a foot and a half, or two feet wide, were filled with pine leaves, sawdust, or moss, tightly rammed, I think a good weather-proof wall would be constructed. One especially advantage of this thickness of wall is, to get the window frames, which hitherto have been merely external additions nailed on to the wall, actually constructed in its thickness with an inner and outer splay.

These vertical trunks would be let into wooden sleepers, which, as they are used on our English railways even in preference to stone, cannot admit of very rapid decomposition. If greater warmth were needed, there seems no reason why both walls and roof should not be felted, or why the external timbers should not be caulked and pitched. Pitch where we are building with pine trees cannot be out of place; and its subdued tint is preferable to the glare of paint.

The lines, then, of these wooden walls are vertical, which is a great point; and while we find the walls of Greenstead of the vertical construction, such as I have described, we find those of the ancient Norwegian churches, which seem to be of planks, or sawn boards, also disposed vertically. There seems no reason for the horizontal arrangement which prevails in America. This vertical arrangement of the wall timbers is almost the only constructive feature which can be made out from a paper, very meagre and unsatisfactory, on the timber churches of Norway, which was published in Weale's Quarterly Papers some few years ago. Of the wooden churches of Norway themselves a description is nearly impossible. They consist of strange stories added to and fantastically piled upon each other. The walls are very low, yet the building is carried up to a considerable height by deep sloping penthouse roofs, rising up one behind the other, with gables surmounted by peaks which curve forward in a singular manner. The entire roof is nearly five times the height of the outer walls. The pitch of the roof it need hardly be said is very acute, and the eaves project boldly beyond the outer walls.

These are features to be carefully preserved in designing a wooden church. The pitch of the roof is very important in a country where the heavy snows are so dangerous to a flat roof, and the projection of the eaves is equally necessary to throw the rain and melted snow clear from the foundation. The eaves, would of course be finished and ornamented, where means exist, either by rich barge-boards, or by a coned cornice, admitting any amount of characteristic enrichment and moulding, as at Peover.

* Vide Ormerod's Cheshire, vol. i. p. 449. There is an engraving of this church in the Cambridge Camden Society's Illustrations of Monumental Brasses.

One feature alone remains with reference to the walls:—should there be any buttresses! There is a passage in Bede which certainly implies the existence of wooden buttresses in a wooden church. Speaking of the death of S. Aidan, A. D. 651, that it took place while he was leaning against a certain buttress of the church "adclinis destinæ quæ extrinsecus ecclesiæ pro munimine erat adposita"—he goes on to state that this same destina, whatever it was, on two occasions escaped conflagrations, "ab ignibus circum cuncta vorantibus absumi non potuit." The destina was afterwards transferred to the interior of a church. I do not lay much stress upon this, although the English editor Smith distinctly states that destina was "quod hodie Anglice Buttress vocatur," and although Dugange supports the same sense; because it may possibly only mean some beam of the frame-work.

There remains the difficult question of windows; and though I own that, as at present taught, I see no fatal objection to traceried windows, especially if they were not too large actually to be cut, as stone is cut in its separate members, out of the solid block—yet I must admit a distinction. Wood, as I have said, is wood; but all wood is not susceptible of the same treatment. Pine-wood admits much less variety, much less of a flowing character, much less of mass and carving, than does oak. I am not certain, therefore, that curved lines of any sort are very suitable to deal. Deal is a very rigid and inflexible material—in growth it only takes straight lines; and suitable as its character is to uprights, shafts, and vertical lines, or to the horizontal lines of wall-plates or cornice, it seems reluctant to admit the arch. The knees of oak form natural arches of the most exquisite beauty, as many must have observed, in the commonest cart-sheds of our country parishes. But such is not the case with pine. And as few of the forests where wooden churches are most required consist of anything but pine trees,* I conceive that square-headed windows and doors are most suitable to the only material, deal, with which we are concerned. The same may be said of mouldings: when working in deal simple splays are more suitable than a system of rolls and hollows.

Another observation I will venture on with regard to windows. I cannot but feel that the exquisite beauty of window tracery led in the best period of ecclesiastical art to an exaggeration entirely fatal to the fundamental notion of a window.—Even the fine tracery windows of Middle-Pointed, still more the huge four-thousand square feet of glass, which we find in the Third-Pointed of Gloucester, were separate facts rather than subordinate members of the composition; they were studies of wonderful complexity—they were vast pictures—they were frames for stained glass; they were not holes for the admission of light. We study each window of developed Pointed for its own sake as much as a subordinate member in the church. Now, in this respect, Romanesque was more truthful. There is something very real in what the late Mr. Hope, speaking of S. Zeno, in Verona, describes as an arrangement of small lights close together, forming round the top of the wall under the cornice a sort of fascia or band of balustraded openings. I think that in our wooden churches we might learn a lesson from Italian Pointed work, in which the windows are very much subdued and very high up, (Ex. pl. 28—Hope), as in the Duomo of Ferrara; and in Canada, curiously enough, for the same reason that the windows are so small both in Italy and the East, which is to keep out the weather, whether heat or cold. (See Beaven, p. 187, who remarks that "our Canadian churches are too light; the sun in summer and the snow in winter produce an intolerable glare.")

As to the roof, it will be of a high pitch, and will be covered with massive shingle. I find that the Norwegian churches have a ridge-crest. Clerestories, although they have the Norwegian authority, interfere, I think, with that subdued humility, that retiring and unpretending dignity which ought to characterise a wooden church. A wooden church must depend for ecclesiastical character not so much upon its ornament, or even upon its light and shade, except what will be gained by the bold projection of the eaves; it will probably present externally neither buttresses nor strings, neither base or hood mouldings, no corbel-table, no dripstones. Its materials will be simple; its frontage flat—its height of wall comparatively insignificant. All must depend upon good proportions, upon the bold lines and pitch of the roof, upon the projection of the porch, upon the actuality of the bell-cote. To build up a tall square packing-case, which shall caricature the outline of a stone tower, to hitch on sham angle pinnacles of jointed deal, are only specimens of the errors to be avoided in wooden churches; while, on the other hand, we shall be sure never to miss a true ecclesiastical character if proportion is good, and the materials are honestly and really worked.

In a church with aisles the question will arise whether, there being no clerestory, the roofs should be of one pitch or hipped at the aisles. Peover church presents one pitch, and that a sufficiently ugly one—the Norwegian churches have their roofs most unequivocally hipped. Separate gables for the aisles, with valleys between, are not to be thought of, on account of the accumulations of snow. Where the exterior is capable of so little variety, I should propose, if no practical difficulty were found from the slight and almost imperceptible valley formed by their junction, that the aisle roof and nave roof on separate planes would be more dignified; but the question is unimportant.

With the same view I would suggest that the chancel should be a distinct external feature, not only for reasons common to all churches, but because also a wooden church will never be, or never ought to be, so large as to make the construction of the chancel arch a matter of any difficulty; while, on the other hand, with respect to the much more complex arrangement of a cross church with transepts, the difficulty of arranging the roofs and the broken lines of the aisles will, I think, effectually preclude the cruciform plan.

The bell tower, if a tower, should be of the frame construction—wood is cheap in Canada, and strength is wanted—i. e. brought down in strong carpentry to the floor of the nave. The mere small square turrets, terminated by the Sussex head, would perhaps endanger the roof, by collecting the wind, at least in such a climate as Newfoundland, where on one occasion, as I am informed by the bishop of the diocese, the whole of a wooden church was blown bodily several inches from its brick foundation without the frame-work being dislocated.—Variety might, however, be attained by bell-gables, either at the west or east end of the nave. The bell, or rather bells, would be rung in the interior of the church. The gable crosses would be metal.

The exterior of the church is now concluded. Wooden walls of split pine trees arranged vertically: these walls would be pierced with windows as high up to the eaves as could be managed. The windows would necessarily be narrow and of a lancet form, within a square hood, and if a continuous row of these were needed, arranged like an arcade, the wall would be thus sufficiently broken. The southern porch (one door is quite sufficient in a cold Canadian forest) would project boldly—the eaves would overhang the walls at least two feet. The roof would be of at least a right angle. The chancel would break the ridge line, and avoid a domestic character, and a low gable or shingled spire would be at the west end. The general proportions would be those required in English churches.

As to the interior, the arrangement of nave and aisles might very successfully be attained if the piers and arches were not too ambitious either in span or height. The arches, if arches there are to be, might be somewhat depressed. And here the construction of Nether Peover would assist us. "It (I quote from Ormerod) is divided from the side aisles by four wooden arches on each side, formed by rude beams of wood sprung from wooden pillars, from which are again sprung other spars, forming an obtuse arch over the nave."

These wooden pillars would be the most massive spars which the forest could supply—sawn square and chamfered into an octagon. The Norwegian doors present wooden pillars, of which the capitals are most elaborately carved with Runic knots, and that peculiar interlaced kind of ornament of which the Celtic and Scandinavian tribes were so fond. A barbaric richness is thereby attained. And I see no reason why, if the wood is hard enough and there is sufficient skill in the settlers, the utmost amount of carving should not be expended on the interior of a wooden church. Certainly in a country like New Zealand, where hard wood is so common, and where great powers of wood carving seem natural to the people, if wooden churches are required, I can quite understand that both the hardness of the wood and the superior size of the timber would allow a much more elaborate style for wooden churches than can be thought of in Canada and New Brunswick. What I have been thinking of is a wooden church, to be built under the most untoward auspices and of the most intractable materials, the stunted pine trees of a very cold country. To these my observations mainly apply.

It is superfluous to waste your time on discussions about what are more naturally wooden in construction—benches, screens, pulpits, stall-work, &c., and the like. * * *

Profane Swearing.

We have a painful impression, says the editor of the New-York Commercial Advertiser, that this kind of blended vulgarity and immorality is upon the increase among us as a national fault. Hitherto, as a people, this has not been justly chargeable upon us as a prevailing crime. Other faults have the Americans—distinctive national features sufficiently unpleasant to note—but this coarse, absurd and wicked habit, it has been generally allowed, prevails in some countries that might be named, much more than in this. We refer, of course, to the common, grosser form of oath. Qualifications of it, and substitutes for it, bad enough in themselves, but less disgusting and demoralizing, American ingenuity has discovered, and sectional peculiarities in this as well as in other things are strongly marked. We regret to think that the offensive, direct, vulgar, wicked oath, is, however, upon the increase—that profane swearing or cursing is becoming more prevalent among American citizens, reducing those whom universal education and conscious independence should stamp as gentlemen to a moral degradation that cannot be atoned for by merely external advantages or proprieties.

We have reason to believe that we are not alone in the apprehension now expressed, and it has been matter of inquiry, how the evil has thus increased. There has been no abatement of the ordinary means of improving public morals. Christianity has ceased not to diffuse its curative and preservative principles, and education has gone hand in hand with her; together they have aided in softening the asperities of human nature, renovating the motives of human action, and laying down rules for human intercourse and social amenities, superadding the precepts of Divine revelation, and teaching reverence for the name and authority of Him whose awful name none can guiltlessly profane. Never, perhaps, was there more general outward respect shown for the sacred realities of religion, alike as a code of morals and a dispensation of privileges. And though it may perhaps be doubted whether the practical purity and benevolence of the religion of the New Testament have proportionately so much hold upon the heart as when the profession of Christianity was less general, yet undeniably the observance of its forms and ordinances exercises a wide and powerful control throughout the land.

Whence, then, it must still be asked, comes the increase of the evil now spoken of? Partly, we suspect, from the vast European emigration, and more particularly that from England and Ireland. No American can visit England or Ireland without observing that among the lowest of the operatives and peasantry, disgusting oaths are habitual and common. We speak now of those classes who herd together in the worst parts of Manchester, Liverpool, London, and other cities, and the equally uneducated workmen of the rural and mining districts. These are far from representing the English character in the main, or the character of the English operative of the average intelligence and morality; but they form, numerically, an important part of the emigration which floods our shores and remains in our large cities. The same may be said of the Irish emigration. Any one who doubts this, may receive sad confirmation of the correctness of the representation by visiting the localities where this class dwell. The frequency of horrible and disgusting oaths will be found startling and distressing. "Ill weeds grow apace;" evil habits are easily propagated; and this will in some degree account for the increased prevalence among us of common swearing.

But this would limit the abomination to a certain class, and is of itself scarcely sufficient to account for its general increase. In a spirit of kindness to the parties, and under the sanction of a justifiable concern for the interests of national morals and the elevation of the American character, we shall refer to another source whence this evil derives support. The increase of profane swearing is one of the evils almost inseparable from the war spirit which, for two years, has been so prevalent among us. This could be proved. Experience would not refuse her testimony in support of this position. Any observant man knows that this is so. It was to be expected. War, even in a good cause, will more or less excite ferocity, and profane swearing is but one of its symptoms. Slaying and cursing are kindred acts, springing from the same motive or disposition. We know not when, so little provocation or occasion existing, we have heard so many oaths in so short a time, as on the steamboat which brought up from Fort Hamilton the officers and men of the New-York regiment of volunteers; and this was all the more saddening, because it was the habit of some who in every other respect were gentlemen.

We have given utterance to these sentiments prefatory to the following letter from the State Superintendent of Common Schools, which we find in the Courier and Enquirer. It does credit to the honorable writer, and proves also, by implication, (for Mr. Keator's letter is not given) what we have said about the increase of the evil, as it would seem that the superintendent at Kingston, in this State, had found it necessary to appeal to his superior for the justification of his refusal to grant certificates to teachers addicted to habitual profanity. Mr. Morgan's reply is as follows:—

"SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE,
"Albany, July 21, 1848."

"SIR:—You desire to know whether habitual profanity should be regarded a disqualification in persons presenting themselves as candidates for school teachers. Among the qualifications required for a school teacher, a good moral character is not the least important. He may be a proficient scholar, and may possess undoubted ability to impart instruction with success, but if his instruction is immoral in its tendency, it is worse than ignorance. Profanity is not less a violation of morality than falsehood, drunkenness, or theft. It begets a recklessness of thought and action—a moral vacuum where every vice may find a sure receptacle; and in tender youth, a person entrusted with their character, their prospects, and their usefulness, it should not and cannot be allowed. Your refusal to grant certificates to teachers who are addicted to habitual profanity, is, therefore, in strict accordance with the rules of this department, and meets my approbation. Yours, respectfully,

CHRISTOPHER MORGAN,

"Superintendent of Common Schools,

"To MR. C. D. KEATOR, Town Superintendent."

Study a Child's Capacities.

If some are naturally dull, and yet strive to do well, notice the effort, and do not censure the dullness. A teacher might as well scold a child for being near-sighted, as for being naturally dull. Some children have a great verbal memory, others are quite the reverse. Some minds develop early, others late. Some have great powers of acquiring, others of originating. Some may appear stupid, because their true spring of character has never been touched. The dunce of a school, may turn out in the end, the living, progressive, wonder-working genius of the age. In order to exert the best spiritual influence we must understand the spirit upon which we wish to exert that influence. For with the human mind, we must work with nature, and not against it. Like the leaf of the nettle, if touched one way, it stings like a wasp; if the other, it is softer than satin. If we would do justice to the human mind, we must find its peculiar characteristics, and adapt ourselves to individual wants. In conversation on this point with a friend who is now the principal in one of our best grammar schools, and to whose instruction I look back with delight—"your remarks," said he, "are quite true; let me tell you a little incident, which bears upon this point. Last summer, I had a girl who was exceedingly behind in all her studies. She was at the foot of her division and seemed to care but little about her books. It so happened that as a relaxation, I let them at times during school hours unite in singing. I noticed that this girl had a remarkably clear, sweet voice; and I said to her, 'Jane, you have a good voice, and you may lead in the singing.' She brightened up and from that time her mind seemed to be more active. Her lessons were attended to, and she soon gained a high rank. One day as I was going home, I overtook her with a school companion. 'Well, Jane,' said I 'you are getting along very well, how happens it, you do much better now than at the beginning of the quarter?' 'I do not know why it is,' she replied. 'I know what she told me the other day,' said her companion.

'And what was that?' I asked.

* Our forests, in the United States, furnish every variety of wood in abundance—ED. BAN.

'Why, she said, she was encouraged.'

Yes here we have it—she was encouraged. She felt she was not dull in every thing. She had learned self-respect, and thus she was encouraged.

Some twelve or thirteen years ago, there was in Franklin school an exceedingly dull boy. One day the teacher wishing to look out a word, took up the lad's dictionary, and opening it found the blank leaves covered with drawings. He called the boy to him.

'Did you draw these?' said the teacher.

'Yes sir,' said the boy with a downcast look. 'I do not think it is well for boys to draw in their books,' said the teacher, 'and I would rub these out if I were you; but they are well done. Did you ever take lessons?'

'No sir,' said the boy his eyes sparkling.

'Well, I think you have a talent for this thing; I should like you to draw me something when you are at leisure, at home, and bring it to me. In the meantime see how well you can recite your lessons.'

The boy felt he was understood. He began to love his teacher. He became animated and fond of his books. He took delight in gratifying his teacher by his faithfulness to his studies; while the teacher took every opportunity to encourage him in his natural desires. The boy became one of the first scholars, and gained the medal before he left school. After this he became an engraver, laid up money enough to go to Europe, studied the works of old masters, sent home productions from his own pencil, which found a place in some of the best collections of paintings, and is now one of the most promising artists of his years in the country. After the boy gained the medal, he sent the teacher a beautiful picture as a token of respect; and I doubt not this day, he feels that that teacher, by the judicious encouragement he gave to the natural turn of his mind, has had a great moral and spiritual effect on his character.

THE LOVE OF GOD EVIDENCED IN GIVING HIS SON.—In hearing that this which we take and eat is Christ's body broken for our sins and his blood shed for our iniquities, we are occasioned to call to mind the infinite greatness of God's mercy and truth, and of Christ's love towards us. For what a mercy is this—that God would, for man being lost through his wilful sins, be content, yea, desirous to give his own only Son, "the image of his substance, the brightness of his glory," "being in his own bosom," to be made man for us, that we men by him might be, as it were made gods! What a mercy is this—that God the Father so should tender us, that he would make this his Son, being co-equal with him in divinity, a mortal man for us, that we might be made immortal by him! What a kindness is this—that the Almighty Lord should send to us his enemies his dear darling to be made poor, that we by him might be made rich! What bowels of compassion is this—that the omnipotent Creator of heaven and earth would deliver his own only beloved Son for his creatures, to be not only "flesh of our flesh and bone of our bones," that we might by him through the Holy Ghost be made one with him, and so with the Father, by communicating the merits of his flesh, that is, righteousness, holiness, innocency, and immortality, but also to be a slain sacrifice for our sins, to satisfy his justice, to convert and turn death into life, to make sin unto us grace, hell to us heaven, misery felicity! What a mercy is this—that God will raise up this his Son Christ, not only to justify and regenerate us, but also in his person to demonstrate unto us our state which we have; for in his coming we shall be like unto him! O wonderful mercy of God, which would assume this his Christ, even in human body, into the heavens, to take and keep there possession for us, to lead our captivity captive, to appear before him always praying for us to make the throne of justice a throne of mercy, the seat of glory a seat of grace; so that with boldness we may come and appear before God, to ask and find grace in time convenient! Again, what a verity and constant truth in God is this that he would, according to his promise made first unto Adam, and so to Abraham and others, in his time accomplish it by sending his Son so graciously! Who would doubt hereafter of anything that he hath promised? And as for Christ's love, O whose heart can be able to think of it anything as it deserveth? He being God would become man: he being rich would become poor: he being Lord of the world became a servant to us all: he being immortal would become mortal, miserable, and taste of all God's curses, yea, even of hell itself for us! His blood was nothing too dear, his life he nothing considered, to bring us from death to life. But this his love needeth more hearty weighing than many words speaking; and, therefore I omit and leave it to your consideration. So that, in the receipt of this supper, as I would you would tremble at God's wrath for sin, so would I have you to couple to that terror and fear, true faith, by which ye might be assuredly persuaded of God's mercy towards you, and Christ's love, through all things else preached the contrary.—Bradford's Sermon on the Lord's Supper.

A rough countryman asked Dr. Belknap, one day, if he really believed there was such a man as Job. The Doctor took the Bible, and made him read.

"There was a man in the land of Uz, whose name was Job."

"You see the Bible says so."

"So it does," drawled out the man; "and I don't know any thing to the contrary."

"Neither do I," said Dr. Belknap, and thus ended the inquiry.

In a mixed company, hearing a person speak in a very free manner against the Christian religion, he asked,

"Have you found one that is better?" And, the reply being in the negative, he added,

"When you do, let me know, and I will join you in adopting it."—Life of Dr. Belknap.

TRIFLING WITH SERIOUS SUBJECTS.—Nothing hardens the heart more effectually than literary trifling with religious subjects. Where all is theory or scholarship, the conscience is untouched.—M. L. M.

AGENTS OF THE BANNER, who may have made collections, are respectfully requested to remit the amount to us by mail. Notes of any specie-paying Banks will be received.

SUBSCRIBERS, who have received bills, will especially oblige us by remitting to us the amounts respectively due. We solicit early attention to them.

The terms of the Paper are Two Dollars and Fifty Cents a year, payable in advance; or Three Dollars if not paid before the end of the year. The advance price will be charged when we are obliged to collect the bills through a travelling agent.

Any person remitting Ten Dollars, will be entitled to receive five copies for one year.

Communications for the Editor may be addressed to the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, and for the publisher to James S. Newbold, both, No. 16 south Seventh street, Philadelphia.

Office of the Banner of the Cross.

The office of this paper has been removed from No. 89 South Fifth street, to the Book store of Mr. R. S. H. George, No. 16 South Seventh street, between Market and Chesnut streets.

Mr. George will act as Agent for the receipt of subscriptions, etc.

WOODEN CHURCHES.—We are indebted to a friend and correspondent of its accomplished author, for the valuable article on Wooden churches, which our readers will find in our present number, and which, we trust, will be attentively considered, by those especially, who may have to do with the erection or alteration of rural churches. Mr. Scott's paper is doubly important to us, because it establishes the legitimacy of wood as a material for churches, and reclaims wooden churches from the utter contempt to which some would consign them: and because it indicates at the same time, with just discrimination, how far we can go with propriety in applying wood to the Pointed style of architecture.

We need hardly say, that where stone can be had, together with the means of using it to advantage, wood ought not even to be thought of as a material for church building. But in a large portion of our country, stone cannot be had at all; and even where stone abounds, the poverty of the parishioners compels them to build of wood. Taking into account the length and breadth of the land, it is probable that, for a generation to come, two thirds of all our churches will be constructed of wood. We have therefore thought that we could not better fill a portion of our columns than with the able paper of Mr. Scott, which we again commend to the thoughtful attention of all, who would see the taste (as well as the other faculties of man) sanctified and consecrated to His service, for whose glory all things are and were created.

The following appeal is from one well acquainted with the Institution for which he pleads. Our readers will perhaps remember the interesting account of a visit to Nashotah published some time since in the Banner, written by "W. L. K." Those who recognize the name of which these are the initials, will be well inclined to put confidence in the statements made. We have already so fully expressed our own sense of the great importance of Nashotah, and the rich blessing which must result from its successful operation, that we need say no more. The Church is well informed on this point; we trust her members will act according to this knowledge, and not refuse their aid in such a case.

Contributions may either be forwarded directly to Mr. Breck, or to the Editor of the Banner, who will acknowledge their receipt and send them to their destination.

NASHOTAH.—Are the friends of Nashotah aware that the institution is at the present time in great want of their aid? Owing to unforeseen occurrences the funds of the past year have been deficient for its support, and they are now left in debt about 300 dollars,—no trifling sum to them. The Church already knows of the self-denial of its members, and we assure our readers it could not be carried to a much greater extent than it has been. Will not the friends of Nashotah at once come forward and pay the trifling sum now due? It will relieve Mr. Breck from a great embarrassment, and can be easily done by a very few individuals.

Mr. Breck is now each month refusing applications for admission, because he has no place in which to lodge the students, and no funds to support them. If he had proper buildings to accommodate them, he could now have fifty Divinity Students. The sum of one thousand dollars at the present time would enable him to accomplish this, and what an incalculable benefit would it be to the Church at the north-west! Are there not ten individuals who will contribute this? They will receive even in this world a hundred fold reward.

DIOCESE OF INDIANA.—For the information and convenience of those who may wish to hold correspondence with regard to ecclesiastical matters connected with the Diocese of Indiana, I deem it proper to state that, in accordance with a resolution of the late Diocesan Convention, and his own often repeated expression of readiness to serve this portion of the Church until it shall have a Diocesan exclusively its own, BISHOP KEMPER is expected to continue his provisional jurisdiction, and discharge all the duties appropriate to his office.

Under existing circumstances, and for the information of such as may desire to settle in this Diocese, it is proper also to state that, although unhappily again disappointed in our expectation of having the Episcopate filled, the congregations will, as heretofore, continue to be visited with as much regularity as those of any other Diocese; and that the Bishop attends to correspondence and other duties with all the promptitude his remote residence will admit.

Bishop Kemper expects to commence his annual visitation of the Church in Indiana about the 23d of September. Letters in relation to this Diocese, which can reach Delafield, Wisconsin, by that date, should be directed to that place. Such as could arrive within two or three weeks after that time might be directed to Lafayette, Indiana, through which the Bishop expects to pass in his tour.

The Editors of other Church papers are requested to give this notice an insertion.

CONVENTION OF WESTERN NEW YORK.—The following account of this Convention is from the Gospel Messenger. We rejoice, with thankfulness, to learn that the revered Editor of the Gospel Messenger is recovering from the dangerous illness with which he has been visited. As it would be a day of bitter grief to many had the issue been otherwise, so many hearts will be filled with gratitude to Him whose mercy has spared His Church so dear and valuable a life.

DIOCESAN CONVENTION.—The Editor, having been prevented, by continued illness, from attending the meetings of the Diocesan Convention, is indebted to a Rev. Brother, for the following account of the proceedings.

On the evening previous to the opening of the Convention, Divine service was celebrated in Trinity Church, Geneva, and a very excellent discourse was preached by the Rev. Wm. H. Hill of Brownville, Jefferson county. The Rev. Messrs. Clark, of Palmyra, and Walker of Ithaca took part in the services, which were attended also by several of the Clergy. The great body of the members of the Convention did not arrive in the village until the following morning.

At 10 o'clock, A. M., Wednesday 16th, a numerous body of the Clergy being assembled with the Bishop, proceeded into the Church. The Rev. Mr. Stryker, Missionary at East Bloomfield, commenced the service and read the Lessons; the prayers and Litany being said by the Rev. Mr. Norton, of Cape Vincent. The Ante-communion office was said by the Bishop, the Rev. Mr. Corson, of Bath, reading the Epistle, and the Rev. Mr. Watson, of Owego, the Gospel. The convention sermon was then preached by the Rev. Mr. Leeds, Rector of Grace Church, Utica. He took for his subject the profound words of St. John. "The life was the light of men," and proceeded in a very striking manner to enforce the truth that the word and Holy Spirit of God is the source of all true illumination, moral and intellectual. We trust that the Rev. Preacher may be enabled to comply with the request of several of his brethren, by the publication of his discourse. After sermon the Bishop proceeded with the Holy Communion Service, the alms of the congregation being collected by three of the Deacons present, and the Rev. Messrs. Watson, Bakewell, Carson, and Hobart assisting in the distribution of the Sacred Elements. The services were concluded before one o'clock, and the Convention was immediately organized, the Bishop taking the chair, and the Rev. Dr. Proal being elected Secretary, who appointed the Rev. D. C. Millett as his assistant. The roll of the Clergy was called and 51 answered to their names. The certificates of the election of Lay delegates were then referred to a committee and the Convention took a recess until half past 3 o'clock P. M.

At the opening of the afternoon session it was reported that delegates from 50 parishes were in attendance. The Bishop's address occupied the remainder of the afternoon. It contained the usual statement of the labors of our indefatigable Diocesan, and when printed will be found to indicate the increasing prosperity of the Diocese. Toward the conclusion of the address, the Bishop treated at some length two important topics; the formation of the Evangelical Knowledge Society, and the claims of Diocesan Missions. On both these subjects he spoke with even more than his usual force and earnestness. We shall not attempt any abstract of what he said, for the address itself will soon be in the hands of our readers. But as before that time, various representations will be spread abroad respecting both the manner and matter of the address, it is proper for us to say, that the Bishop with admirable dignity and ability, maintained his position, as appointed by God to watch over and protect the Diocese committed to his care. The simple desire to discharge his duty, and the firm determination to do it faithfully, blended with kindness and courtesy towards every individual within his jurisdiction, spoke in every word, look and gesture. The lovers of the truth as well as the personal friends of the Bishop of the Diocese everywhere, may rest assured that he has on no occasion established stronger claims to their affection, respect and confidence.

Immediately after the address the Convention adjourned until the next day. The evening was occupied by the usual services in the church. The evening service was performed by the Rev. Mr. Macurdy of Waterloo, and Rev. Dr. Bolles of Batavia, and a sermon on Christian Education was preached by the Rev. Mr. Wilson, of Sherburne, joining together the injunction of Solomon, "Train up a child in the way that he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it," and the words of the Psalmist, "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put any confidence in man." The Rev. Preacher maintained that if our children do not always walk in the right ways, it is because we do not train them up from earliest childhood, in the way that they are clearly bound by the Word of God to follow, i. e. the way of the church, and that too many churchmen do not put confidence in God, either to appoint the way their children should walk in, or to keep them in it when instructed in the privileges and duties of their Baptism.

At nine o'clock Thursday morning, the Convention assembled for Divine service, which was celebrated by the Rev. Mr. Cox of Casenovia, and the Rev. Mr. Tyler of Fredonia, the Bishop being in the Chancel. The minutes of the previous day's session were then read, and the committee appointed at the last convention to consider what measures might be taken to sustain Geneva College, made their report.—With the debate growing out of this matter, most of this day's session was occupied; indeed, with the exception of the sections of standing committee and deputies to the General Convention, the affairs of Geneva College constituted the sole business transacted by the convention. We rejoice at this, both as indicating that the Diocese is in a prosperous condition and needs little legislation, and, as an evidence that we are all becoming duly sensible of the immense importance of Geneva College. The action of the convention on this day we trust, under God, has decided the hitherto apparently doubtful fortunes of the College. Various suggestions of the committee respecting the interest of the Diocese in this institution were adopted by the convention in the form of resolutions, and a subscription towards filling up the endowment of the Hobart Professorship, was made, which amounted to near $1350. When a similar sum shall be obtained, the subscription of $15,000 requisite to secure the grant of $15,000 more from the Society for the Promotion of Religion and Reading in New York, will be completed, and the College will at once receive an addition to its funds of $30,000. We cannot doubt the few hundred of dollars now required will be speedily obtained.

The debate on this subject was interrupted by the hour for the election of Standing Committee and Deputies to the General Convention. This was accomplished very quietly and speedily. There was no opposite ticket, and but some half a dozen scattering votes.

The following persons were elected.

STANDING COMMITTEE.

Rev. J. C. Rudd, D. D.	Mr. James Rees,
" Benj. Hale, D. D.	" W. C. Pierrepont,

" John Henry Hobart.	" David Hudson.

DEPUTIES TO THE GENERAL CONVENTION.

Clerical.	Lay.
Rev. P. A. Proal, D. D.	Mr. W. C. Pierrepont,
" H. Gregory, D. D.	" Horatio Seymour,
" Edward Ingersoll,	" Geo. B. Webster,
" J. V. Van Ingen, D. D.	" C. H. Carroll.

The only business that remained after the elections related to the minor arrangements connected with the closing of the Session. The Bishop made a brief and solemn address, prompted manifestly by a devout thankfulness for the peaceful and successful termination of the Convention. The Gloria in Excelsis was sung, and the Convention adjourned sine die.

Thus was brought to a close another of those periods, which, our Church and day, are sometimes marked by the painful and protracted strifes of party, but which in the Diocese of Western New-York have, for the most part, ended both happily and speedily. The last Diocesan Convention adjourned, as it did, on the morning of the second day, and we are but filled upon now as then to thank God, for bestowing upon us the blessings of peace.

The following is the summary of the Bishop's labors during the past year:

During the year since the assembling of the last Annual Convention, the Bishop has preached 152 sermons; baptized 70 persons; administered the communion service 26 times; ordained 11 Presbyters and 8 Deacons; transferred 9 Clergymen from other Dioceses; received 11 into the Diocese of Western New-York; has instituted 4 Rectors, and consecrated 4 new churches, has visited 122 Parishes, and confirmed 607 persons, and has travelled 5,300 miles in the discharge of his duties.—There are now in the Diocese 111 Clergymen, and 12 candidates for Orders. The contributions for various church purposes during the year, amount to $6,728.

CAUTION.—A letter written by Rt. Rev. C. S. Hawks, Bishop of Missouri, authorizing an application for aid, in finishing St. Mary's church in his diocese, was lost on Sunday, 10th inst. in New York. The finder will confer a favour, by giving it with Messrs. Stanford & Swords, No. 139 Broadway. The public are hereby cautioned against any fraudulent attempt to make use of said letter.

We take the liberty of inserting the following letter from the faithful and indefatigable Missionary by whose zeal "a Monument is rising we trust whose top may reach unto heaven." The following shows by a moving illustration, how blessed is "the memory of the just."

DEAR BROTHER:—

I beg that you will add to the acknowledgements of the Ladies Missionary Association, of Christ Church, (omitted in last week's paper,) the following item. "From Miss Ann Simmons, through Mrs. Broom, $40 00."

This, my dear sir, is one of the most interesting and encouraging donations which we have received for the building of Calvary Church. It shows that God indeed is with us when He inclines the hearts of His people to remember us in their last hours; this deceased servant of the Lord has long been known to all the worshippers of Christ Church. At every service, on every occasion of public worship, she was at her place, beside the chancel rails, on the bench provided by the Church for the inmates of that noble charity, Christ Church Hospital. As long as she was able to walk, she found her greatest pleasure in waiting on the Lord in His sacred courts.

From a small income, she managed to save the sum of forty dollars, which, she said some months ago, should be given to "Bishop White Chapel."

The day before her death, her excellent friend, the Matron of the Hospital, reminded her of the circumstance and inquired if her intentions remained unaltered. "Oh yes," she replied, "all I leave must be given to the little Church up town—the Monument to Bishop White."

May God of His goodness incline the hearts of many more, to aid our efforts, by bestowing upon us a portion of that wealth with which He has entrusted them for distribution. Thus can they witness their love to Jesus: and can promote the eternal interests of those poor and ignorant whom Jesus came to rescue from destruction.

Yours, truly,

Geo J. H. SMITH, JR.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—"Western's" communication did not come into the Editor's hands until too late for this week's Banner. The first shall appear in our next.

"The Conundrum" is very good and very pointed, but some of our Readers might deem it too sharp, while others would think it too blunt. With the author's permission, we will circulate it privately.

The following is the notice of a pleasant Memorial well bestowed.

A VALUABLE AND APPROPRIATE PRESENT.—The Ladies of St. Paul's Church have just purchased an elegant gold watch, with the design of presenting it to Rev. Dr. Gregory, late rector of the church. It was imported by Messrs. Willard and Hawley of this city, and heavily cased according to order with gold, eighteen carats fine. On the dial is an accurate view of Trinity Church, New York, and on the outside case, a correct and beautiful engraving of St Paul's Church, of this city. On the inner case is the following inscription.

"Presented to Henry Gregory, D. D., Rector, by the Ladies of St. Paul's Church."

The watch is one of the finest specimens of workmanship ever brought to this city, being full jeweled, and finished in every particular.

Its usefulness, beauty, and appropriate embellishments make it a most suitable gift as a token of high regard. We commend the good taste of the ladies in selecting an article so truly indicative of their kindness to their pastor: & hope he may long employ the hours, measured by its beautiful dial, in the good work to which he has been called, and with the same acceptance which has heretofore characterized his efforts.—Journal.

We take the following from the Calendar.

CHURCH DECORATION.—We find in the Illustrated London News of July 29th, the report of a speech delivered before the Archaeological Society of Lincoln, by the Bishop of Norwich, Dr. Stanley, who is well known as one of the leaders of the Evangelical party. "Archæology," says that Bishop, "teaches us to admire the greatness of those who designed such noble structures as the adjoining Cathedral, (that of Lincoln,) an edifice which modern architects cannot equal: and thus the science leads us to renovate the skill of our pious ancestors. Some jealous persons have said that Archæologists wish to bring back to our age, the barbarisms of the middle ages. I say we repudiate so false an accusation. What we do desire is to be able to equal our ancestors in erecting temples to Him to whom we cannot do too much homage. For my part, I am so much a Tractarian, that I would bring in the aid of sculpture and paintings in adorning our Churches." This is truth from an unexpected quarter.

Church Education.

The following from The Presbyterian Treasury, a leading paper of that denomination, are termed by the Freeman's Journal, "goodly jewels in a swine's snout." Such sound sentiments deserve a less offensive commendation: and the source from which they come, whatever it may be, is entitled to respect and praise. The writer is alluding to the system of Parochial Schools established by the Assembly.

"An objection against the General Assembly's plan of education is, that it is SECTARIAN in its character.

1. But it must be remembered that religious truth in any form, sustains the relation of sectarianism to some minds. Even if evangelical Christians should consent to surrender their peculiarities for the sake of general statements in which all should unite, these would still constitute sectarianism in the eyes of Papists, Socinians, infidels, &c. Where would such surrender end? Just where it has ended—in banishing every kind of religious truth from the public schools, even in New England.

2. Teaching religion in schools is no more sectarian, than teaching religion in the pulpit. If it be allowable to preach the distinctive truths of the gospel on the Sabbath, why should the cry of sectarianism prevent our teaching them the rest of the week—in the school room, as well as in the lecture room, and at the prayer meeting?

3. We are under obligations to teach the whole truth of God. If our Church believes in the doctrines of grace, she is under obligations to teach the doctrines of grace. Paul considered himself free from the blood of souls, because he had not "shunned to declare the whole counsel of God." A worldly policy that hesitates to hold forth the doctrines of revelation, is not consistent with honest orthodoxy, or evangelical practice. It is not optional what we shall teach in religion. We must teach what we believe.

4. True substantial religion is not sectarian in its spirit.

5. Sectarianism is better than nothingarianism. We must take our choice. Even admitting that the former is an evil, it is the least of two evils.

"Union" churches are, of all others, the nurseries of bigotry.

8. The plan of education, which proposes to exclude religion from the schools, and to teach it through parents and pastors, is also a sectarian plan, just so far as it secures religious instruction at all. The only difference is, that the Assembly's plan results in more thorough religious instruction, without any more sectarianism—unless indeed the objector maintains that the more religion that a man has, the more is he a sectarian.

On the whole, we are persuaded that our Church schools ought to teach the whole truth of God, as the Church understands it; and that we ought not to be driven from our ancient landmarks by stratagems of anti-sectarianism, which is quite as often downright bigotry, as it is false liberality, or indifference to the truth.—Calendar.

Died, at her country residence in Burlington, N. J., August 17th, in the 87th year of her age, MRS. ELIZABETH J. SHIPPEN, widow of Dr. Edmund Shippen.

We make this record with a sad heart. It tells of the loss of a Parishioner, most venerable and beloved, by whose death a relation is severed dearer and more intimate than usual friendship. Even where such cause of deeper sorrow is wanting, we cannot but mourn over the loss of those who are the memorials of the earlier days of our country. How few are now the links of that chain which connects our age with the time of Washington. This brief notice tells that the chain has lost one more golden link.

Full of years, and crowned with the honors of a virtuous and christian life, "in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable, religious, and holy hope," she has gone to her blessed rest. We might be thought partial in our love did we express our full sense of her worth. Gentle yet firm, spirited yet humble, adorned with the brightest gifts of mind and the best qualities of heart, it was her unusual lot to possess them unimpaired to the end. Though in the last few years of her life she was afflicted with the loss of sight, yet no darkness or gloom fell upon her path, for it was that which "shineth more and more unto the perfect day." A merciful Providence gave to her a lot in life suited to her calm and quiet temper. Her Faith ensured that serenity which was undisturbed by trying sickness or approaching death, and which has now become a bright and eternal calm. They who learned from her life how to live, were taught by her death, a more important lesson, how tranquilly and happily a christian may die. In the death of one so aged, so weary of earth, and so ripe for heaven, the voice of sorrow is hushed by that louder "voice from heaven saying unto us, Write, from henceforth blessed are the dead who die in the Lord: even so saith the Spirit; for they rest from their labors."

MR. EDITOR:—

I have so agreeable an impression of a Sunday which I recently passed in this interesting parish, that I feel an irresistible impulse to consign it to a more public record than the tablets of my own memory, and therefore would respectfully bespeak a place for it upon the pages of your journal. An inhabitant of the Western border of Tennessee, where whatever other sources of interest may exist, there is for the most part nothing striking and impressive in the way of natural scenery, you may judge that it was with something more than a negative sense of pleasure, that, as I journeyed toward Knoxville, for the purpose of attending the late convention of this Diocese, I had an opportunity afforded me of spending a little time in a portion of the State, which is not more noted for the fertility of its soil, than it is for the beauty of its landscape. I refer to the county of Maury, especially that portion of it through which the traveller passes on his approach to the village of Columbia, a name familiar to your readers as designating the residence of our honored Diocesan, and the site of the well known Female Institute under the direction of the Rev. J. G. Smith. There may be parts of our country which are more elaborately cultivated than this favored region; but few if any where the elements of beauty are more predominant. The massive character of the forest trees, the emerald verdure of

More of Lamb's Delightful Letters.

The remaining Literary Sketches and Letters of Chas. Lamb, being his final memorials, by Thos. Noon Talford, one of his executors, and never before published, are now ready, in one elegantly printed volume, 12mo., with a very fine portrait on steel. Price $1.

As one has said who knew Lamb well, "His letters are full of that odd, quaint, peculiar humor—that wit and wisdom, interwoven, which so strongly characterized the man, of that philosophy in a jest, which the dull and the formal could never comprehend for 'a jest's propriety lies in the ear of him that hears it.'"

And as Robert Hall has said, "Charles Lamb is an old and valued friend to all true lovers of the beautiful, the quaint, and the quiet of literature. Let those who have not read him, do so at once, but not hurry through the pages, expecting to find excitement and incident in every paragraph. They must read as one angles—placidly, lazily and patiently, and they will not be disappointed. Charles Lamb has justly been considered by some as the model essayist; his pleasant and true gentleness has rendered his productions universal favorites. His delicious 'Essays' are full of wisdom, pregnant with genuine wit, abound in true pathos, and have a rich vein of humor running through them all."

This volume contains the letters which were promised to the world by Talford when he published a former collection some twelve years ago, and are addressed to Wordsworth, Coleridge, Manning, Moxon, Rogers, Hazlitt and others, with some further reminiscences of Lamb's life. It is a delightful volume for perusal, and should be possessed by all who have the former collection. Just published by G. S. APPLETON, 143 Chestnut st. Sept. 2.

Episcopal Female Institute.

This Institution is to be opened for the reception of pupils, as day scholars, Sept. 1, in Oak street, West Penn Square, three doors north of Market street. It will be under the management of a Board of Trustees (the Bishop being Chairman), and is designed to offer to parents the opportunity of a thorough education for their daughters, under the religious training and influence of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The terms will be moderate. Parents intending to place their daughters under its fostering care are referred for further information to the Bishop, or to the Rev. J. A. Vaughan, D.D., Rector of the Institute, Oak street, or to either of the following gentlemen, Trustees, viz: Jas. C. Booth, Joseph Cabot, Samuel V. Merrick, Caspar Morris, M. D., William Welsh.

It is important that, prior to Aug. 1, notice should be given to the Rector of those pupils who expect to enter at the opening of the Institute.

TERMS, including French, Latin, Drawing, Stationery, &c., viz: For pupils from 9 to 13 years of age, $25 per session. Over 13 years, $40. Primary Department, $12.

Shelby College, Shelbyville, Ky.

This Institution, which has just closed a prosperous session, is located on the McAdams road between Louisville and Frankfort, in one of the most desirable and healthful regions of the West. It is under the control and patronage of the Diocese of Kentucky. Arrangements have recently been made for the completion of extensive additions to the present College buildings, for the accommodation of students, and for the erection of an Astronomical Observatory. Every facility will be furnished for the thorough instruction of youth in this Institution, and due diligence will be required of every class of its pupils in the prosecution of their respective studies. Those who have the control of Shelby College are resolved that it shall contribute its full share in forming and perpetuating an elevated standard of collegiate discipline and scholarship. The President will receive the sons of members of the Church in his family, and give special attention to their religious and moral, as well as to their literary education.

Strict attention will be given to the training of the pupils of this Institution in the various branches of English education, as well as to classical and scientific instruction. Candidates for the ministry and sons of clergymen will receive the benefits of the College gratuitously.

FACULTY.

REV. WM. J. WALLER, M. D., President, and Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy, and Natural Science.

W. W. THEOBALD, A. M., Professor of Ancient and Modern Languages.

JOSEPH WINLOCK, A. M., Professor of Mathematics and Mechanical Philosophy.

PRINCIPAL OF THE PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT.

An able and efficient officer will be engaged for this department before the beginning of the next session. The ensuing session will commence on the first Wednesday of September next.

There is already belonging to the College one of the most extensive and most judiciously selected Theological Libraries west of the mountains, which will be gradually enlarged. And as it is the design of the Faculty and Trustees, that the exact and natural sciences shall be thoroughly studied by its pupils, the Institution has been furnished with an elegant Chemical and Philosophical Apparatus, as well as an extensive assortment of the best text books in these departments.

ANNUAL CHARGES.

For instruction in the Classics and the Sciences,
per session of 10 months,	$40 00
Modern Languages—French, German, Italian or Spanish, each	20 00
English Studies, in the Preparatory Department,	25 to 30
Board, Fuel, Washing, &c., for a session of 10 months,	110 00
Fuel, and Servant's hire for Public Rooms,	3 50
Music and Drawing, if desired,	15 00

The expenditures of all the boys who may become members of the President's family, will be exclusively controlled by him. This rule is absolutely necessary, and will be insisted on in every case. Its firm, but mild enforcement, is found to operate, so as to effectually prevent the vexatious consequences which never fail to attend youthful extravagance and folly.

Those who may desire further information, may obtain it by addressing the subscriber, Shelbyville, Ky.

Academy of the Protestant Episcopal Church,

341 Market Street.

The Autumnal Session will begin on Friday, September 1.

An addition having been made to the number of the Teachers, the schools, of which the Academy consists, (from one to another of which the pupils pass every fifty minutes,) will be increased after the present vacation to six. The whole, as heretofore, will be superintended daily by the Principal, and from time to time by the Bishop of the Diocese and a monthly Committee appointed for the purpose by the Board of Trustees. Circulars may be had at the Bookstore of Messrs. E. C. & J. Bidle, S. W. corner of 5th and Minor sts., and after the present month, of the Janitor at the Academy.

Extracts from Bishop Potter's Annual Addresses to the Convention of the Diocese.

To the Convention of 1846.—"It gives me great pleasure to inform the Convention that some important measures have been adopted during the last year, towards securing to our youth the advantages of superior classical instruction, in connection with proper religious training. The classical department of the Protestant Episcopal Academy, which was established in this city more than fifty years since, through the agency of Bishop White and others, has been re-opened under the auspices of the Rev. Dr. Hare, and will afford to parents in this vicinity the means of educating boys in the most approved manner. Its funds have enabled the Trustees to make liberal provision for the sons of Clergymen, and others, on whom the charges of instruction would fall heavily, and it is hoped that the Academy will prove rich in blessing to many families."

To the Convention of 1847.—"I had occasion in my last address to call the attention of the Diocese to the provisions, which had just been made, to secure to the sons of churchmen a superior classical training, in connection with proper religious culture. The River Saco.

BY THE REV. JAMES GILBORNE LYONS, LL. D.

The Saco has its springs in New Hampshire, near the celebrated "NOTCH" of the White or Agiocochook Mountains, and reaches the Atlantic after a winding course through the State of Maine. It receives the waters of many lakes and streams, passes over numerous falls, and is throughout remarkable for its clearness and beauty.

From Agiocochook's granite steeps
Fair Saco rolls in chainless pride,
Rejoicing as it laughs and leaps,
Down the gray mountain's rugged side :—
The stern rent crags and tall dark pines
Watch that young pilgrim flashing by,
While close above them frowns or shines
The black torn cloud, or deep blue sky.

Soon gathering strength it swiftly takes
Through Bartlett's vales its tuneful way,
Or hides in Conway's fragrant brakes,
Retreating from the glare of day ;—
Now, full of vigorous life, it springs
From the strong mountain's circling arms,
And roams, in wide and lucid rings,
Among green Fryburg's woods and farms.

Here, with low voice, it comes and calls
For tribute from some hermit lake,
And here it wildly foams and falls,
Bidding the forest echoes wake :—
Now sweeping on it runs its race
By mound and mill in playful glee ;—
Now welcomes, with its pure embrace,
The vestal waves of Ossipee.

At last, with loud and solemn roar,
Spurning each rocky ledge and bar,
It sinks where, on the sounding shore,
The broad Atlantic heaves afar :—
There, on old ocean's faithful breast,
Its wealth of waves it proudly flings,
And there its weary waters rest,
Clear as they left their crystal springs.

Sweet stream ! it were a fate divine,
Till this world's toils and tasks were done,
To go, like those bright floods of thine,
Refreshing all, enslav'd by none.—
To pass through scenes of calm and strife,
Singing, like thee, with holy mirth,
And close in peace a varied life,
Unsullied by one stain of Earth.

Selections.

The Devoted Man of Science.*

DR. JAMES HOPE.

"The device of the excellent author of 'Theron and Aspasia' was ingenious and instructive. At the end of a long and almost tiresome avenue in his garden a beautiful arbour promised the wished-for rest ; but on reaching the attractive spot a plain surface was only found, all was light and shade—a complete illusion, with the motto in the centre of the painting, 'Invisibilia non decipiunt.'"—THOMAS H. BURDER, M. D.

There is something—such is the remark in substance of a clever writer—peculiar in the professions of medicine and surgery. The subject of study and observation in these professions is the human body—the most complicated of all God's works, and the one most calculated, in enlarged and comprehensive minds, to inspire admiration and reverence of the all-wise Author ; and yet there is, probably, no class of men in which there are so many sceptics or even positive infidels, as among physicians and surgeons. Strange—the frequency of religious doubt amidst the brightest evidence !

Now, whether stern truth or tempting exaggeration be most apparent in this remark, from its censure he must be excluded whose name heads the present chapter. An impassioned lover of science ; indefatigable in the pursuit of truth ; highly gifted by nature ; and master of information, various, versatile, and always at command, the abiding sway of religion hallowed every acquirement, and lit up every advance in the realm of knowledge. "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do ?" was the governing question of his daily life. Nor did he fly to religion, as may be affirmed of many, when galled by the world's neglect, or when baffled in some favourite pursuit. He was a successful man. Of him it was observed, and with truth :

* From "The Closing Scene ; or, Christianity and Infidelity contrasted in the last hours of remarkable persons." By the author of the "Life-book of a Labourer." London: Longmans and Co. The idea of this volume is a happy one. We find here proof enough that the only stable support in the hour of sickness and death is simple faith in Jesus. We were personally acquainted with more than one of the individuals whose last hours are here narrated ; and, though some trifling mis-statements meet our eye, yet on the whole we think the character of each well delineated.—Ed.

"How few at the close of life can look back and say, as Dr. Hope might have done, that, so far as this world is concerned, they have accomplished all that they have planned, and attained all that they had desired !" His career, if brief, was singularly unclouded.

He took up his permanent residence in London as physician in Dec., 1828, with only one private friend, Mr. Aeneas Mackintosh, of Montagu-square, and one medical acquaintance, Dr. Henry Holland. His professional maxims, suggested by his venerable father, adopted, and steadily acted upon by himself, were simply these :

1. Never keep a patient ill longer than you can possibly help ;
2. Never accept a fee to which you do not feel yourself justly entitled ; and
3. Always pray for your patients.

His fame rose rapidly. In 1831 he was appointed physician to the Marylebone infirmary ; in 1834, assistant-physician to St. George's hospital ; and in 1839, physician to that truly noble institution. Previous to this last triumph he had given to the world his two elaborate and enduring works on "Morbidity Anatomy," and on "Diseases of the Heart."

The amount of mental toil he underwent as a medical writer may be gleaned from the following fact :

It had long been his custom to work with little intermission from seven in the morning till twelve at night ; but, when once engaged in any work of interest, he seemed not to feel fatigue, and to know not where to stop. While writing this book* he frequently sat up half through the night. When completing it he often rose at three in the morning ! On one occasion he rose at three, wrote, without cessation, till five the following morning, then went to bed ; and at nine o'clock Mrs. Hope, for he had been married a few months before, was at his bedside, writing to his dictation while he breakfasted !

The highest medical honours now appeared within his reach. His professional opinion was eagerly sought by patients from every part of the kingdom. His income rose to four thousand per annum. But mortal disease—to be subdued by no skill, and alleviated by no expedients—assailed him ; and, in March, 1841, at the age of forty, he retired deliberately to Hampstead—to die !

"But so completely had he gained the confidence of his patients, that, even after he had retired from practice, they insisted on consulting him. During the first three weeks after his retiring, he made 100/.—that is, rather more than 1,700/. per annum—in fees received from those who would not be refused. Even after his removal to Hampstead he might have been fully occupied with seeing those who, having come from the country, did not hesitate to go a few additional miles for his advice. So late as the day before his death, he declined a visit from one of his former patients."

Three prominent features in his character challenge attention and remark :

1. His habitual disinterestedness.
"In the earlier years of his residence in London it was his delight, and indeed his frequent custom, to spend the night at the house of a patient who was dangerously ill ; and, though the increase of his practice rendered this impossible at a later period, yet he occasionally thus indulged himself even till within two years of his death. These attentions were not confined to the rich. There was a gentleman of large fortune, whose dying bed he had thus soothed, and whose family avowed their deep obligations to him. Grateful as they were for that kindness to which the rich are so accustomed that they almost deem it their prerogative, they were much surprised some time after to find almost similar attentions lavished on a groom, who was seized with a dangerous complaint, requiring almost constant watching. After the most assiduous attention on the part of Dr. Hope, accompanied by the divine blessing, the groom recovered ; and the family afterwards mentioned the circumstance as illustrative of Dr. Hope's genuine benevolence, uninfluenced by considerations of wealth and station."
2. His sleepless jealousy for God's honour.

He maintained that no calling in life should be prosecuted without distinct reference to the great First Cause and Lord of all. In his conversations with medical students he frequently combated the infidelity and materialism too often embraced by them, on the false notion that such opinions indicate superior intellect. As a medical lecturer he never opened or closed a session without introducing religious allusions and motives to action, and animadverting on the irrationality of infidelity.

3. His practical and unhesitating reliance on the Most High.
"On this occasion* Dr. Hope gave a very decided proof of the strength of his religious principles. After he had been for some days engaged in the canvass, with little apparent prospect of success, a party of very influential medical governors sent to offer him their support. This communication was made at ten o'clock on Saturday night ; and, as persons naturally feel their own honour interested in the success of their candidate, these gentlemen stipulated that he should canvass most actively and under their guidance. To this Dr. Hope made no objection ; and they proceeded to point out his work for the following day, Sunday. To observe the Lord's Day was, however, a principle from which he could not swerve. He preferred risking the offered support to offending his God. He urged that, without the divine blessing, his election could not prosper, and that he could not expect that blessing while acting in opposition to the divine commands. It was in vain that his new friends argued, intreated, and even threatened to withdraw their support. Dr. Hope was inflexible ; and they finally yielded the point, thinking him no doubt an odd fellow, who could prefer religion to self-interest, and who would rather trust to the promises of God than to his own exertions." Such a man could not be deserted, in his "hour of need," by Him whom he served ; and this is his closing scene :

After removing to Hampstead, Dr. Hope never went out in his carriage but once, and that was to Highgate cemetery, where he intended to be buried. Without indulging unmeaning fancies on the subject of his interment, he gave directions for it as for any other ordinary affair. Mrs. Hope, having hinted the possibility of her attending the funeral, he seized the idea with joy, and eagerly intreated that, provided it did no violence to her feelings, she would be present.

Dr. Latham, the last time he saw him, inquired if he "felt quite happy."

"Perfectly so," was Dr. Hope's reply. "I have always been a sober-thinking man ; and I could not have imagined the joy I now feel. My only wish is to convey it to the minds of others ; but that is impossible. It is such as I could not have conceived possible."

He was particularly anxious to convey a cheerful idea of death, and his own happiness in the prospect of it, to the mind of his son, who was at that age when all impressions sink deep into the mind. He often talked to him of his great gain, and used sometimes to say :

"You see, Theodore, what a lucky fellow I am. You have your fortune to make ; but mine is ready-made for me. I am going to my heavenly inheritance. You know how hard I used to work formerly to get fees for you and mamma ; but all that is over now : my toil is at an end."

He then spoke with much warmth and gratitude of the many blessings that had been vouchsafed to him. He noticed that, though God had not thought fit to give him affluence, yet he had always had enough. He dwelt with especial interest on the large share of intellectual enjoyment that had been granted him—more he believed than to most men—and "this blessing ought to be taken into account."

On Monday, finding him much weaker, I said† :
"I think that one week will do great things for you."
"Do you think so, indeed ?" answered he very quickly, and with a radiant smile. "Very well, whenever God pleases, be it soon or be it late, so that I go off in such a way as not to frighten you. I think, however, that you are very much mistaken. I must get weaker yet, and take to my bed."

On Wednesday morning he was much weaker ; and I then said that I thought my words about a week would come true.

"Do you mean about my dying in a week ?"
"Yes," I answered.

"I think it is very likely, as this tugging at my chest is very distressing, and gives me a sensation of faintness."

His departure, and all the tokens of its approach, were constant subjects of our conversation ; and one never feared to depress him by noticing the progress of his disease. The effect was always the contrary ; and, as I never had been with an invalid, he frequently called my attention to the symptoms of declining strength, and commented on them medically. During this day he was very restless, but betrayed no symptoms of impatience. His bed could not be made to his satisfaction ; but he seemed to be perfectly aware that this arose from his own feverish state. Instead of evincing annoyance at the repeated failures to promote his comfort, he only praised the patience of the attendants in making and re-making it so often. The most common services were exaggerated by his grateful spirit into acts of extraordinary kindness, and he frequently lamented the trouble which he feared that he was giving to all around him.

He slept during almost the whole day; waking, however, every ten minutes or so, and asking me to read to him. This I did; first from the bible, and then from "Leighton on St. Peter." As soon as I began he fell asleep; but whenever he awoke he regretted that he had not heard anything, and begged me to "give him another trial." He had often said that, though unable to follow the connected thread of my reading, he never failed to pick up what furnished him with delightful meditations.

It was evident that he was worse; but neither of us apprehended any immediate danger. When awake he continued, however, to take an interest in our ordinary occupations. He directed me to put some lights into a drawing which I had finished some months before; and even so late as half past six o'clock he told me to put up his own drawing of Staffa, in order that he might look at it.

At half past eleven at night, the thermometer having fallen considerably, I shut the window, and told him my reason. In a minute he called me to his bedside, told me to keep a good fire for myself, but to open all the windows and doors as much as I could bear. He then complained of great embarrassment in his respiration, and expressed a doubt whether he should get through the night.

I made some parting observations. He rejoined, "I will not make speeches; but I have two things to say."

The first was an affectionate farewell to myself. In reply, I reminded him of the superior satisfaction he possessed of having promoted my happiness, not only in this world, but also, as I trusted, in the world to come.

He answered meekly, "It was not I."

Here he was interrupted by coughing. When he was again quiet I reminded him that he had another thing to say, and begged him to take the earliest opportunity of doing so. He then added, "The second is soon said. Christ is all in all to me. I have no hope but in him. He is indeed all in all."

I quoted "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me: thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." He said, "They do comfort me. There is no darkness. I see Jordan, and the heavenly Joshua passing over dry shod."

Throughout the night, when awake, he was perfectly calm and collected. At his request I read the fifteenth chapter of the 1st Corinthians; and at a later period he begged me to repeat texts, which I did from time to time. He frequently asked whether I was cold or tired; made inquiries as to whether I was adequately clothed, and proved, in various ways, that he retained his faculties, and his characteristic solicitude for others. He also directed me what medicines to give him, how to prepare them, altering the quantities, and making medical observations from time to time on his state.

At ten minutes to two he said, "You see it will not do;" and repeatedly urged me to go to rest, "as I must be tired," promising to waken me when he came to the last!

At ten minutes past three he left a parting message for Theodore, directing him always to pray to God. He then begged me not to make him speak, as it would cause him to go sooner. A minute after, he said in a quick, lively tone, and with a smile of joy:

"I am going now: I shall soon sleep."

"And you will wake again?"

"Yes."

I quoted "Those that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

"He will."

Thinking he was going immediately, I said, "Lord Jesus receive his spirit."

This he repeated after me three or four times, and also some other things, of which I only caught the words "God," "Christ," "triumph."

Day beginning to dawn, he looked out of the window; and I remarked—

"What a glorious day is dawning on you, my dearest!"

He assented with a look of joy.

I said, "There will be no sun and no moon there; for the Lamb will be the light thereof."

Looking fixedly before him, he murmured, "Christ," "angels," "beautiful," "magnificent," "delightful;" and then turning to me, with a look as if re-assuring me, "Indeed it is."

At one time he said, "This suffering is little to what Christ suffered on the cross."

I quoted, "But our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

A few minutes afterwards he said, "I thank God!" And these were the last connected words which he spoke.

I also read several texts, to which he assented either by word or sign. I continued to do so at intervals so long as he breathed; but he soon ceased to respond, though he must have heard them, as he gave the following sign of consciousness.

At ten minutes past four, being tired of standing, I removed to the opposite side, and sat down on the bed. He missed me, immediately, and, following the sound of my voice as I continued repeating texts, turned his head with great effort towards me, and, grasping my hand, gave me a dying look.

His hold relaxed immediately; and he gave no further sign of consciousness, except occasionally turning his eyes to me. He continued to breathe till twenty-three minutes past four, when he slept in Jesus.

What a peaceful close to an active and faithful life! How completely the fear of death was taken away! How thoroughly all regrets at his early doom, at prospects so bright and so suddenly overcast, at so abrupt and final a termination to all his labours, and studies, and projects for the benefit of his fellow-creatures, were quenched in the anticipation of approaching glory!*

* This was no passing or evanescent feeling. One day he met Dr. Chambers in consultation at the house of a patient;

Does it not prove the justice of his favourite position, that, 'if religion was any thing, it must be every thing'? and bear out the conclusion of the celebrated William Grimshaw, addressed to Mr. Romaine, in the year 1763, "When I die, I shall then have my greatest grief and my greatest joy; my greatest grief that I have done so little for Jesus; and my greatest joy, that Jesus has done so much for me?"

An Ode and a Postscript.

MR. EDITOR:—

Your past condescension emboldens me to submit a few lines,—an Ode on the first great consummation of our internal improvements. They were rather hastily thrown together in "days o' lang syne,"—when, as the best effusions were but the scratching of a goose-quill, the worst affected equal merit, having the same origin. Steel pens have not given dull scribblers more self-knowledge; and I venture again to forget my poetical inaptitude and encroach on your forbearance. The piece was written in 1825, a few days before the New York Canals were traversed their whole length. The Postscript, from Vulcan, he might have dated some ten or a dozen years ago; but it was only in these dog-days that it arrived. Perhaps he meant it as an anticipatory exultation in the glories of the Pennsylvania Rail Road. I have appended a reflection or two.

MYTHOLOGY EXTENDED:

For the New York Canal Celebration, Nov. 1825.

When Saturn of old from dominion was hurled,
And to three rebel sons his broad empire surrendered,
The gray-bearded god thus divided the world,
And to each of the ingrates his portion he tendered;—
"O'er land and o'er sky
Let Jove rule on high,

In the shades will dark Pluto a kingdom descry.
While Neptune, o'er fountains and waters supreme,
Shall govern the ocean, and reign in the stream."

Quoth Neptune, "'Tis hard, since of worlds there are three,
One below, one above, infernal, celestial.

The globe should but half be conferred upon me,
And Jove interfere in the mid-realm terrestrial:
The rogue takes command
Of all the fair land,

From the loftiest hill to the water-worn strand;
While I am abandoned with billows to toil,
At bay my just sway o'er the rich blooming soil."

For ages bold Neptune left Jove to himself,
A rover mid surges, in rivers, to fountains:
Roused at length, he exclaimed to each watery elf,—
"Go, bear ye my floods over dales and through mountains;
My car, in its pride,
Across empires shall glide.

Borne smoothly along the CANAL's gentle tide;
Triumphant my trident shall float through the land,
And the globe, undivided, confess my command."

Rejoiced the old Deep as its monarch thus spoke,
And crowds of the water-gods soon were in motion;
With tridents they furrowed the soil and the rock,
And sea came to sea, giant lakes to the ocean:
Now Erie, Champlain,
Flow calm to the main.

And Neptune o'er all has expanded his reign:
Rule Pluto beneath, and rule Jove in the skies,—
The Earth, land and water, is Neptune's fair prize!

POSTSCRIPT.—BY VULCAN.

To the surge, mighty Neptune, your tritons remand,
Their bravado is cooling, exhausted their flutter;
You've wrested from Jove just enough of his land
To float a dull boat through a half-stagnant gutter!
There your dolphins give place
To jades at snail's pace,

All Olympus indignantly flouts the disgrace!
Know that Vulcan has conquered another long slip,
Where 'a mile in a minute' shall gladden the trip.

Canals be your glory! The RAIL shall be mine!

Your doom is to struggle with indolent water:
Madding fire with the rage-hiding lymph I'll combine,
Coursing swift, like an eagle to far-distant slaughter;
Creative, my forge,
Like a new Demiurge,

For the road, for the horse, shall its iron disgorge:
Round the globe, like a whirlwind, my chariots shall fly,
Neptune diving amazed, clambering Jove up the sky!

Mythology, patient reader, was once divinity and sacred history,—the divinity and the sacred history of gods and demigods,—inculcated and in due measure expounded by philosophical, poetical and professional priests. And "Mythology Extended" should be proportionally in the same category.

and having alluded to his approaching death, Dr. Chambers kindly answered "that he ought not to despond, for that he would be quite well yet." Dr. Hope stopped him with an assurance that he needed not to be thus cheered, for that he was well aware of his condition; that, besides, the nature of Dr. Chambers' communication was not cheering, for he should be sorry to be detained long from his heavenly inheritance, and to exchange its prospect for the toils of his profession.

Vulcan's Postscript, indeed, is rather undignified in tone; lauding swift locomotion, which is a thing of course among gods, though coveted by men; not breathing ambition, that temper actually mean and unholy, yet reputedly divine, which would ever be awake and urgent in a deified plurality. Yet the Postscript adverts to the vain, plausible, and aspiring subdity of the Oriental Sages, the Demiurge, who (it was said) thwarted the better and wiser Supreme Power, by becoming a creator,—i. e. by giving to shapeless matter, previously existing, its various forms,—and by withdrawing from that Power the homage of the intelligent creatures so produced. Nor is it without a hint that the Optimus Maximus (which Jove was called, and either was or was not, in mythological reality, as the philosophy or the fable happened to run,) might be driven from the earth, by of course the concentrated worldliness likely, amid the numerous better results, to follow locomotive speed and facility, jumbling mankind together in exoriated competition, and at the sacrifice very largely, both directly and indirectly, of personal calmness and domestic quiet. The Ode, however, is a somewhat truer echo: and if it were heroic in style and well executed, it would be an approach to the verisimilitude of mythology, i. e. of the theology of the ancient heathen, especially of the Greeks.

Theology! Even so, worthy reader: such-like, at least in part, was theology among the Gentiles, before Christ came. They not only had their "dumb idols," but their insane theories and stories of the attributes and the doings of the personages represented by these idols;—the Oriental theories or imaginations being more (emptily) profound; the Greek and Western, more palpable and popular, and sometimes not more elevated than the fancies now laid before you, besides that they were often utterly unprincipled, and even atrocious for immorality. That such endocrination, in such a form, obtains no longer in Christendom, should awaken devout gratitude to the Almighty. Yet, that another idolatry is grafted on a purer belief, and that the most depraved misbelief and teaching are rife without even the transparent veil of idolatry, calls for the deepest humiliation and the most earnest prayer for deliverance, both as the elect community and individually, from the entire abominations, in all their phases.

If this gratitude, this abasement, this entreaty, have been excited in the reader, the foregoing mental relaxation will not have been profitless.

American Colleges,

Should not Churchmen support Church Colleges? This is a question often heard, and yet many to whom it is addressed think that the only reason why they should send their children to these institutions is, for the sake of the College itself; in other words to patronize it. We assure them, there is a much deeper reason involved; it is the welfare of their own children. Without referring to the fact that in other institutions they cannot of course be brought up in Church principles, we would confine ourselves to the statement, that often their orthodoxy on vital and fundamental principles may be affected. This is a point which may touch some who care little for other considerations, and we would therefore take with them the broad ground, that if they do not send their children to Church Colleges, they can have no security that they will be brought up even in the essentials of the Christian faith.

These thoughts were suggested to the writer by attending the late Yale College commencement. The general cry now is—"Harvard has been long since indeed given up to hopelessness and acknowledged heresy, but Yale—good old Yale—is staunch and true. There, we Churchmen may send our sons without fear. True, it is a Congregational College, but then it is orthodox in all the essential doctrines of Christianity. No danger of Yale following in the steps of Harvard. Its friends have never given any intimation of leaning to Socinianism." Now let me tell one of the signs of the times.

Two evenings previous to commencement, the Annual address before the Congregational ministers of Connecticut—the Concio ad Clerum, as it is called—was delivered at New Haven. This meeting has usually been held in the College Chapel, but this year, anticipating a crowd, one of the largest Congregational places of worship was chosen. The Concio ad Clerum is always allowed to be an exposition of the views of the College and of the Theological Seminary attached to it. On this occasion the speaker was the Rev. Dr. Bushnell of Hartford—a former officer of the College, and without doubt the ablest Congregational Minister in New England. A few weeks previous to this he had delivered the Annual Address before the Harvard Theological Seminary, showing by his acceptance of their invitation that he did not shrink from their views with the same horror with which St. John refused to hold any intercourse with Cerinthus. His subject then was, "the Atonement of our Lord," and we have not heard that any excitement followed. Could you or I, Mr. Editor, have delivered an Address on that doctrine before Harvard University, which would not have been received by our audience with a shout of dissent?

In New Haven the theme was, "The Divinity of Christ," and nearly two hours were devoted by Dr. B. to a masterly exposition of his own views of that doctrine. From incidental notices in the course of his address, it is evident that he denies the Vicarious sacrifice of Christ. The object of that sacrifice was, "to pour the love of God into the heart of man," &c. He acknowledged his dissent from the common views of the Trinity, speaking of it as "a metaphysical Trinity," and stating that "we make a confusion of ideas, and then call it faith." An abstract of his argument is briefly this:—

The Father in the nature of His being and existence is incomprehensible, and it requires a Trinity to reveal him. The Logos or Word is the power the Father has of expressing or revealing Himself, and therefore has always existed. He first "expressed Himself," by the creation of material worlds, and then gave a higher revelation of Himself when the divinity animated

Rom. vi. 4, and John xiii. 10.

MR. EDITOR:—

Your correspondent, OZARK, expresses the opinion (July 1,) that Western's communication on Immersion "is not sufficiently conclusive, or will not appear so, to general readers." He also recommends the republication in the Banner of a part of the Rev. Mr. Chapin's work on the Primitive Church. This, he says, "this, you know, is a most scholarly* work; and to my mind, more conclusive on the subject of baptism, or at least, on the questions, 'Who are subjects?' and 'What is the mode?'" than any thing in print. His arguments are put up in such a manner as to be plain to the most simple, and at the same time satisfactory to the most erudite." My reply is, 1st. That if my communication is not sufficiently conclusive to general readers, it will not appear to them to be so. 2d. The Editor of the Banner desires his correspondents to be short. It was not to be expected, therefore, that the comprehensive subject of immersion should be fully discussed in one newspaper essay. 3d. The principal object of my essay was, without strictly preserving the unities, to show that a very popular interpretation of two passages, (Rom. vi. 4, and Col. ii. 12.) was unfounded, and to bring into notice a third passage, (John xiii. 10.) which in the discussion had been much neglected. Upon a review of the article I find nothing of importance to change unless it be the following sentence: "To be baptized signifies to be washed: this is its original meaning." I ought to have said that this was its meaning when originally used in reference to religious ceremonies. It would be difficult to determine whether Baptizo originally signified to fill, to pump, to wash, to moisten, or to immerse.

Mr. Chapin's book is unquestionably the production of a scholar. But before his chapters on baptism are republished for the benefit of general readers at the West, a few alterations, I beg leave to suggest, might be made in order to render the work more "conclusive."

1st. Dip and immerse, (he says,) "are not, as many seem to suppose, synonymous words. A body is never immersed in water, until it is entirely covered by the water; but it is dipped in or into water, when any part of it comes in contact with the water," (p. 44.) The author here confounds immersion with submersion.

2d. He does not notice the fact that some judicious expositors consider death in the following passage as equivalent to atonement. "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his DEATH?"

3d. He is evidently not aware of the fact that Elder Campbell and his followers consider baptism as comprehending submersion and emersion.

4th. It should be remarked, (he says, when commenting on Rom. vi. 4, p. 55,) "that if the Apostle had such a physical burial in his mind as is pretended, [by the submersionists,] then baptism must of necessity be a saving ordinance, that is, the mere act of receiving baptism would procure pardon of sin. This conclusion is inevitable, for, if 'we are buried in water at baptism, in order that we may be raised to newness of life,' then, such a burial, if it has its legitimate effect, must enable us to walk in such newness of life. Either, therefore, it must be allowed that baptism does, of itself, procure salvation for us, or the idea that a physical burial is denoted in this place, must be given up." This "argument" is not "put up in such a manner as to be plain to the most simple." In one sense baptism is a saving ordinance. We are saved by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost. As many as have been baptized into Jesus Christ have put on Christ. They were baptized "in order that they might be raised to newness of life." "Baptism, (says the Prayer Book,) doth represent unto us our profession . . . that as He, (viz. Christ,) died and rose again, so should we who are baptized die unto sin and rise again unto righteousness, &c." Be this, however, the doctrine of Scripture and of the Prayer Book or not, it will be acknowledged by the readers of the following extracts from Campbell's "Christian Baptist," that Mr. Chapin's argument just quoted will have no effect on that veteran or his legion of followers:

"I proceed to show that we have the most explicit proof that God forgives sins for the name's sake of His Son, or when the name of Jesus Christ is named upon us in immersion; that in and by the act of immersion, so soon as our bodies are put under water, at that very instant our former or 'old sins' are all washed away, provided only that we are true believers." "When Jesus commanded reformation and forgiveness of sins to be announced in his name to all nations, he commanded men to receive immersion to the confirmation of this promise. Thus we find that when the Gospel was announced on Pentecost, and when Peter opened the Kingdom of heaven to the Jews, he commanded them to be immersed for the remission of sins. This is quite sufficient, if we had not another word on the subject." "I am bold, therefore, to affirm, that every one of them who, in the belief of what the Apostle spoke, was immersed, did in the very instant in which he was put under water, receive the forgiveness of his sins, and the gift of the Holy Spirit. If so, then, who will not concur with me in saying, that christian immersion is the gospel in water?" (Rice and Campbell's Debate, p. 443.)

Another short article, and I shall have done—for this topic at least.

Be obedient and attentive to thy Governors, Masters, and Teachers.

Be merciful even to the beast which God hath given man for his service.

* Quere; is scholarly an English word? Neither Johnson, Sheridan, nor Walker recognizes it.

* In Mr. Campbell's view a true believer is one who declares his belief that Jesus Christ is the Son of God.

man—when, (to give Dr. B.'s words,) "the Divine entered into the human." Of course therefore the relation of Father and Son, began only at the Incarnation. Afterwards came those divine influences which are spoken of as the influences of the Holy Ghost, and "then the Trinity was complete." On the question—Whether or not our Lord had a human soul? Dr. B., declared his inability to answer.

In short the whole view is a modified form of Sabellianism, and we believe Dr. B. is just where his Boston friends were twenty-five years ago. His audience on this occasion—besides the Faculty and Theological students of the College—was composed in a great measure of Congregational ministers, and these are the men who are Trustees &c.,—of the College. The writer of this talked with several of them afterwards, and heard no objection offered to any of the views which had been advanced. Dr. B. in his discourse, took occasion to attack the Socinian view of mere Humanitarianism, and therefore his friends raise the cry—"You see he is no Socinian."

Now under such circumstances—with such views passing unchallenged and even endorsed by her friends—where is Yale College as it respects "the faith once delivered to the saints?" How many years will it take before she may stand side by side with Harvard? And will Churchmen send their sons where there is danger that they may have the latent seeds of doubt sown in their minds by the preaching they must hear around them? With Trinity, Geneva, Burlington, and St. James' Colleges, which are true to the faith, why need they run the risk of infection? The beginnings of error are most insidious, and the evil of a carping, questioning spirit may be implanted in the young mind, long before an open heresy develops itself among its teachers. There is everything in the intellectual and moral atmosphere which it breathes.

These views have been more strongly impressed upon the writer from having lately enjoyed the privilege of visiting Burlington College, and seeing how admirably pure religious training keeps pace with the highest intellectual culture. He cannot but be surprised that Churchmen of Philadelphia will send their sons to be infected with the errors of New England theology, when so noble an Institution is going up in their neighborhood—one whose intellectual advantages, he has no hesitation in saying, are greater than those of any Dissenting College in the land, while its students must come forth firm in the faith held "in our fathers' day and in the old time before them." We left it feeling that it is one of the points of light amid the darkness which gathers around us in these "days of trouble, rebuke, and blasphemy," and in this age of doubt and uncertainty—this age so "emulous of change"—we thank God that at length there are places opening where our children can be taught without imbibing views which hereafter may lead them into all the mazes of scepticism, and at length even peril their salvation.

The Influence of Pagan and Christian Education.

MR. EDITOR:

The title of this article, although it may not attract the thoughtless: cannot but move the attention of those, who seriously ponder over the welfare of the young, and inexperienced. It is not to be denied, that the tendency of the vast accumulation of knowledge in modern times is mainly directed towards material things in the vulgar sense. The old truism, that knowledge is power, has resolved itself into the more tangible one, that money is power—that the possession of wealth is the possession of the one thing needful: and there are few parents perhaps, who would not prefer to place this gilded, but barren sceptre in the hands of their children; even against the convictions of their own hearts and judgments.

Such was the genius of Paganism—but such is not the genius of Christianity: and men should be ashamed thus to blur its noblest features.

The master-spirits of antiquity were indeed wonderful. They overflowed with wisdom—their thoughts—their outpourings in philosophy—their sublime imaginings—their deeds in arms and in arts, exhibit such fecundity—such truth in sensible things,—such vigor and brilliancy in action, that even at this day, with all of our acquired knowledge, we look at them with amazement.

The force, and acquisition of the Pagan mind, is one of the most stupendous ideas to engage human reflection. Their poets and artists—their orators and warriors—their lawgivers and historians—the magnificence, grandeur, and rare beauty of their cities, still stand forth, as if raised on lofty pinnacles in bold relief, before the gaze of men of modern times; like objects to challenge rivalry—and in their exquisite perfection, defying competition. These glorious originals remain, even to our time, unvanquished.

What a genius was Homer's! What a wonderful mind was Aristotle's! What a soul lived in the breast of Demosthenes! What an all pervading, searching, and refined understanding was Cicero's! The impress of these great minds is among us still; deep, and indelible—and can never be worn out, unless barbarism should extinguish the torch of literature. Where is the modern, that we could safely venture to place before such names—although we have had Bacon—Milton—Shakspeare—Chatham and Burke. Is there any age of the world, not fabulous, or exaggerated, that will bear a comparison; and not shrink when weighed with that of Pericles, or of Augustus, as regards the mere accomplishments of mind and matter? Material beauty then sat enthroned over the world, like the Deity of perfection; and men bowed down and worshipped it.

Man stood then on the great stage of action, by God's appointment, as if to exhibit to future ages, how great, and how vile he could be at the same time, how wonderful his endowments, how high was the point of excellence he could reach—but beyond which, nothing more was to be obtained by mere human energy. Paganism had put forth its greatest efforts—had displayed a genius the most subtle and resplendent—had unfolded wonders, never to perish while the human memory endures—yet, all was insufficient for the happiness of man. He was a brilliant, daring, and extraordinary creature: gifted with every thing that could ennoble or adorn the mere creature; but he was miserable.

Genius stood to them in the place of a religion. The "mens divini" was the highest and noblest gift of which the multitude could form a conception; hence they worshipped it to such a degree, that it led to the Deification of their fellow mortals as Gods and Demigods. Their religion was of the earth—earthly. The construction of their society, wonderful though it was, was unsound—impure—and sensual to the very core. Pride, and lust, and cupidity in its most intense and enlarged sense, corroded its vitals. The polished Greeks, and the still more luxurious Romans; surrounded by all their miracles of arts—with gold and silver, and precious stones, were a debased people. The very best of them famous for virtue and the general esteem, were disfigured by the grossest private vices. A purifying—self-denying, and elevating morality, which can only flow from a religion undefiled, was not their's—a definite faith—an enduring hope of something better beyond the grave was not theirs—and for the want of this, though the exterior appeared beautiful, within was loathsome decay and rottenness. From the dreadful ills of life, so sudden, and so frequent among them, their only refuge was despair—and the remedy self-destruction. Poison, or the sword was the unfailing application, whenever their burdens became intolerable, and their energies gave way. Nearly all the men of renown perished miserably by violence. Even they, who led up the gorgeous triumphs through the streets of Rome to the foot of the Capitol, followed by the shouts of the citizens, and hailed as the Saviours of the State, fell, on the first reverse of fortune, under the daggers of assassins; or were hurled from the Tarpeian Rock. The best beloved, and the most honored met the same destiny—and human glory—and human misery seemed to mock each other.

Yes, the Pagan world, and the Pagan mind was indeed wonderful, but it wanted a heart—a heart that could be opened by divine mercy only—infusing its holy spirit through the sign of the cross—that ever sacred, and touching emblem of man's redemption.

The hour at length came, that hour hitherto kept back in the depths of almighty and inscrutable wisdom. It was not long after the death of Augustus Cesar, just when the fading glories of his immense empire were about to decline towards the horizon—when Imperial Rome was being doomed to lose, inch by inch, her vast domain, both of territory, and of renown: that the voices of the Apostles and Christian Martyrs were heard swelling up, from the opposite quarter of the heavens. Then it was, that the voice of holy Paul, was heard before the throne of Felix: and in the thrilling language of the sacred writings, "as he reasoned of righteousness, and temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled." It was then, in one of the most trying, and at the same time most glorious incidents of his life, that this inspired servant of his divine Master, even in bonds, and tribulation, displayed an eloquence surpassingly beautiful. It was then, when stretching forth his hand at the foot of the Roman Tribunal, he pronounced that sublime vindication of his faith, which extorted from the proud heart of King Agrippa the exclamation, "almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." Under the spell of his burning and inspired words the heathen turned pale—the knell of Paganism was rung—while the champions of the cross, raising its banner aloft, went forth to subdue the nations, conquering and to conquer, and to give light to the Gentiles.

The noble, triumphs achieved by the early Christian teachers and Martyrs, are ours by inheritance, without an agony, or an effort. The eyes of the living generations now open upon the perfect day. Civilization based on the teaching of Christ and his Apostles, envelopes man on every side. In this favored age, but more especially in this favored land, the faith of the christian feels no fetters—no dread of persecuting rulers—neither bonds, nor stripes, nor burnings, nor executions, fright and drive him to caves, and hiding places, there to pour forth his prayers and sing the anthems of praise to his God, and his Saviour, for this mighty redemption. The christian mother as she clasps her infant to her breast, and breathes a rapturous sigh for the gift, turns her first thought to Heaven, and vows to devote her darling to virtue and religion, and bring him up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Praiseworthy and holy resolution! but alas how fleeting! The moment of rapture over: and other thoughts spring up to deaden, if not wear out entirely this pious sensibility—and if it be thus with the mothers, how must it be with the sterner nature of the fathers—absorbed by pleasure and the allurements of the world, setting constantly before the eyes of their children, the treasures of this life, rather than the treasures of the world to come.

Ungrateful mortals! Ye have that, after which the Pagan sighed in vain. A revelation, that would have unlocked the heart of Plato: and drawn from him deeper, and nobler, and more precious thoughts, than even his sublime musings have left us. A revelation, that has unfolded a religion pregnant with truth and wisdom, whose breath is peace itself:—blending into the sweetest harmony, duty to God, and love of our neighbours, with the most touching lessons of practical utility. A religion showing, that in its bosom alone, can be found that "inward sunshine of the soul," without which even in the palmiest days of prosperity, the heart will be dry, imbedded as in clay, and all things will be bitter like ashes to the taste. Above all, a religion that sustains, encourages, consoles, and can disarm even the deadly sting of adversity itself,— —Relentless power,

Thou tamer of the human breast,
Whose iron scourge, and tort'ring hour,
The bad affright, afflict the best."

Yea! even thou adversity shalt succumb at the foot of the cross, and bow to the spirit of the Lamb.

The office of this paper has been removed from No. 89 South Fifth street, to the Book store of Mr. R. S. H. George, No. 16 South Seventh street, between Market and Chesnut streets.

Mr. George will act as Agent for the receipt of subscriptions, etc.

"ANTICHRIST, OR THE SPIRIT OF SECT AND SCHISM."—Such is the title of a tract or Discourse, "by John W. Nevin, President of Marshall College." We have read this Discourse with earnest attention and deep interest. It has impressed our mind with high respect for its author, as a thoughtful observer, a profound thinker, one who has the courage and independence to speak out his honest thoughts.

In the last Banner an esteemed Correspondent called the attention of our Readers to another work of this learned author. As a matter of course such teaching has brought Dr. Nevin into collision with the Doctors at Princeton. The Preface of this work contains an able answer to Dr. Hodge's Review of Dr. N.'s work on the "Mystical Presence." Our Readers may not all know that Dr. Nevin is a German Reformed Minister, and President of a German Reformed College. There is of course a close affinity between the German Reformed and the Presbyterians. It is this fact which gives great significance and additional weight to Dr. Nevin's opinions. Had they been uttered by a Minister of our church, they would have been set down by many, who may listen to the Presbyterian teacher, as the outpourings of High Church bigotry and exclusiveness. "We only hear of 'Sect' and 'Schism' and Church, Church, Church, from these narrow minded churchmen!" Listen then, my Friend, to the German Reformed Doctor. And if you can find anything higher on these high subjects, in "high church" teachings, we crave the benefit of your larger knowledge.

As this work may not be accessible to many of our Readers, especially in the West and South, where it is most needed; we shall give large extracts from it. And we think we cannot better occupy the columns of the Banner. It is not our design to enter into a minute criticism of this able work. There are, doubtless, views expressed with which we might not fully agree. But our object is rather to set forth important truths, forcibly expressed, with which we do heartily agree. The subject of the Discourse is suggested by that inspired declaration contained in St. John iv. 1—3. We think the learned Author makes too broad an assertion when he says that this text reveals the "single fountain or head" into which all heresies "are found to gather themselves up." In his introduction he makes the following just distinction.

"Heresy and schism are not indeed precisely the same thing. They are however most intimately related, as different aspects or sides only of one and the same bad life. Heresy is theoretical schism; and schism is practical heresy. They flow into each other continually and serve to make one another spiritually complete. Their connexion is like that of the understanding and the will, which with all their difference embrace and fill each other, with mutual interpenetration, at every point. All heresy is in principle schismatic; all schism is in its inmost constitution heretical."

The author thus states the heads of his Discourse.

"Our subject then is ANTICHRIST, or the spirit of heresy and schism, under the aspect in which it is here presented to our view, by the glowing pen of St. John the Divine. We will consider first its Nature; glance in the second place at its general History; and then endeavor to set forth some of the distinguishing Marks or features, by which it may be identified and recognized under all the Protean shapes it is found to assume from age to age, with reference more particularly to its great Protestant manifestation, at the present day, in the form of Rationalistic Sectarianism. The way will thus be open to represent, in conclusion, the moral Misery of our reigning sect plague, and its proper Remedy."

We pass over the first two heads of the Discourse, and proceed to make some selections from the third, which sets forth "some of the distinguishing Marks or features by which it may be identified," &c. We cannot however omit the admirable conclusion of "the general history of Antichrist."

"The spirit of Sect, on the other hand, would seem to carry in itself an original natural affinity with the Docetic or Gnostic way of looking at Christ. More practical than theoretical at the start, it is disposed to lay peculiar stress on the spiritual side of Christianity, as the revelation of a higher life in the world. But this higher life is not apprehended, as the true universal sense of the world itself; comes to no full human revelation, in the person of Christ, as the principle and ground of all religion. Sectarianism is ever inclined to place Christ wholly in the clouds, or to turn him into an ideal phantom, that it may be left the more free in the exercise of its own subjectivity. In this way, however, it is carried over, by a sort of inward necessity, to the sphere of theoretical Rationalism. The divine which it affects to grasp and hold in such fantastic style, becomes identical at last with the simply human. That which has begun in the spirit finds its tame, flat conclusion, ultimately in the flesh. It is by no accidental connection, then, that sectarianism is found to be rationalistic. It belongs to its very constitution to have this character. The spirit of sect wherever it may prevail, involves necessarily a false view of the person of Christ, and is utterly incompatible thus with sound Christian orthodoxy. As a spirit at once of heresy and schism, in this way, we pronounce it to be emphatically the Antichrist of the Church in our own time. So far as its power goes, it is at war with the whole fact of the incarnation."

In quoting from "the Marks of Antichrist with reference particularly to the Sect system," we begin with the "third Mark." These extracts will speak for themselves, and that, we think, very powerfully.

Third Mark.—With this dim sense of what is properly comprehended in the person of Christ, is always associated necessarily a corresponding want of faith in the Church, as a real supernatural constitution always present in the world. Antichrist acknowledges of course the existence of the Church; owns also its divine origin, and pretends to find in it the presence of a divine life. But the Church thus allowed, comes to no true, organically historical revelation in the world's life, as an independent, abiding form of human existence, continuously distinct from all that the world has been, or still continues to be, under any other form. If Christ be the principle of a new creation, the point in which the earth and heavens have been brought into permanent living conjunction as never before, it follows at once plainly that the Church in which is comprehended the power of this fact, and which for this very reason is declared to be his body, the fullness of Him that filleth all in all, must carry in itself a constitution of its own, as really objective and enduring, to say the least, as the course of nature, on which as a basis it is made supernaturally to rest. The ancient Gnosticism, however, had no knowledge of any such organic, historical Church. Its associated Christianity was something of a quite different nature; made up of an election of living units, the pneumatic order of human spirits, each attracted for itself towards Christ, and all uniting by aggregation only to form the idea of his kingdom. As the Saviour himself had no real being in the world, stood among men only in the form of an unsubstantial phantasm, or in the show of a human life which was after all but the sign or symbol of his invisible nature, not the very presence of this nature itself; it was not possible of course to attach any different idea of reality to the new life which he introduced into the world. The Church must become as Docetic and idealistic as her imaginary head.

And so in the case of all later manifestations of the anti-christian spirit. With the course of time, we find it consenting in appearance to yield the first point; it affects to believe and confess that Christ did once come in the flesh; an event, far off in the dim distance of the past, and in this way much as though it belonged to another world; but its original character is only the more strongly asserted, with all this, in the view it continues to take of the Church. Nay, it fights against the idea of a real Church, Antichrist as it is, as though the honor of the true historical Christ must necessarily be made to suffer by admitting its claims. Out of zeal for what Christ once was in the world, it madly seeks to turn his whole presence in it since into the character of a mere ghostlike abstraction. The Church, in its estimation, is the form only in which a certain system of thought, feeling, and action, produced by the gospel, is accustomed to make itself known, in conformity with our general social nature. In the end, accordingly, it resolves itself into thin air.

The whole Sect system shows here its true character; for it turns throughout on the assumption, that Christ has no real Church in this world; but only an invisible spiritual Christianity, which men are at liberty to arrange and shape, by the help of the Bible, according to their own pleasure. Schism, as such, has no faith in the holy catholic Church; holds the very word for popish, and the thing itself no better than empty wind; save as it may be taken to mean its own figment of a Church, which exists objectively in the clouds only, or at best in the Bible, and subjectively in such developments of piety as are supposed to square properly with this rule.

Fourth Mark.—This want of faith in the Church, as the presence of a real divine life in the world, reveals itself always in a low view of the ministry and sacraments, and of Christian worship generally. If the Church be not the depositary of supernatural powers, made objective and constant in the world under this form, it is not to be imagined of course that the organs and functions of the Church can carry in them any greater value or force.

It is characteristic of Antichrist accordingly, under all forms, to undervalue the true idea of the Christian ministry, and to sink the character of all church services and institutions to the level of our common human life; at the very moment, it may be, when it is pretended to exalt them, in another view, to the highest spiritual dignity. All Sectarian Christianity, in particular, is clearly distinguished by this mark; as any one may see from the history of past sects, or by considering the character in which sects appear in our own time. They make little account of any outward ordination; because it is the Spirit that qualifies all true ministers for the sacred office; and their ministry must be God-sent, not manufactured by man. The office in this view, however, comes to no real union with the man on whom it seems to rest; and the consequence is, that all ends at last, for himself and for others also, in the strength which may happen to belong to him in his simply natural capacity and state. The ministry is shorn thus of its true divine sanctity, and all ministerial functions undergo a corresponding degradation.

The same dualistic view prevails also in the case of the sacraments; sundering the visible from the invisible; overthrowing the idea of sacramental grace entirely. The spirit of Sect universally shrinks from the acknowledgment of any objective efficacy, either in Baptism or the Lord's Supper. It finds an immense difficulty in admitting the sacraments to be at all a special mode or form of grace, in which the divine force of Christianity is brought near to men, as something different from the exhibition which is made of it in the mere word; not reflecting that it would be equally difficult, in all probability, to admit the presence of any such special divine force in the person of the Redeemer himself, were he now outwardly among us, as in the days of his flesh. Faith in the sacraments, and faith in a real Christ who is come in the flesh, go hand in hand together. Sects clearly betray their rationalistic, Gnostic spirit, by making the Lord's Supper to be a simple sign or monument, and denying all power to holy Baptism. Their sacraments are Docetic, fantastic; all spirit, borrowed from the region of clouds; only to prove at last all flesh, having no reality save in the worshipper's brain. Hence a tendency, on the part of all sects, as such, to set aside the sacraments altogether, or at least to change their character into an entirely new sense. The Baptistic principle, in particular, may be said to lie involved in their whole theory of religion. Infant baptism has no meaning for those, who have lost all faith in the idea of sacramental grace.

The true idea of worship also will be found wanting, in the same circumstances, to the same extent. To be unsacramental, is necessarily to be at the same time unliturgical. The power of Christian worship consists in this, that the worshippers be filled with the sense of a common church life, and present themselves in this consciousness as a living sacrifice to God. Its whole conception requires that it should move in the sphere of the objective, and not fall over to the sway of simply individual thought or feeling. But we all know how completely the spirit of Sect serves to reverse this law. Sects have no sense for the objective and liturgical, in worship; hold all this rather to be at war with the idea of devotion; and aim accordingly, on principle, to clothe the entire service of God as much as possible with just the opposite character. Their hymns, and the tunes to which they are sung, their prayers, and of course also the whole tone of their preaching, bear the same impress of extreme subjectivity. This is supposed, indeed, to constitute their highest excellence and worth; as it seems to place the worshipper in direct personal juxtaposition with the spiritual world itself, and carries with it oftentimes a great show of earnestness and life, in its own form. But the transition here again is most easy, nay, most necessary, as all experience proves, from the region of clouds downward to the region of clouds. All Sect worship, fanatical and extravagant at first, sinks finally into the dull routine of empty ceremony. Sects as such, we may say rather, have no worship, in the only true sense of the term: and can hardly be said to know at all what worship, as a divine liturgical sacrifice, means.

Fifth Mark.—The anti-christian spirit reveals itself still farther, in the way of contempt for all history and authority. It is not possible to believe in a real Church at all, if we do not recognize in it the continued presence of the same divine life, or new creation, that was originally introduced into the world by the incarnation of Jesus Christ. In the character of a supernatural fact or entity, actually at hand in the world's life, and as something different in this respect from a mere theory or conception, the Church must exist as the body of CHRIST objectively and permanently, in the world, under the form of history: not here to-day and gone to-morrow; but always here, according to Christ's own solemn promise: not in the way of dead, monotonous tradition; but in the way of a true organic life process, reaching forward continually, through all ages, to its full proper consummation at the end of the world. In the very nature of the case, then, the individual must be bound by the general, the part by the whole: not blindly or slavishly, of course; but still in such a way, that no rupture or chasm between the two may be endured, as though the individual could be true by itself, in any original and independent form, apart from the organic whole to which it belongs. Hence the idea of Church authority, and sound ecclesiastical tradition. Faith in a real Christ, felt to be always in the Church really to the end of the world, will make it impossible for Christians to undervalue and despise either the present Church or the Church of past ages.

In proportion, however, as the sense of such a new creation in Christ Jesus, as the fact of the incarnation implies, may be wanting, this catholic feeling cannot be expected of course to prevail. When the objective Church, present or past, is no divine fact for faith (as in the Creed,) how should it be expected to control and rule in any way the particular Christian consciousness? The particular Christian consciousness in such case, if Christian it may still be called at all, is necessarily sectarian and schismatic—ruptured from the life of the Church as a whole. It belongs accordingly to the very constitution of Sect, on the other hand, that it should ever be thus a foe to all history and authority. Sects, in proportion as they are sectarian, are disposed to stand upon the right of private judgment and individual freedom; and entertain, in particular, a sovereign contempt for the "Fathers," and for Church antiquity in every shape.*

Sixth Mark.—Such affection of individual freedom is itself again worthy of being noticed, as a separate mark or feature of Antichrist.

Christianity proposes, indeed, also to make men free. "God hath not given us the spirit of fear," says the apostle, "but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind." Christ may be denominated emphatically the principle of all freedom; and religion, as derived from him, is any thing but a law of blind obedience, either for the understanding or the will. But for this very reason, it is not something to be produced or determined in any way, by the mind or will of men singly considered. Its form is not that of the single reason, or of the single will, as such; it carries in itself always a general character. My reason can be rational here, only as it admits the Christian reality under this form; my will can be free here, only as it freely consents to be bound by the objective life which it is thus required to enter. Christianity knows nothing of a purely subjective freedom, in any view. All individual reason, and individual will, must be bound, in order to be either rational or free. Authority, therefore, is just as necessary a constituent of religion as liberty itself; they are opposite poles only of one and the same life.

This, however, the antichristian spirit can never understand or allow. It is by its very nature, particularistic and subjective. It finds the measure of all truth and right in itself, and not in Christ or the Church. Christianity starts, of right, in faith; receives its contents primarily in the way of creed, as exhibited in the person of Christ; its maxim is, credo ut intelligam, I believe in order that I may understand; only as it is first merged thus in the sense of the new creation as a divine present reality, may the reason of the individual subject be trusted at all, in its endeavors to apprehend what this creation means. But the spirit before us reverses this rule. Plainly expressed, its maxim is intelligo ut credam, I must see and know in order that I may believe. It makes itself the last standard of truth, and is prepared to acknowledge Christ, only when He is found to suit its own preconceptions.

The pretension indeed is too monstrous, to be openly admitted in this barefaced form. It is cloaked accordingly, for the most part, with a show of subjection to the authority of the Bible. Antichrist (Matt. iv. 6) is ever ready to urge an "It is written," in favor of his own cause. He makes a merit of obeying God, in this way, while he tramples under foot all merely human authority. So it is characteristic of the Sect mind universally, as we all know, to make a pedantic parade of its love for the Bible. Your thorough sectarian is apt to rail out against old creeds and confessions; he is not to be bound thus, by the judgment of any man or body of men; others may lean on such human props; but the simple Bible is enough for him, and to no other testimony or law can he consent to appeal. He will not hear the Church; for that, he tells us, is the voice of man; but in the Bible God speaks, and he is willing to give it an obedient ear. He has faith in the Bible, but no faith in the Church; the fact of the written Record, he can embrace as truly supernatural and divine; but challenge his homage, in the same way, to the fact of Christianity itself, as a divine supernatural reality, subsisting in the life of the Church through all ages, and it is well if he do not scorn the thought as no better than gross superstition.

All this show of respect for God's Word however, is of no force whatever to invalidate what has just now been said of the false freedom of the spirit in question. It is only a plea, as already intimated, to excuse the arrogant assumption of superiority to all objective general authority whatever. With all his talk of following the Bible, the sectarian means by it simply, in the end, his own sense of what the Bible teaches. The Bible must be interpreted in some way; in order to enter any living mind, it must pass through a living medium of thought already at hand; for the undeveloped soul, it can have no meaning. An absolute immediate use of it without all intervening preparation, is out of the question. If the medium at hand be not

* It is hardly necessary to say, that this claim to absolute independence on the part of sects, is sheer pedantic affectation, when all is done. The thing itself is absurd and impossible. It lies in the constitution of our nature itself, that individual life and thought must be bound, in some way, by what is general. If then we refuse to acknowledge and honor authority under its legitimate form, we do not become free; we only accept authority under some form that is false. All true freedom holds in the bosom of true authority, as all bondage begins where the orbit of law is forsaken. To be subjective supremely, is to be supremely weak. Your blustering braggadocio is always a coward. The man who is forever bent on having his own way, is sure to go forever wrong. Sects are always palpably unfree, in proportion as the sect spirit forms their prevailing character. They disown antiquity, to make room for their own upstart history of yesterday. They refuse all reverence to the catholic Church, that they may do servile homage to some miserable fragment of the Christian profession in its stead. They have their "fathers" too, and their "traditions," as all the world knows; and none bow down more blindly to the spiritual rule they have been pleased to set up for themselves, in their own way. This, in fact, is the very curse of sectarianism, that while it professes to make men free, it teaches them to become slaves; cuts them off from the main stream of Christianity; carries them into a corner; thrusts aside the church consciousness for the sect consciousness; contracts the horizon of their theological vision to the measure of its own small canopy, no bigger in some cases than a common umbrella; and then urges them, thus bound, to look forth contemptuously on all the rest of the Christian world, with true Chinese vanity, as barbarian and unfree.

the product of education or traditional faith, the mind of the Church handed over to the individual subject, it will still be there as the particular mental frame at least of the subject himself, the product it may be in part of mere fancy or caprice, but always something different, of course, from the Bible itself, whose sense it is called to explain. The sectarian then never comes to the Bible, without a medium for converting it into thought and life! but instead of admitting the mind of the holy catholic Church, as it has stood from the beginning, to circumscribe his private thinking, in a free way, he affects to have no confidence in this whatever, and brings his own separate subjectivity to the case, under some other form, as though this were all that he needed to master the glorious world-revelation here laid at his feet.

Nor does it mend the matter at all, to plead here the promised guidance of the Holy Spirit. The question still returns, How are we led by the Spirit into all truth? Christianity is a whole, first in Christ and then in the Church, which it must ever be fanatical for me to think of grasping, as an isolated particle simply in its general life. This fanaticism however belongs to the Sect spirit, in its very constitution. It will have it, that both the Bible and the Holy Ghost are for the individual in such a way as to exclude all intermediate authority. All comes back finally to the form of mere individual judgment and will. The Bible and the Holy Spirit against the whole Church, is the plausible cry; but it comes always to this in the end: My sense of the Bible against the sense of the whole world besides. In riding the Bible with such pedantic parade, each sect rides in fact only its theological hobby, in the Bible's name; while the individual Me is arrogantly exalted (Antichrist) above all that is divine either in the Church or Bible, as though it were the source of Christianity itself, and Christ could have no being objectively in this world, save by its sovereign permission.*

Seventh Mark.—Another mark of this schismatic spirit is found in its tendency to hyperspiritualism. Christianity is emphatically a spiritual religion; but it is at the same time real, and in this respect conformable to the actual nature of man. It is the spiritual in true union with the natural, as the necessary basis of humanity, and a necessary element also in its constitution. Its Christ is one who has come in the flesh. Gnosticism will know only of a Christ who comes in the clouds, or which is the same thing, in the human brain. It claims to be in this way spiritual, in the highest degree; pneumatic, and not psychic; impatient of all contact possibly with our common earthly life. So through all phases; the spirit in question is always the same; swimming in empyrean heights, in such way as to lose all substantial hold upon the earth. Rationalism and sectarianism are both alike at this point; zealous for spiritual religion in opposition to a religion of forms.

All sects in particular boast of having the spirit, as they call it, in extraordinary measure; and affect to be more or less independent of outward ordinances in this way. They need, as we have seen, no outward historical Church, no real sacraments, no objective worship. Christianity is for them a matter of purely inward particular experience; a supernatural illass of life upon the single subject, with or without means, as God may see fit. All is spiritualistic; rising in this form oftentimes to the region of seeming inspiration or ranting frenzy; but still fantastic, always unsubstantial and unreal; with the necessity of cooling down ultimately into the form of frigid rationalistic abstraction."

We shall reserve for our next paper, two or three brief additional extracts from this head, and having given some striking quotations from the fourth topic "the Sect Plague and its remedy," conclude with a few remarks by way of application.

THE FEMALE EPISCOPAL ACADEMY was opened on Monday last by the Bishop, with appropriate and interesting ceremonies. Many of the clergy were present. This Institution begins with seventy-five pupils, a very large number indeed with which to commence.

* Here is a fine opportunity for the Sect spirit to make a false issue, in its own favor, against this very tract; as it has already done, in fact, over and over again, in opposition to the writer, in other cases. The tract, it will be said, is not willing to acknowledge the Bible as the rule of faith, but seeks to bring in a law of blind tradition in its place. The charge, however, is hypocritical and false. Hypocritical, because all sects do themselves make use of tradition, in the interpretation of the Scriptures; the poorest among them having some poor scheme of doctrine handed down from its own yesterday, through which, as a medium, its sense of God's word is always taken. Hypocritical again; because no sect is willing to acknowledge the Bible as interpreted by other sects; which it ought to do, if its own maxim were sound; but each one insists that it shall be taken only in the particular sense that appears to suit itself, while all join notwithstanding in the convenient cry: Great is Private Judgment, the Diana of the Sectarials! The charge, moreover, is false; we do not undervalue the Bible in favor of tradition, and we do not question the right of private judgment in its true form. All blind outward mechanical authority, in the interpretation of the Scriptures, as taught by Rome and practically allowed in a different form by the sect ANTICHRIST, we disown with our whole heart. But for this very reason we own no private judgment, as worthy of trust, that is not organically comprehended in the life of Christianity as a whole. We will not endure licentiousness and self-will for the true liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. We accept the Bible as God's word; but we see in the Church also the perpetual presence of a divine fact, from which that word may never be sundered without peril to the truth; and we hold for little better than infidel cant, all veneration men may pretend for what is written, that is palpably coupled with no corresponding veneration for the mystical life of the Son of God, in its historical form.

INSTITUTIONS. — On Sunday morning last, the Bishop of this Diocese instituted the Rev. Wm. B. Stevens, M. D., as Rector of St. Andrew's Church, Philadelphia. The sermon was preached by the Rev. T. M. Clark, late Rector, from the text 2 Cor. iv. 2. The Rev. Mr. Shannon was present, and assisted in the Holy Communion. In the evening a large number of the clergy, and an overflowing congregation, assembled at St. Andrew's to welcome the Rector to his new and important charge.

On Tuesday morning the Bishop instituted the Rev. Samuel A. Clark, as Rector of the Church of the Advent, Northern Liberties, Philadelphia. The service was read by the Rev. Thomas M. Clark, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. George H. Clark. It added greatly to the solemn interest of these holy services that three brothers, so by double ties, stood side by side as Heralds of the Cross. How good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell thus in unity! A number of the Clergy were present.

CHURCH OF THE CRUCIFIXION.—This interesting Missionary enterprise, intended to elevate the temporal and spiritual condition of the most destitute and wretched of our colored population, is going on successfully under its new Rector. A large Sunday school has been gathered, and the room where worship is held is filled. It can only be sustained by the help of the charitable, and a direct appeal will be made to their bounty in this behalf. The Rev. Mr. Shannon deserves, and we are sure will receive, aid and countenance in his self-denying and laborious work.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, PATERSON.—We insert the following letter with the earnest hope, that this strong and urgent demand upon the charity of the Church, will meet a hearty and liberal response. The calamity which left this parish without a Sanctuary, its noble efforts to repair the loss, and the wants of the surrounding population, all contribute to make out a case for the noblest exercise of Christian charity.

PATERSON, August 28th.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

Allow me thankfully to acknowledge the receipt of ten dollars, towards the rebuilding of St. Paul's church, Paterson, from S. B. B. I sincerely hope that the donation is only the first of many more. I am aware that you Churchmen of Philadelphia are so often called upon for charities, that your sensibility runs the risk of being somewhat blunted. But ours is really an unusual case. Did we only want to build a Church large enough to accommodate the present number of attendants, we might do so perhaps, without calling for assistance from abroad. Providence has however fixed our lot in the midst of a large manufacturing population, all of whom are poor, and a large number of whom have been baptized in, and are attached to the Church. As Christian men, we cannot let these perish. As Christian men, we cannot rest satisfied without at least making a strenuous effort, to bestow upon them the privileges of the gospel. And it is therefore not so much for our sakes, as for theirs, that we appeal to the sympathy of our more wealthy brethren. "He that hath pity upon the poor, lendeth to the Lord, and look, what he layeth out, it shall be paid him again."

Very respectfully,

J. ELLIS THOMPSON,
Rector of St. Paul's, Paterson.

CHURCH AT GLOUCESTER.—We insert with pleasure the following. It presents a strong case for the charitable. The building lot, we understand, was given on condition that a Church unencumbered with debt, should be erected within a given time.

Ladies' Fair.

A Fair will be held by the Ladies of the Church of the Ascension, Gloucester Point, on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of next week, for the purpose of aiding the building Committee of said Church, to finish the edifice just erected and enclosed that it may be prepared for public worship before the coming Winter. This enterprise, which was commenced the present year, deserves the patronage of all who desire the spiritual prosperity of that growing village. There is at present no Church in the place with the exception of a small Methodist house, which can scarcely accommodate one-fifth of the population of the town. The new parish has aimed at having a Church free from debt, and they hope by the aid and liberality of their fellow Christians of adjoining parishes, and in this city, to accomplish it. We are thankful that some enterprising and zealous ladies belonging to the several Churches in this city have kindly given their aid to the ladies of Gloucester to help them forward in their undertaking, and hope that many of our citizens will avail themselves of the present opportunity to combine innocent recreation and benevolence and throw a mite into their treasury. The Fair will be held on the afternoon and evening of Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, (12th, 13th, 14th,) from 2 P. M. until 9 in the evening, at the Church Building, corner of Ridgeway and Sussex streets. Boats run from the Walnut and Lombard street wharves, every half-hour. Fruits, flowers, refreshments, and fancy and useful articles, will be offered for sale, and in the evening a band of music will be in attendance.

P. S. Should the weather prove stormy the Fair will be postponed until the following week.

We have received the following notice from a clergyman of the Mission at Valle Crucis.

Several persons having inquired of me, while at the North, how they could send on small packages of wearing apparel to our Mission—I would be obliged to you, if you would mention in the Banner, that those at the North, having anything to send, can have them forwarded, by sending them to Mr. John H. Swift, 158 Water Street, N. Y., who has kindly offered to attend to them.

Persons at the South can send their parcels to the care of Bishop Ives, at Raleigh, N. C.

* * * The Churchman will oblige us, by copying the above notice.

REVEREND AND DEAR MR. EDITOR:—

I presume that no class of your readers would be more disposed to shrink from an unauthorized assumption of any of the functions of the sacred ministry, than those laymen, who are sometimes appointed by their Bishops to read the services of the Church to congregations deprived of the services of a pastor. It is a duty that can scarcely afford a temptation to any one to seek it for itself, and I fear that many would gladly avail themselves of any valid excuse for declining to discharge it.

With much respect for the opinions expressed in your editorial on the subject, I would venture to make one or two suggestions that occurred to my mind on reading it. The first is, that the very fact of the canon quoted being rather of a "restrictive" than of a "permissive" character, seems to place the practice on higher ground than if it had been otherwise, inasmuch as it indicates it as already existing and approved by the Church. I know nothing of its history, but it would certainly seem to rest on higher authority than this canon.

If, however, the Church has erred in this respect—if the practice of lay-reading be indeed an assumption of one of the exclusive "functions" of the ministry, contrary to the letter or the spirit of the "Preface" to the Ordinal—then indeed it would seem to be the part of those "in authority" to abolish it, and to put the question to rest at once.

But so long as it is sanctioned by the voice of her canons and the authority of her Bishops, we may lawfully consider the question of expediency. And here again, dear sir, bear with my reasons for a respectful dissent from your conclusions. If indeed all our congregations were as devoted in their adherence to the Church, and as enlightened in their faith, as your readers ought to be, they might perhaps be safely "left to their silent meditations," when deprived of the regular services of the sanctuary. But we know that the prediction of St. Paul is but too literally fulfilled at the present day, when many are so ready to "heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears"—we know that, left to themselves, they will "wander into strange pastures"—and we may well consider the question, whether it is better to provide them with lay-reading, or to leave them to provide themselves with lay-preaching and lay-sacraments?

So far from leading to indifference in securing the services of a "duly commissioned ministry," it may be questioned whether it is not the most effectual means of preventing that indifference, into which many are too prone to lapse, when left to the guidance of their own taste or fancy. "We are all aiming at the same thing." "They take the Bible for their guide as well as we." "It is but a difference of forms and ceremonies, after all." Why then should those who entertain such views make any extraordinary effort to obtain a minister of their own, when by uniting with others, they can at much less expense secure to themselves the privilege of hearing a "good, sound, Bible sermon" every Sunday?

But on the other hand, the truths kept before the mind by the constant use of the liturgy of our Church, and enforced by well-selected sermons, will at least serve to remind us of our need of the services of a minister. The administration of the sacraments, the visitation of the sick, the blessing attendant upon the faithful reception of the absolution and benediction (which those expect, who do not regard them as mere idle forms,) are privileges, the want of which will be felt severely enough to excite to every effort to obtain them.

Allow me to ask one or two questions further, for information. Do your objections, as I understand them, apply only to the reading of the services in a consecrated church? And if so, is it not better that a congregation should meet in a school-house, court-house, private parlour, "upper chamber"—any where, to unite in the prayers and praises of the Church, than to be left without them?

One more question, which each reader may answer for himself.—Do not all these things evince the necessity and propriety of carrying into effect the provisions of the canon in relation to the "new order of Deacons?"

VOX MERIDIONALIS.

We are quite willing to let the arguments of the above very courteous correspondent, have the full weight our readers may be disposed to attach to them. We are sorry to differ, in the least, from one who writes in such a spirit. Still we hold firmly, the more firmly the more we reflect on the matter, to the opinions already expressed.

We would be glad if any correspondent, more learned in such matters than we, could give the authority higher than the Canon of our General Convention by which the Church has ever sanctioned Lay ministrations, which include the offering of public prayer in the Consecrated Temple. We know not any. Our Editorials did not refer to services in places less solemn. The questions which we sought to answer, distinctly referred to the "consecrated Church."

The last question we prefer, as our correspondent suggests, each reader to "answer for himself."

THE TRUE USE OF THE OFFERTORY.—That was an evil day for the Church, when penny collections were introduced. Was it Whitfield, who ascribed it to "Alexander the Coppersmith?" If it were he, we may well apply what the Apostle said, he "hath done me much evil." The effect has been to create the impression, that the Offertory is for the reception of "small change." Doubtless, where it comes in, in proportion to the ability which God giveth, it is accepted of Him, and will secure His blessing. More frequently, it must be feared, it is got rid of in the cheapest way that decency permits; as David would not serve the Lord, with that which cost him nothing. An instance of the true use of the Offertory will be seen under the head of "Offerings of St. Mary's Church, Burlington." A parishioner, owning a lot of land in the city of Newark, gives the Deed for it, to the Bishop; to be conveyed and applied, as he shall judge best, for the interests of the Church. It is joyfully accepted, as the beginning of a return to the better days, when Christians, "having land," and other possessions, "sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the Apostles' feet: and distribution was made to every man, according as he had need." Why should it not be so? Why should not a house and lot, a farm, or a mill, be offered in the Offertory? Surely, the Church hath need of them. And, for the givers, is it not "more blessed to give, than to receive?"—Missionary.

Foreign Intelligence.

We are sorry to learn from private letters that Ireland, which has escaped the misery of civil war, is probably doomed to suffer the affliction of another famine. We are informed that there is good reason to fear this will be worse than the last dreadful one. The blight which has fallen upon the potatoe crop is more general. While thousands of poor deluded wretches have been spending the time, which should have been given to labor for the means of life, in training for murder and plotting the death and destruction of their fellow beings. How much have those to answer for, who have led on these poor creatures to this miserable end.

The result has shown that "the moral force" of the nation is on the side of order, peace, and submission to government.

Though sorely tempted, we have abstained from entering into this subject, so fully discussed in our secular prints, because we think that it is a crime to embroil this peaceful country in the wars and strifes of other lands. Those who have found a shelter, a home, a country in America, should not bring hither the discords and miseries from which they have escaped. The wish to embroil this country in the family quarrel between England and a part of Ireland comes not from any true American feeling. It is a wish, confined almost entirely, to those who come either immediately or directly from abroad, and who are still more of Foreigners than American citizens.

What we have to say is this. Large funds have been collected, and much of this money has been wrung from the poor but generous sons of toil. Now that there can be no use for Bishop Hughes' $500 "to buy a shield," nor of the $30,000 given to complete the armor, there seems to be doubt as to the object upon which to bestow this money. Why should there be doubt while millions of this people are threatened with starvation? It may be given for a more merciful purpose than that proposed by the peaceful Bishop! We shall see whether these men are influenced by a real and honest desire to alleviate the miseries of Ireland.

Next to Ireland the condition of Rome, is a topic of great interest. The following is from the English Churchman.

Letters from Rome of the 4th August represent matters as assuming daily a more unfavorable and cheerless position. The conduct of a large faction of designing rather than enthusiastic men, has placed the city in a state of considerable excitement, and has given rise to serious apprehensions. On the 1st August the chamber voted an address to the Pope, praying that instant measures might be taken for the protection of Italian independence, and stating that it was necessary instantly to enrol volunteers, raise supplies, and invite foreign aid. This address passed the upper house with slight opposition, and was presented by a deputation in the evening.

The following edict, which was torn down by the people, and not to be seen after 8 o'clock in the morning, appeared on the 3d:—

"The agitation which has seized upon the public mind in consequence of the different events which are taking place, requires us to make every effort to restore confidence, and with confidence, calmness. The Ministry, which had for a long time past tendered its resignation, has this day requested to be allowed finally to withdraw. As things could not remain in this position, we have summoned to Rome, Count Edward Fabbri, Pro-Legate of Urbino and Pesaro, who has already arrived, and who will take office in the new ministerial arrangement. These cares on our part ought to awaken confidence in the minds of all good people, which will be still further strengthened by the measures which the Government itself shall think fit to adopt. Meanwhile some complain that we have not made provision in consequence of the events which have occurred in the Ferrarese, and these complaints are uttered although we lost no time in making known our sentiments, which were published by our Cardinal Secretary of State and have been also repeated in Vienna. We have also said, and we repeat, that it is our will that the confines of our state be defended, and for this purpose we had authorized our late Ministry to make suitable arrangements.

"For the rest it is but too true, that in all times and under all governments extreme dangers are put to profit by the enemies of order and public tranquillity to disturb the minds and hearts of their fellow-citizens, whom we have always desired, and desire particularly at the present time, to see united and at peace with one another. Almighty God, however, guards and watches over Italy, over the states of the Church, and commits the immediate keeping of it to the Great Protectress of Rome, Mary, ever blessed, and to the Princes of the Apostles; and although more than one sacrilege has desolated the capital of the Catholic world, still our confidence does not fail that the prayers of the Church will rise before God, and bring down blessings to confirm the good, and to recal His enemies to justice and honor.

"Given at Rome, at St. Mary Major's, under the ring of the Fishermen, Aug. 2, 1848, the third year of our Pontificate.

"PIUS, P. P., IX."

This edict, however, and the subsequent choice of a new Ministry, appear to have produced more tranquillity; the Guards were dismissed from the Chigi Palace, and the agitators broke up their sitting.

The (London) Guardian gives the following Church intelligence.

In the House of Commons, on Monday week, Lord Ashley gave notice that he would, next session, move an address to the Crown, praying her Majesty to take immediate steps for the subdivision, quoad sacra, as soon as practicable, of all parishes in England and Wales the population of which exceeded 4,000 souls.

A bill has been introduced into the House of Commons for the regulation of the ecclesiastical affairs of Wolverhampton. Among the measures contemplated by the bill is the conversion of the district of St. Peter's into a rectory, of the value of 600*l.*, with a rectory house, and the repair of St. Peter's Church, which is in a state of dilapidation; the settlement of the patronage of St. Mary's, Bilston, upon the Bishop; and the constitution of the different districts into separate parishes.

An address has lately been forwarded by the Rev. F. Webber, Rural Dean, from the clergy of the deanery of Powder, to their diocesan the Bishop of Exeter, expressive of their deep sense of the important services rendered by his lordship to the Church on late occasions. It continues:—

"We have seen in your lordship an example of unceasing vigilance, and fearless determination to maintain inviolate the doctrines of Christ's Holy Church, her Apostolic constitution, and her Ordinances, through evil report and good report.

"We are the more desirous of expressing our admiration of that example, because there are in the present state of the civilized world warnings that convince us that such watchfulness and zeal are more than ever needed, in order that the precious deposit of the faith may be handed down to our posterity unimpaired, either by Romish error or latitudinarian innovation."

HISTORY OF THE JESUITS, from the Foundation of their Society to its suppression by Pope Clement XIV.; their Mission throughout the world; their Educational system and literature, with their revival and present state. By Andrew Steinmetz, Author of "The Novitiate," "The Jesuit in the Family." In two volumes. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard. 1848.

We are not prepared to express an opinion, at present, of this work, not having had time to examine it with sufficient care. We can only speak of it as a very well printed and handsome book, in two volumes, each containing about 470 pages. The subject is an interesting and important one, and the author speaks of it, in his Preface, as "a book of facts. The Jesuits themselves, Catholic (Roman we suppose) historians, and Protestant writers, the most impartial, furnish the ground work."

These memorials contain some of the very best letters of this very best of letter writers. They reveal more of the heart and mind of Charles Lamb than anything before published. We have here, in Lamb's own words, the narrative of that awful and dark event which shaded the whole life of this gentle being. We have also criticisms upon himself and upon his contemporaries, all in fact that could not be published while any lived who could be affected by these revelations.

We have also received THE ORPHAN NIECE, a Novel, by Miss Ellen Pickering. Three volumes complete in one. T. B. Peterson, No. 98 Chestnut street, Philadelphia.

Obituary.

DIED suddenly, of hemorrhage from the lungs, on Saturday morning August 19th, at Shocco Springs, Miss ELEANOR E. BOYLAN, elder daughter of William Boylan, Esq., of this city, in the 38th year of her age.

Miss Boylan had a slight hemorrhage from her lungs a few weeks before leaving home, and her health appeared declining. Her anxious father hoped to restore her by travelling, and accordingly made his arrangements to take her to the various medicinal springs in this State and Virginia, during the summer, and before the approach of winter to the milder climate of New Orleans, where he proposed to remain with his daughters till the return of warm weather at home. Shocco being the nearest watering place, the first visit was there, and there her journeying and her life were closed. Many of her friends from Raleigh were in the daily practice of visiting her and conversing with her freely of the state of her health, and to them she constantly averred, that she knew the time of her departure was at hand. "My constant employment," she would say, "is to fit myself for the great change that awaits me." "A preparation for eternity is my sole business now, and I think of none other. I am at perfect peace with all the world, and am waiting the summons of my Maker, to leave this state of trial."

She was for many years a member of Christ church, Raleigh, and died as she had lived devotedly attached to it.

She has left a large circle of sincere friends to mourn her departure from among them, and many affectionate relatives, among whom an aged and excellent father, and a sorrowing sister, who has been to her as a daughter, having lost her mother early. The shock to this devoted sister was for a time overwhelming, and her soul refused to be comforted. May He who in wisdom has seen fit to chasten, comfort her stricken heart, and fit her for a blessed re-union with the beloved departed one, in a world of Happiness.

"Sister, thou hast gone before us,
And thy sainted soul is flown,
Where tears are wiped from every eye,
And sorrow is unknown:
From the burden of the flesh,
And from fears and cares released,
Where the wicked cease from troubling,
And the weary are at rest.

"Sin can never taint thee now,
Nor can death thy soul assail,
Nor thy firm trust in Jesus Christ,
And the Holy Spirit, fail.
But thy spirit, sister, soars,
Far among the faithful blest,
Where the wicked cease from troubling,
And the weary are at rest.

Raleigh, N. C., August 27th, 1848.

A FRIEND.

For the Banner of the Cross.

Departed this life on Monday morning the 21st day of August, in Livingston, Ala., in the 31st year of her age, Mrs. ANNE F. GIBBS, consort of Dr. R. T. Gibbs, late U. S. Army, and daughter of Colonel George and Margaret A. Thorn, of Culpeper county, Virginia. The deceased had but a few weeks been greeted with the happy return of her husband, after an absence of sixteen months in Mexico, when the invincible hand of death visited upon her family this sudden and severe affliction, leaving a devoted and affectionate husband, and three orphan daughters to mourn her loss, and embalm on the memory of all who knew her, for her piety and many Christian virtues. For many years she had been a communicant of the P. E. Church, and has only exchanged this earthly tenement of clay for a crown of eternal glory.

Massachusetts.—CONSECRATION.—The church erected for the use of the parish of the Church of the Messiah, Boston, was consecrated to the service and worship of Almighty God, according to the rites and usages of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Eastburn, on Tuesday morning last. The Bishop and Clergy met at the residence of Mr. Clark, on Florence street, and went in procession to the church, where they were received by the wardens and vestrymen, and proceeding up the centre aisle, repeated, responsively, the 24th Psalm. After the Bishop had taken his seat in the chancel, the request for consecration was handed to him by Francis Bullard, Esq., senior warden, and read by the Rev. George M. Randall, rector of the parish, and the sentence of consecration was read by the Rev. T. R. Lambert. Morning prayer was said by the Rev. Moses B. Chase, assisted by the Rev. Theodore W. Snow, who read the lessons.

The ante-communion service was said by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Wayland, who read the Epistle. The Psalms in Metre were given out by the rector.

The Bishop preached an excellent and very appropriate sermon, on Ps. xc. 17: "Establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it."

There was a very large and attentive congregation. The music was excellent, and all the services were deeply interesting, and we hope will prove truly profitable.

This church stands on Florence street, between Washington street and Harrison Avenue, and is built in the early English style of church architecture. It consists of a nave, with side aisles and a chancel. The exterior is of brick, with dressings of Newark stone, and the front is faced entirely with stone. The walls, columns, and arches of the interior are finished in imitation of stone. The roof is open to the ridge, showing the beams. The church is fitted, with one hundred and thirty-eight open seats, which will accommodate seven hundred persons. The organ gallery occupies the north end of the nave, and is approached by a stairway, in the eastern aisle entrance. The seats, chancel rail, gallery front and roof timbers, are of pine, and stained with asphaltum and varnished. The Pulpit and Reading Desk stand without the chancel on either side of the centre aisle, and are of the same material. The chancel is lighted by a triplet window of stained glass with appropriate emblems; the windows of the church are of tinted glass, with gold-colored borders. On the right side of the chancel, a door opens from the nave, into the vestry-room.

The building, exclusive of the buttresses, covers an area of sixty by ninety-four feet. The side walls are seventeen feet in height; from the main floor, the walls between the nave and aisles are twenty-three feet, and the whole height, to the apex of the roof, inside, is forty-seven feet.

The front gable terminates with a stone cross, and another, of smaller dimensions, is placed upon the chancel.

This church has been built, according to plans, by Mr. J. E. Billings, an architect of this city, who has superintended its erection. It is a work which does Mr. Billings great credit, and affords pleasing promise of talents, which, we trust, will soon place him in the very first rank of his profession.

The Holy Table is covered with rich scarlet damask, hanging in folds, with an inscription and a cross gilt on the front.

As our design is to describe rather than praise, we will only say, that the church, the chancel, and its furniture, have all been spoken of, in flattering terms, by those in whose judgment of such matters, we can confide. The great excellence of the architecture of this structure lies in the simplicity which is carried out in every part, so that the unity of the design is unbroken;—a strict adherence to architectural proportions in the outline and in the detail, and the absence of any prominent fault.

This edifice has been erected of a durable material, in true church style, and sufficiently large to accommodate seven hundred persons for less than fourteen thousand dollars, the whole cost including the land, being about twenty-five thousand dollars. This sum, it gives us heartfelt pleasure to say, was raised and paid before the church was consecrated. In accomplishing such a work, the parish are under great obligations to several laymen of this city, who in the most noble and praise-worthy manner, have by their pious liberality proved themselves alike the friends of this parish, and the followers of Him, who hath said, that "it is more blessed to give than to receive." The members of this parish owe these friends and brethren a debt of gratitude which they can never pay. That God may abundantly bless them, with his choicest favors, will, we trust, be the prayer of many, who shall worship within the walls which they have so essentially aided in erecting. We hope the example of a church without debt,—built of a durable material,—in strict accordance with the principles of Ecclesiastical architecture,—of large dimensions and at a small cost, will be followed by parishes which may have occasion to build places of worship.—Christian Witness.

Connecticut.—The Rev. WILLIAM PAYNE, Assistant Professor of Languages in Trinity College, has accepted an unanimous election to be Rector of St. George's, Schenectady, in the diocese of New York.

The Clergy of Connecticut are, by the blessing of God, a band of brothers; but few losses to our fraternity would be more generally felt to be a loss to the diocese than that which we thus announce. Since his admission to Holy Orders, Mr. Payne has served the Church in Connecticut in many situations of importance; as a parish priest; as the Editor of this paper; as a missionary; as a professor in Trinity College; and as the Secretary of several successive Diocesan Conventions. We can ill afford to miss, in future, his fraternal society, and valuable aid. Our prayers and affectionate wishes for his happiness follow him to his new sphere of labor; and we congratulate the people of St. George's on the accession to their rectorship of a gentleman whose career, in the several important posts which he has heretofore occupied, have been uniformly marked by two distinguished characteristics—fidelity and success.—Calendar.

New Jersey.—On Tuesday, August 22, the Bishop laid the Corner stone of St. Paul's Church, South Trenton. The Address was delivered by the Rev. Samuel Starr, Rector of St. Michael's Church, Trenton. The Rev. Andrew Bell Patterson was present.—Missionary.

Maryland.—CONVOCAION AND VISITATION.—The combination of the Visitation of the Bishop, and meeting of the Convocation of the Clergy of Kent and Queen Anne counties, occurred in St. Paul's Parish, Kent county, on Wednesday, August 23d, and Thursday, the Feast of St. Bartholomew. On Wednesday, in the parish church, Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Henry Brown, of St. Paul's Parish, Queen Anne county, and the Lessons read by the Rev. Dr. Jones, of Chester Parish, Kent county. The Bishop read the ante-Communion service, preached, and confirmed four persons.

On Thursday morning, the Rev. Mr. Brown said Morning Prayer, the Rev. Dr. Jones preached, and the Bishop administered the Holy Communion, assisted in parts of the service and in the distribution by the Rector. In the afternoon, the Rev.

Dr. Jones said Evening Prayer, the Rev. Mr. Owen preached, and the Bishop concluded the services of the Convocation with an appropriate address and Collects, and the Benediction.

On Friday night, the Bishop said Evening Prayers and preached in Chester Church.

On Sunday, the Tenth after Trinity, in the morning, the Bishop was in attendance at Shrewsbury Parish Church. The Rev. Mr. Owen said Morning Prayer, baptism being administered to an infant by the Bishop after the Second Lesson. The Bishop read the Ante-Communion, (Mr. Owen reading the Epistle,) preached, and administered the Lord's Supper, assisted in part of the service by Mr. Owen.

In the afternoon, in the Chapel at Massey's Cross Roads, in the same parish, Mr. Owen said Evening Prayers, the Bishop baptized three children, preached, and confirmed five persons.

Very large congregations were in attendance at both the services in this parish. At both, notice was given of a meeting of the parishioners to be holden on the next Friday, for the purpose of devising ways and means to discharge the debt remaining on the Chapel. This, it is confidently hoped, will result in the accomplishment of that most desirable end. It is understood that the measure will soon be followed up by a division of this large parish, and the consequent engagement of another laborer in the field, and restoration of regular weekly services to two more of the congregations of the diocese.

On Monday morning, in Chester Parish Church, the Rev. Mr. Owen said Morning Prayer to the end of the Lessons. The Bishop then administered Baptism to five children; after which the Rev. Dr. Jones concluded Morning Prayer. After a Psalm, Baptism was again administered by the Bishop to an infant that had been brought to the church too late for the first administration. The 87th Hymn, and some Collects, and the Blessing, concluded the services of the day and of the Visitation.—Church Times abridged.

Virginia.—EPISCOPAL SERVICES BY BISHOP JOHNS.—Confirmations.—July 23, Winchester 10: 27, Wickliffe Parish, St. John's Church, 10: 29, Zion's Church, Charlestown, 3: 30, Trinity Church, Shepherdstown, 4: 31, Trinity Church, Martinsburg, 3. August 2, Calvary Church, Back Creek Valley, 1: 19, Middleburg, 5: 22, Shelburne Parish, Leesburg, 1.

In addition to these services Bishop Johns spent the 17th and part of the 18th of August at Zion Church, Fairfax Court House. Several of the Clergy were present at the services, and also in Middleburg and Upperville, where Bishop Johns, in company with Bishop Meade, spent Sunday, the 20th of August.

It is expected that the Church in Charlestown, Jefferson co., will be consecrated on Thursday, September 14th. A number of the Clergy, we learn, will be present.

Ohio.—ORDINATION AND CONFIRMATION.—On Sunday, the 20th inst., the Rt. Rev. Charles P. Mellvaine, D.D., held an ordination in Trinity Church, Columbus, and admitted to the Order of Deacons, Mr. Andrew D. Benedict and Mr. Hiram N. Bishop, members of the late Senior Class in the Theological Seminary of the Diocese. Morning Prayer was read by Rev. Dr. Brooke. The Sermon was preached by the Bishop; and the candidates were presented by Rev. Prof. Smith, of Gambier. The Bishop administered the Communion, assisted by Rev. Dr. Brooke and Prof. Smith.

On the previous evening, the Bishop confirmed eleven persons in Trinity Church; and on Sunday afternoon, three persons in St. Paul's Church.

Bishop Mellvaine has displaced from the ministry the Rev. Lester Janes, Deacon, for causes not affecting his moral character.

Mr. Janes was received from the Methodist ministry and ordained in Pennsylvania a short time since. From that diocese he was transferred last winter to Ohio. After a few weeks in the west he returned to the east and to the ministry whence he came out.—Western Episcopalian.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—The Rev. Thomas S. Preston has removed from the Church of the Annunciation, New York, and has become the Minister of the Church of the Holy Innocents, near West Point.

The Rev. Edward F. Edwards requests that all letters and papers designed for him may be directed to him at Jersey City, N. J.

The Rev. Orsamus H. Smith has removed from Port Jackson, and taken charge of the Missionary station of North Salem, West Chester county, and Patterson, Putnam county, N. Y.

The Rev. Edmund Embury, having resigned the charge of Emmanuel Church, New York, and accepted a call to New Windsor, Orange co., N. Y., requests that letters and papers may be directed accordingly.

The Rev. Rufus D. Stearns, Deacon, has taken temporary charge of Christ Church, Sacket's Harbor, Jefferson co., Western New York, and requests all letters and papers for him to be directed accordingly.

The Rev. Alfred Holmead has taken Letters dimissory from Maryland, to the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Virginia.

The Rev. Milo Mahan, of the diocese of New York, has received and accepted an invitation to assume the charge of Ascension Parish, Carroll co., Maryland.

DESCRIPTION OF AN EDITOR.—In the estimation of almost everybody who imagines himself somebody, while everybody else knows he is nobody, an editor is supposed to be an automaton, to do, and write, and say what everybody else except what he himself thinks proper. In short, he is expected to be everybody's body, and in trying to please everybody who wants to be somebody, he is sure to please hardly anybody, except the individual nobody who thinks himself somebody. In order to satisfy everybody, therefore, he ought to be like the people who are most likely to criticise his labors—which nobody understands better than himself—nobody. Having no ambition to imitate the man with the ass, whose story is recorded in the fable, we have resolved hereafter to say in regard to the contents of our paper "whatever is, is right."—*Chris. Shelby College, Shelbyville, Ky.

This Institution, which has just closed a prosperous session, is located on the McAdams road between Louisville and Frankfort, in one of the most desirable and healthful regions of the West. It is under the control and patronage of the Diocese of Kentucky. Arrangements have recently been made for the completion of extensive additions to the present College buildings, for the accommodation of students, and for the erection of an Astronomical Observatory. Every facility will be furnished for the thorough instruction of youth in this Institution, and due diligence will be required of every class of its pupils in the prosecution of their respective studies. Those who have the control of Shelby College are resolved that it shall contribute its full share in forming and perpetuating an elevated standard of collegiate discipline and scholarship. The President will receive the sons of members of the Church in his family, and give special attention to their religious and moral, as well as to their literary education.

Strict attention will be given to the training of the pupils of this Institution in the various branches of English education, as well as to classical and scientific instruction. Candidates for the ministry and sons of clergymen will receive the benefits of the College gratuitously.

FACULTY.

REV. WM. J. WALLER, M. D., President, and Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy, and Natural Science.

W. W. THEOBALD, A. M., Professor of Ancient and Modern Languages.

JOSEPH WINLOCK, A. M., Professor of Mathematics and Mechanical Philosophy.

PRINCIPAL OF THE PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT.

An able and efficient officer will be engaged for this department before the beginning of the next session. The ensuing session will commence on the first Wednesday of September next.

There is already belonging to the College one of the most extensive and most judiciously selected Theological Libraries west of the mountains, which will be gradually enlarged. And as it is the design of the Faculty and Trustees, that the exact and natural sciences shall be thoroughly studied by its pupils, the institution has been furnished with an elegant Chemical and Philosophical Apparatus, as well as an extensive assortment of the best text books in these departments.

ANNUAL CHARGES.

For instruction in the Classics and the Sciences, per session of 10 months,	$40 00
Modern Languages—French, German, Italian or Spanish, each	20 00
English Studies, in the Preparatory Department,	25 to 30
Board, Fuel, Washing, &c., for a session of 10 months,	110 00
Fuel, and Servant's hire for Public Rooms,	3 50
Music and Drawing, if desired,	15 00

The expenditures of all the boys who may become members of the President's family, will be exclusively controlled by him. This rule is absolutely necessary, and will be insisted on in every case. Its firm, but mild enforcement, is found to operate, so as to effectually prevent the vexatious consequences which never fail to attend youthful extravagance and folly.

Those who may desire further information, may obtain it by addressing the subscriber, Shelbyville, Ky.

Academy of the Protestant Episcopal Church,

341 Market Street.

The Autumnal Session will begin on Friday, September 1.

An addition having been made to the number of the Teachers, the schools, of which the Academy consists, (from one to another of which the pupils pass every forty minutes,) will be increased after the present vacation to six. The whole, as heretofore, will be superintended daily by the Principal, and from time to time by the Bishop of the Diocese and a monthly Committee appointed for the purpose by the Board of Trustees. Circulars may be had at the Bookstore of Messrs. E. C. & J. Biddle, S. W. corner of 5th and Minor sts., and after the present month, of the Janitor at the Academy.

G. EMLEN HARE, Principal.

Extracts from Bishop Potter's Annual Addresses to the Convention of the Diocese.

To the Convention of 1846.—"It gives me great pleasure to inform the Convention that some important measures have been adopted during the last year, towards securing to our youth the advantages of superior classical instruction, in connection with proper religious training. The classical department of the Protestant Episcopal Academy, which was established in this city more than fifty years since, through the agency of Bishop White and others, has been re-opened under the auspices of the Rev. Dr. Hare, and will afford to parents in this vicinity the means of educating boys in the most approved manner. Its funds have enabled the Trustees to make liberal provision for the sons of Clergymen, and others, on whom the charges of instruction would fall heavily, and it is hoped that the Academy will prove rich in blessing to many families."

To the Convention of 1847.—"I had occasion in my last address to call the attention of the Diocese to the provisions, which had just been made, to secure to the sons of churchmen a superior classical training, in connection with proper religious culture. The Episcopal Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, had then just been opened. The anticipations entertained of its usefulness have been more than realized. Its numbers have increased beyond expectation, and its discipline and course of instruction are worthy of all praise. In its influence generally, and especially in its care of the ministers, morals and religious principles of the young, it vindicates its claims to the confidence of all the members of our Church; and having occasion frequently myself to visit the school, I feel the greater assurance in recommending it to general favor."

To the Convention of 1848.—"The Academy in this city, under the care of the Rev. Dr. Hare, has had a career, thus far, of great and uninterrupted prosperity; and it is exerting an influence on the principles and character of our children which will be felt for good long after our own earthly course has terminated. It now numbers nearly one hundred pupils."

History of the original and Ogilby, Editor.]
Tioga County, Pa.

PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1848.

[Vol. X.—No. 37.—Whole No. 507.]

The History of the Church in the various dioceses is a subject which is daily increasing in interest. And as we look back with earnest solicitude, making the most diligent research for every thing that will in the least throw light upon the labors of the early missionaries, their success, their discouragements, their failures, that we may learn to be patient while engaged in the work of the Lord; that we may become sensibly alive to the great goodness of God in enlarging and strengthening his fold; and while we bestow our sympathy upon the missionary whose remains have long since mouldered in the dust: while we cherish his memory as a part of the Church's rich inheritance; may the self-denying laborers, who year after year toil on in faith and poverty, surrounded by worldliness, fanaticism and error, may they be cheered and inspired to engage with renewed earnestness in the work before them, when they perceive that they will not be forgotten, and that the next generation will rise up to "bear their burdens."

That the history of the Church may be accurately written fifty or a hundred years hence, parish Records must be preserved with fidelity; and what would add materially to the interest of mere annals, a general review ought to be recorded every ten years respecting the progress, results, and condition of the Parish.

To this work I now give myself, and shall endeavor to be as brief as the facts and circumstances will admit; and as our mutual profit may seem to demand from the consideration of the past.

Ten years ago, my brethern, this village was destitute of a place of worship; and the people of any description of Gospel ministrations. Such a state of things led to the discussion in the street, and in one or two families, of the importance of procuring a minister, which resulted in the calling of a public meeting. At this meeting the condition in which they were placed was freely discussed, and when the question was raised to whom they should apply for a minister, opinions were found to be balanced between the Presbyterians and Episcopalians; to the latter a preference was decidedly given; and steps were immediately taken to obtain a clergyman.

James Lowrey and Joshua Sweet, Esqrs., were appointed a committee to carry out the wishes of the meeting.

Being ignorant of our diocesan boundaries, the first application, was made to the Rev. Richard Smith, then officiating at Elmira, who informed Mr. Sweet that they were not in the diocese in which he resided, and that they must apply to Bishop Onderdonk of Philadelphia. Accordingly he wrote to him. In this letter he

From the Church of England Magazine.

John Kyrle, Esq., "The Man of Ross."

A benevolent mind cannot find a more agreeable object of contemplation than the character of a man whose life is spent in acts of public and private good, done without any view to worldly advantage or to fame. Foreigners, who visit our country to study the character of its inhabitants, are struck with nothing so much as with the vast quantity of money, labour, and time, which are voluntarily bestowed on works of public charity and utility, by persons who reap no other advantage from thus contributing to the good of others than the consciousness of discharging a high Christian, or moral, or social duty. It may be a question, whether the frequency of such examples has not led to their being overlooked amongst ourselves, and to their real merit not being duly estimated. Be that as it may, we feel no hesitation in asserting that there have been, and are in every county, and in almost every parish of this our noble country, persons freely devoting the leisure, the substance, and the talents with which their Creator has blessed them, to the good of others, who can make no return for the advantages so imparted to them.

The "Man of Ross" has been immortalized by our great poet, Pope; but the lines which record his praise do not communicate enough. They are a sort of a riddle, enumerating works great and expensive, which they conclude by informing us were all executed with an income of five hundred pounds a-year. A reader, who should seek to understand the merits of the Man of Ross by Pope's praise, would be apt, when he arrived at the end, to "give up." We propose, therefore, to present a solution of the puzzle. If more ample information be desired, it may be found in Mr. Fosbrooke's elegant and entertaining volume, the "Ariconia," which is our authority for many of the following details.

John Kyrle was descended from a highly respectable family, and was born in the parish of Dymock, in Gloucestershire, on his father's estate. His grandfather married a sister of Waller, the poet, whose mother was sister of John Hampden. He was a gentleman-commoner of Baliol college, Oxford, to which he presented a handsome silver tankard on his admission. His father had purchased a house and a few pieces of land at Ross; and here Mr. Kyrle chose to reside, adding to his property by repeated purchases, made after his fallages in Dymock Wood.

* Extract from "Chronicles of the Seasons."

The title of "The Man of Ross" was given to him by a country poet, and, in his life-time; and Mr. Kyrle was highly pleased to receive the appellation, because it "conveyed a notion of plain dealing, and unaffected hospitality." The principal addition to his landed property was an estate, called the Cleve, consisting of fields that extend along the left bank of the river, but considerably above its level. Along the skirts of these fields Mr. Kyrle made a public walk, which still bears his name; he planted it with elms, and continued the plantation steep sides of the bank, which overhang the graceful winding Wye. It is to this plantation that Pope alludes and, in a bold license when he gave the title to the Cleveland bank, or conceived that the hill of Penyard, which forms a remarkable back-landscapes, was part of Mr. Kyrle's property, never was.

"hung with woods the mountain's sultry brow;"

His income has been pretty accurately stated at 500l. His favourite occupations were building and planting; his skill and taste were as freely exerted for the benefit of his own improvements: he frequently planned and superintended architectural works for persons who gladly availed themselves of his skill and taste.

In improving his own property, he added to the beauties of the spot, and freely imparted to his townsmen the benefit of the first which he had provided for the enjoyment of the Church. A garden was planted with elms by Kyrle; and a gate by him leading to a field, called "The Prospect," commanding a noble view of the rich scenery of the times when the art of conveying water by pipes, for the accommodation of all the dwellers in a town, was yet in its infancy, was conferred on the inhabitants of Ross and enterprise of Mr. Kyrle, who made in this field of considerable extent, lined it with brick, and in the stone, and caused the water to be forced into it from the river, and conveyed by under-ground pipes to the streets. When a more effectual mode of introducing the use of the fountain was abandoned, the water was filled up.

The work is recorded by the poet in the lines—
"On the dry rock who bade the waters flow—
Esq. On to the skies, in useless columns tost;
Under the sin proud falls magnificently lost;

But clear and artless, pouring through the plain
Health to the sick, and solace to the swain."

The next work noticed by Pope is a causeway, which was constructed through the exertions of Mr. Kyrle, and paid for by a subscription, to which he largely contributed. It crossed the low ground between the town and the bridge, on the high road to Hereford and Monmouth. This causeway has been since extended, and rendered permanent by the commissioners of turnpikes, who have converted it into a spacious driving way, better adapted to the more frequent and rapid journeyings of modern times.

The walk in the Cleve-fields above alluded to was not only beautified with the elm, his favourite tree, but seats were placed at intervals, where the "weary traveller" might "repose," or the lover of fine scenery contemplate at his ease the beauties before him. To his work of planting or ornamenting, the "Man of Ross" was wont to go forth, with his spade on his shoulder, and a wooden bottle of liquor in his hand, assisted by two or three, or sometimes more workmen, according to the task to be performed. The bottle served his fellow-labourers as well as himself. On one occasion, his companion so thoroughly enjoyed the draught, that he did not part with the bottle from his head till the last drop was drained. In vain did the Man of Ross call aloud to him to stop his draught: the workman's thirst was too intense to listen. When he had done, Mr. Kyrle said: "John, why did not you stop when I called to you?" "Why, sir," said the man, "don't you know that people can never hear when they are drinking?" The next time Mr. Kyrle applied the bottle to his head, the man placed himself opposite to him, and opened his mouth as if bawling aloud, till Kyrle had finished. The draught ended, Kyrle asked, "Well John, what did you say?" "Ah, you see, sir," said the man, "I was right: nobody can hear when he is drinking."

The passage which relates to the church of Ross is calculated to convey an erroneous notion of what was actually done by Mr. Kyrle. The line

"Who taught that heaven-directed spire to rise," coupled with another,

Who builds a church to God, and not to fame," has led many to suppose that the church of Ross was built by Kyrle. The facts are as follows:

The elegant spire which ornaments the landscape, from what ever point it be viewed, was at one time in a dangerous state, which Mr. Kyrle's knowledge of architecture led him to discover. A parish meeting was convened at his special motion, and about forty-seven feet of the spire taken down and rebuilt, himself daily inspecting the work, and contributing, over and above the assessment, toward its speedy conclusion. The great bell was given by Kyrle, who attended when it was cast at Gloucester, and threw into the melting-pot his own large silver tankard, having first drunk his own favourite toast of "church and king."

"Behold the market-house, with poor o'erspread:
The man of Ross divides the weekly bread."

The distribution of the "weekly bread" at the market-house is a circumstance of peculiar interest in the life of Kyrle. The donation of bread was furnished by a grant, renewed by successive lords of the manor, of certain tolls on all corn brought to market. The man of Ross acted as the lord's almoner. Tradition reports, in homely language, that "it would have done one's heart good to see how cheerful the old gentleman looked while engaged in the distribution." At length the toll, thus voluntarily transferred to the poor at the will of each succeeding lord, was claimed by the townsmen as their's of right. The question was referred to the Man of Ross by consent of both parties; and he, preferring truth and justice before popularity and self-gratification, determined, as the evidence compelled him to do, that the toll belonged to the lord. So are pride and covetousness found in communities as well as individuals. Unwilling to acknowledge an obligation, lest they should be compelled to own a superiority in the giver, they endanger or lose the benefits which benevolence and liberality would bountifully bestow.

The remaining lines refer to various private acts of charity, for which a man of Kyrle's noble disposition would find frequent opportunities in whatever part of the world he might be placed. The town of Ross could tell of many who, before and since his time, and at this day, clothe the naked, feed the hungry, instruct the ignorant, and teach the infant's tongue to praise the name of the Creator and Redeemer; and so we hope can every town and every village in our native land; but such Christian love seeks not its own praise.

There is, however, one anecdote of Mr. Kyrle, which we are unwilling to omit, as it exhibits that noble confidence, which none but an honest man can feel or express towards his fellow-man. About a year after the death of the Man of Ross, a tradesman of the town came to his executor, and said privately to him, "Sir, I am come to pay you some money that I owed to the late Mr. Kyrle." The executor declared he could find no entry of it in the accounts. "Why, sir," said the tradesman, "that I am aware of. Mr. Kyrle said to me, when he lent me the money, that he did not think I should be able to repay it in his life-time, and that it was likely you might want it before I could make it up; and so, said he, I won't have any memorandum of it besides what I write and give you with it; and do you pay my kinsman when you can, and, when you show him this paper, he will see that the money is right, and that he is not to take interest."

The Man of Ross died a bachelor. At the time of his decease he owed nothing, and there was no money in his house. He was borne to the grave by his workmen and usual attendants, and amidst the whole population of Ross.

The spot of his interment was, by his express desire, at the feet of his dear friend, Dr. Charles Whiting, a former vicar, a man of genuine piety and Christian benevolence, who died in 1711, and whose epitaph modestly records him as "the affectionate but unworthy pastor of this church." It is supposed that this excellent and amiable man was greatly instrumental in forming the character of the Man of Ross. To Dr. Whiting the town is indebted for the establishment of an excellent blue-coat school in 1709. Mr. Kyrle was not only an annual subscriber to that institution, but, when boys were to be apprenticed, he was generally concerned, and often put them out at his own expense. He left 40l. to the school. Several of his own workmen were legatees in his will.

The personal appearance of Mr. Kyrle was agreeable: his dress, a plain suit of brown ditto, with a king William's wig, according to the fashion of the day. Though he disliked large parties, his house was open to the reception of his friends, in the genuine spirit of old-fashioned English hospitality. "He loved a long evening, enjoyed a merry tale, and always appeared discomposed when 'was time to part.'" His dishes were generally plain: malt liquor and cider were the only beverages introduced: there were no roast beef except on Christmas-day. At his kitchen fire-place was a large block of wood for poor people to sit on; and a piece of boiled beef and three pecks of flour, in bread, were given to the poor every Sunday. The Man of Ross was a daily attendant at the service of the parish church. When the chiming of the bells began, all business ceased with him, he washed his hands and proceeded to his pew. When the church was newly pewed about twenty years after his death, the rector and parishioners resolved that Mr.

Kyle's seat should remain, as it does at this day, in its original condition and style. A handsome tablet, with a bust of the Man of Ross, has long since removed the stigma imputed in the concluding lines of Pope's eulogy of Kyle.

The Man of Ross then, it has been seen, was a private gentleman of small fortune, with a talent for architecture, and a taste for what is now termed the picturesque, which he employed in the improvement and adorning of his town and neighbourhood. Simple in his manners, he lavished no money on gaudy show or equipage. Faithful to his God, and upright in his dealings with man, intelligent, active, and ingenious, he was confided in as a friend, as an umpire, as a receiver and a disposer of the subscriptions of others, whether to be employed in works for the public good, or in relieving the wants of indigence and age.

St. Mary's Hall and its Founder.

MR. EDITOR:—

The writer has been drawn towards the train of thought, expressed in his article on the "influence of Pagan and Christian education,"* in consequence of a recent visit to the Literary Institutions of the Rt. Rev. Bishop Doane, at Burlington, New Jersey. The solemn feelings that were stirred within his breast by this visit to the Hall of St. Mary's, and its beautiful Chapel, at the noon-day prayers, were profoundly increased, after reading the lines appended to this article: and which were presented to him by a young lady, his companion on that occasion. The truth, and felicity of this graphic sketch, will be acknowledged and felt by every one, who has sat in that Chapel, and yielded to its holy and inspiring meditations.

The writer could not, afterwards, but contrast in his own mind, the vast advantage of the Christian over the Pagan world in all that concerns the training and education of children, for the highest and most important purposes of society. If the best condition of the world be that, in which its people are most virtuous, it will not be disputed, that the system which contributes best, and most extensively to this great object, is the one deserving of greatest favor, and general encouragement. It is not enough for the happiness of man, as has been shown: that he should excel in genius—in literature—in arts—in the refinements of life—for in all these, the Heathen was transcendently great; but that he should also feel that there was something better than all this, in the certain hope of immortality, and a purer and sweeter existence beyond the grave—a place of rest, even in this world, for the weary and heavy laden, when crushed by misery—a place, where man might seek refuge from himself when sated with the joys of earth—its sensual delights—its agitating tumults—over which the appetite of the keenest must pall with time—and which drew from the wisest of mankind the exclamation: "vanity of vanities, all is vanity."

Is this to be found any where out of the teaching of the Christian religion? Can the heart be opened to charity, the first great law of peace, and social security, or the soul be elevated, and borne beyond earth to look from "Nature up to nature's God," and to feel the mighty sacrifice of the redemption, by any other system than is to be found in HOLY SCRIPTURE? And if this be so, what an awful responsibility lies upon the consciences of parents; as well as upon those who undertake the instruction and training up of youth to seek for, and select that system, which engrains learning upon religion, (rather than to keep religion as a thing apart,) so that it may grow with their growth, and strengthen with their strength. The experience of all social conditions, is in favor of early and steady moral education, the advance and the improvement must be upwards, and not downwards. It is necessary to begin with children, and not with men, if you would have men good.

"Habits are stubborn things,
And by the time a man is turned of forty:
His ruling passions grow so very haughty,
There is no clipping of his wings."

The writer believes that this system is adopted and practised at St. Mary's Hall, and therefore he admires and praises, and would commend it to the notice of all reflecting and considerate parents. If he refer not particularly to the College, it is not because he undervalues that Institution—very far from it, for the system there is similar: but because he deems that the least valuable of the two—though in saying so, he may perhaps offend the superior intelligence of many. His reason for dwelling with more point and interest on the Hall is, that Colleges and Seminaries of learning abound for boys, while for the other sex they are comparatively few, at least good ones, while the larger number and most favored of them are managed with a view to the mere graces, and superficial accomplishments of fashionable life, rather than to those solid and enduring acquirements, that are to fix the dignity of woman, and place her on a high moral elevation.

In this regard St. Mary's Hall merits unbounded confidence, while at the same time it possesses, if he may so express it, extraordinary intrinsic advantages. Its seclusion in a quiet town, secures it from all the allurements that would accrue, were it in the precincts of a large and opulent city, the exciting atmosphere of which would insinuate itself, in spite of all precautions, and produce an unhealthy moral influence. The location is agreeable and salubrious, on the right bank of the Delaware, a noble and expansive river—and the eye of the traveller as he ascends is arrested by the most pleasing view of the Bishop's mansion—the simple, yet beautiful Chapel—and the Hall itself, all stretching in near succession before him, while the richly carpeted lawn is sprinkled here and there with the modest and lovely daughters of the land, watched over, not by envious and suspicious, but by maternal and gentle guardians. The combination of natural beauty in front, with extensive walks and gardens in the rear, have been chosen and arranged with admirable skill, to gratify the sense, and impart, as it were, a pride of place. A happy thought of the Bishop's, and worthy of his benevolent heart. To present to the view of a tender and trembling girl, just leaving the endearments of home, objects of attraction and beauty, instead of common and vulgar ones, is the sure way to allure her—to subdue her repinings, and to make her readily forget the past in the present. Such indeed is the fact. The inmates love the Hall, they linger around it, and leave with regret, even after education has been completed.

Within, comforts are dealt with no niggard's hand, cleanliness, delicacy, and propriety seem to pervade every where—quiet and order reign in every department; and an urbanity of manners on the part of Teachers, which must infallibly produce the most salutary effect on the feelings of those with whom their intercourse is so near and constant. One is struck as if by the appearance of a large Christian family, in which that finest, and among the earliest and most precious of religious lessons, "love one another," seems to have taken deep and abiding root: and is cherished as far, at least, as the imperfections of the humanity will allow.

In a place, the atmosphere of which is so pure, and the Director of which is an eminent and pious Prelate, it is difficult to be otherwise than good. Emphatically its faithful laborer in the vineyard of his Master, has himself with an energy to the work before him, withness of purpose, and an abnegation of all selfish indu which none but a zealous and sincere heart could practice daily toil—the nightly vigil—the overwhelming perplexities and anxieties of his station, quench not of his soul, nor make him flinch from that solemn duty of children, which he has avowed before God and man, valiant soldier he has planted his banner, and will stand at its foot. And may we not hope, that they will prove of so generous and self-sacrificing a friend.

Often has the writer of this witnessed the closing of the chapel, after the evening service: and a more impressive or touching one, may not be found in this country. Under the arched door is seen the venerable head of the figure of the Bishop, and while the organ pours forth—the young—the innocent—and beautiful, in one stream pass before him, and with uplifted face, and look, placing the hand in his, say good night. He said to himself, surely, these children must love me, and feel a wound, or a pang given to his heart, as often on their own father.

But, sir, I have already extended beyond all reason, and will draw to a conclusion.

The greatest of moral and dramatic poets has said:

"The evil that men do lives after them,
The good is oft interred with their bones."

However true this reproach may be to the ingrate world, in many instances, it will not hold here. The Bishop's good deeds will not be buried with him, but will have built his monument among the living. That leaves St. Mary's Hall, wise, virtuous, and active, will speak for him; and whenever he is summoned go down to his grave "unwept, unhonored, or unsung." These children, whom he has so loved and nurtured, he will have left to his country, as the precious labors, will go there to moisten it with their tears, it with their holiest aspirations.

Lines written immediately after leaving the "Chapel of the Holy Innocents," St. Mary's Hall, Burlington, N. J.

Yes! the Almighty must be present here,
To smile in love, upon a scene so fair!
Those light forms with their youthful graces;
The beauty of the uplifted faces.
Like gentle buds, by night winds shaken—
Their fresh pure hearts, to God awaken,
The perfume of innocence and prayer,
Is floating on the solemn air—
And that fine head, whose classic form,
Is met, the sacred mitre to adorn—
In clear relief from the glorious light,
Cast by that window richly light—
The eye whose eagle glance so clear:
Bespeaks a faith, devoid of fear;
All bold to stem the currents strong.
Which bear so many in their course along;
And yet, with softened light can bless,
Those trusted to his tenderness.
Paternal care—paternal love—
Stout gathering for the fold above.
Yes! stands he there—God's gifts are shed,
In fullest measure, on his noble head—
The work he has begun on earth,
Must yield rich harvest, for the heavenly birth.
Blessings will follow in his tread,
His name be rescued from the unhonored dead—
And on that awful day, when time is o'er:
While the loud Trump awakes both sea and shore,
Yes! on that day when all arise,
To meet their God—their Saviour in the skies—
He will be seen amid the glorious train,
With golden harp—and robe without a stain.

He that is washed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit.—John xiii. 10.

MR. EDITOR:—

I have said that my object in part in publishing the essay which appeared on the 13th of May, was to bring into notice this passage, a passage which in the baptismal discussions had been much neglected. Of the several writers that I have consulted, two only interpret it as I have done, viz: Bishop Seabury and the Rev. Mr. Chapin. Mr. C. says that there are several arguments in proof of his conclusions additional to those adduced by him, "but we have extended this examination so much beyond our original intention, that we shall barely enumerate them." He then states that he infers "that the quantity of water is not essential to the ordinance" of baptism for two reasons, the first of which is this: "Because baptism being symbolic of purification, the rule given by Christ to Peter, (John xiii.) He that was washed in part was clean every whit—is applicable." View, p. 82. If Mr. Chapin should ever follow the suggestion of Ozark, and present to the Church in a separate form that part of his book which treats of baptism, he ought in my humble judgment to give a more extended notice to this pregnant passage. That it demands something more than a passing observation, will appear from the following interpretations, by five interpreters, by Rev. Wm. Again: "There is a comparison in this (the 10th) verse. He who hath bathed himself is clean for the day, except his feet which would contract dust, and were usually washed after going out: and in the same manner the body or greater part of the disciples was pure; but Judas (or the feet) was not." Now in the first place, it is extremely difficult, according to this exegesis, to discern the consecutive character of the conversation. Next, while we admit that our Lord's intention in part was to teach a lesson of humility, it is hard to determine what connection subsists between the "comparison" and the "lesson," unless we also admit, that by humbly washing the feet of our master designed to show that Judas after being washed was as pure as the main body of the disciples. But even Unitarian logic would revolt at this admission. As to Bishop Hurd, not having access to his sermons, I know not his views except as they may be gathered from some imperfect extracts in D'Oyley and Mant's Family Bible. These do not prove him to be more "ingenious" than his censor. They rather indicate that he is more ingenious—Preaching for gain, forsooth! And how long is it since Unitarian ministers commenced preaching for nothing? If they ever in England preached without remuneration, we have certainly in this happy country an "Improved Version" of them. *Cælum et animam multam qui trans mare currunt.

In order to be "conclusive," it is right that I should here reply to an objection which may be founded on the clause, "And ye are clean, but not all." According to the more popular interpretation of the verse, it may be said, the meaning of this clause is obvious. According to that for which I contend, it is not so. But with due respect I maintain, 1st, that the more popular interpretation cannot be sustained except upon the Calvinistic hypothesis of the indefectibility of grace. If Peter previously to the supper had been so clean that he could not possibly fall into damning sins, then the point may be yielded. But did he not deny his Lord? And to deny Christ, is it not a damning sin? 2d, The meaning of the clause in question

* Wakefield says that Dr. George Campbell very properly understands βαπτισμός to signify "he who hath bathed himself," John xiii. 10. We may rest assured, however, that Dr. Campbell's understanding of the passage is not precisely that of Gilbert Wakefield. Something has been said about the difference between καὶ and καὶ; the present discussion cannot be affected by that difference.

will be plain enough if we reflect that our Lord's actions and sayings were not hurried. His discourse at the last supper was deliberate and considerably extended. It is not necessary, therefore, to suppose that what he said in the 10th verse before us, was uttered some time before he had finished washing the disciples' feet. As he was about to close, it was perfectly natural for him to declare the general truth, that he who is to be emblematically cleansed needs only to be washed in a part of his body, and then to assure the eleven for their encouragement, that they, having been washed, had part in their Messiah. Subsequently to this, he might with consistency have warned Peter of his imminent danger and said, "Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you (all,) that he may sift you as wheat; but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not."

History of the origin and progress of the Church in Wellsborough, Tioga County, Pa.*

The History of the Church in the various dioceses is a subject which is daily increasing in interest. And as we look back with earnest solicitude, making the most diligent research for every thing that will in the least throw light upon the labors of the early missionaries, their success, their discouragements, their failures, that we may learn to be patient while engaged in the work of the Lord; that we may become sensibly alive to the great goodness of God in enlarging and strengthening his fold; and while we bestow our sympathy upon the missionary whose remains have long since mouldered in the dust: while we cherish his memory as a part of the Church's rich inheritance; may the self-denying laborers, who year after year toil on in faith and poverty, surrounded by worldliness, fanaticism and error, may they be cheered and inspired to engage with renewed earnestness in the work before them, when they perceive that they will not be forgotten, and that the next generation will rise up to "bear their burdens."

That the history of the Church may be accurately written fifty or a hundred years hence, parish Records must be preserved with fidelity; and what would add materially to the interest of mere annals, a general review ought to be recorded every ten years respecting the progress, results, and condition of the Parish.

To this work I now give myself, and shall endeavor to be as brief as the facts and circumstances will admit; and as our mutual profit may seem to demand from the consideration of the past.

Ten years ago, my brethren, this village was destitute of a place of worship; and the people of any description of Gospel ministrations. Such a state of things led to the discussion in the street, and in one or two families, of the importance of procuring a minister, which resulted in the calling of a public meeting. At this meeting the condition in which they were placed was freely discussed, and when the question was raised to whom they should apply for a minister, opinions were found to be balanced between the Presbyterians and Episcopalians; to the latter a preference was decidedly given; and steps were immediately taken to obtain a clergyman.

James Lowrey and Joshua Sweet, Esqrs., were appointed a committee to carry out the wishes of the meeting.

Being ignorant of our diocesan boundaries, the first application, was made to the Rev. Richard Smith, then officiating at Elmira, who informed Mr. Sweet that they were not in the diocese in which he resided, and that they must apply to Bishop Onderdonk of Philadelphia. Accordingly he wrote to him. In this letter he says, "by the result of some singular circumstances we are left without a clergyman of any denomination. The word of God is not preached; and the ordinances of religion are not administered by any hands whatever. That we feel deep anxiety and solicitude under such a state of things cannot surprise you. Should this continue, the consequences are already told: the result cannot be doubtful. Indeed we now feel the sad and we fear lasting effects of an inefficient ministry, and an irregular administration of the word." This letter, containing much valuable information, was transmitted by the Bishop to the writer of this record, who was at that time a student in the New York Theological Seminary. He at once consented to enter upon this field shortly after his ordination, which was to take place in a few weeks. The Bishop wrote to this effect, and received the following reply, dated July 24th, 1838.

DEAR SIR—We have raised a subscription of about $250, and think it can be raised to $300. This we request you to offer the Rev. Mr. Breck, whom you named, if you think him adapted to our wants. Should he please the people, there will be no lack of means to reward his services; but if not, this will probably be the only effort, with any hope of success, we can make in years. If Mr. Breck declines this offer, we wish you to procure, if possible, some other man.

(Signed)

JAMES LOWREY, }
JOSHUA SWEET, } Com.

Bishop H. U. ONDERDONK, Phila.

To this is attached the following postscript.

P. S.—Mr. Breck had better bring with him, about two dozen copies of the Book of Common Prayer, as there are none here for sale, and very few in the possession of any body; some elegant and some of a cheaper kind would be best.

J. SWEET.

August 21st.—I entered this village with a letter of introduction to the above named committee. Notice having been given, the services of the Church were for the first time celebrated in Wellsborough, in the Court House, on the 26th, 10th Sunday after Trinity. They were well attended both morning and afternoon, and the responses were made by the few, who could obtain Prayer Books. On the 11th Sunday after Trinity, I was stopped at the door of the Court House by the Deputy Sheriff, who informed me, that religious services could not be held there. I therefore withdrew to the school-house now in the rear of the church, and there continued to officiate for a short time, until the upper part of the academy was duly prepared, with a vestry room, desks, seats, and a small organ, kindly sent for the use of the congregation by Levi Nichols, Esq. I now undertook the work of visiting the inhabitants of the village and immediate neighborhood, and what was my surprise to find that there was not one communicant to be found; and but very few religious people of any name. In the village there were but about four professing christians. The church labored under great disadvantages, from the fact that nearly all were ignorant of her primitive modes of worship; at the same time, however, there were advantages that counterbalanced this ignorance. There was a disposition to give the services of the Church a fair trial; and in the sectarian feeling that existed to a slight degree, there was not sufficient strength to produce an unfavorable reception. I take this occasion to state, as my conviction, that nine tenths of the objections to the worship of the Church, come from those who have been mere listeners in our congregations; who have no disposition to engage heartily with us in our prayers and praises. Many who bend the knee on other occasions of worship, and say "Amen" with earnest devotion, when we go among them, or they come among us, sit unmoved, making no response at the close of the most affecting petitions, as to the fitness of such persons to express an opinion respecting the devotional character of the Church service, I leave you to judge—objections to the doctrines of the Church are not so frequently met with, as objections to errors, which we never embraced—For instance, the denial of the corruption of the heart, and as a necessary consequence, the rejection of repentance and the renewal of the soul by the Holy Spirit, all of which, the Church has ever maintained, and fully sets forth on every occasion of public worship. How it is possible for persons to go away from our places of worship with such opposite impressions, can only be accounted for, on the ground of strong prejudices, or the common thoughtlessness with which thousands attend the worship of God.

We sometimes meet with memorable exceptions. Whilst holding service in the academy, a man about fifty-eight years of age, who lived some six miles from here, was induced through curiosity to attend. He heard so much from his neighbors that was derogatory to the character of the Church, that as a lover of truth he determined to see and hear for himself. As he was ascending the hill on which the academy is placed, he observed to a friend that he did not expect to derive much benefit from what he should hear. He had been educated among Presbyterians or Congregationalists in Massachusetts, and this was the first time that he had ever attended the services of the Church. He was struck with their christian character, and soon after obtained a Prayer Book, which he examined with great care, and in due time became one of the most devoted communicants of this congregation. He would ride or walk six miles in such weather as many in the village would think too boisterous to venture out in, at least on the Lord's Day. After an extremely painful illness, it pleased the Lord to take Simeon Houghton to his rest at the age of sixty-three. His memory I shall ever cherish with unmingled pleasure.

In the course of about two months after my arrival, October 20th, a meeting was called at the office of James Lowrey, Esq., where a Parish was organized by the adoption of the form of charter recommended by the Convention of this Diocese. At the same time and place, wardens and vestrymen were elected; their names are as follows: Benj. B. Smith, Levi J. Nichols, Otis L. Gibson, Joshua Sweet (now an Episcopal clergyman residing in Maryland,) James Lowrey and John L. Robinson, Esq. On application to the Legislature, we were incorporated under the style of "Rector, wardens and vestrymen of St. Paul's Church, Wellsboro." The charter is enrolled at Harrisburg in Charter Book, No. 6, page 500.

Having decided to build a church, subscription papers were opened November 11th, 13th and 19th, and in a short time the sum of $2445 was subscribed. The greatest liberality was exhibited, and although some were disposed to seek for aid abroad in the cities, yet on being urged to exert themselves, they gave up these thoughts, and such as supposed they could only afford to give 25, 50, 100, and 150 dollars, gave 50, 100, 150 and 200 dollars, and not a man can say this day, that he is any poorer for having thus bestowed a part of his substance.

During the winter preparations were made for building; on the 15th day of April 1839, the corner stone was laid, and on the 1st of December we occupied the church as our place of worship; having for more than a year assembled in the academy.

An opportunity did not present for its consecration until the 22nd of September 1841, when it was performed by Bishop H. U. Onderdonk. The whole cost of the church was about $3000. The organ, blinds, chairs, &c. cost $400. At intervals during the past nine years, we have expended about $665, in the erection of galleries, in the purchase of a bell, weighing 612 lbs., and in painting and repairing, in all $4065 have been expended in furnishing, improving and completing the church edifice. Two hundred and twenty dollars of this sum, were obtained abroad through the liberality of kind friends: $334 from the "sewing circle" connected with the Parish. Year after year, the ladies have persevered in this work, having the good of the church ever at heart. I earnestly commend the "Ladies' Circle of Industry" to the continued patronage of the congregation. I am happy to be able to state that the church is entirely free from debt. The names of the present vestrymen are as follows:—

Let what has been accomplished, stir you on to other works of importance, connected with the parish. Sheds for carriages are much needed for the benefit of all who ride; a Sunday school room would be a very great advantage to the parish in many respects, and the possession of a Rectory, on the ground so liberally provided by the late Judge Merriis, (which is worth at least $300,) would give a finish to your undertakings, that would add much to the comfort of the Rector, and the permanent establishment of the services of the church. Collections have been made in the church to the amount of about $400; these have increased from year to year, so that where formerly we raised $10, we now raise $20 and $30. I cannot in justice pass by the aid which this parish has received from the Missionary Society of the Diocese. Unless "the Society for the advancement of Christianity in Pennsylvania" had aided us, it would have been extremely difficult, for your minister to have been sustained. To this society then, our whole county owes much as well as the two counties adjoining us on the west. I most sincerely hope that whenever the claims of this society are presented, you will "freely give," for you have "freely received."

The increase in the number of communicants has not been as rapid as we could wish, at the same time, it has been regular and permanent; the removals to distant parts of the country, and the diminution caused by death, have never at any time reduced our numbers to what they were in any previous year. The present number of communicants is sixty-five, and there are several who have been confirmed, who will soon embrace an opportunity to commune. On turning to the "Record" I find that I have baptized sixty-four adults, and 133 infants; that there have been 83 confirmed by Bishop H. U. Onderdonk and Bishop Potter. I have officiated at 73 burials, and solemnized 27 marriages. It is an important part of the history of this parish, to know something respecting the religious influences that formerly, in various places, surrounded those who have attached themselves to the church. After a careful examination I find that twelve may be said to have come from the Church; eight from the Methodists; fifteen from the Quakers; thirty-one from the Presbyterians; ten from the Congregationalists; eight from the Baptists; and six from the Unitarian Baptists, in all ninety.

I have lived long enough with you, my brethren, to see many of the members of the Sunday school grow up, and adorn the christian path. So important have I viewed the work of laboring to train up the Lambs of the flock, "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," that I have almost invariably taken charge of the school in person. At present, there are three schools in connection with the parish, numbering 150 scholars; two of these are out of the village. On each Lord's Day I devote three hours to two of the schools. I venture to predict that from the Sunday schools alone, by the blessing of God, the record of the next ten years will be double the present number of communicants. I appeal to parents and sponsors to co-operate in this good work, by doing all in their power to aid and influence the young to walk in the christian's path. Then will they grow up in the practice of true religion, and the exercise of christian faith.

Before drawing my remarks to a close, I venture to speak on a subject that I would greatly prefer to pass by, if I did not feel impelled by a sense of duty.

I have been with you for ten years, probably the best ten years of my life, as respects health and strength, and in this time I have not laid up a single farthing, for the support of my family, in case of my death, or my being disabled by sickness. Young men who came into the village at the same time with myself, are in the possession of property of considerable value, and the most of you, who were here in previous years, have continued to increase your goods. The support you have given me has been very liberal compared with other parishes, there being but few out of the large towns which give as much. Many in this parish, with but half the means, give three times as much as many gave in the old parish in which I was born.

I suggest, whether it would not be just, if at the expiration of every five years, you should set apart a certain portion of your profits to be presented to your minister, by the vestry, for the benefit of his family!

In some Church institutions every tenth scholar is taken from the children of the clergy, and educated free of charge. In some dioceses, a fund is raised to aid disabled clergymen, and also for the assistance of the widows and children of such as are deceased. These institutions are all very excellent, and the liberality of the heads of schools is highly commendable, but the debt justly rests upon those among whom the clergy minister. There is nothing to prevent this parish giving at least $500, at the end of every five years, for this object; how small would be this amount subtracted from the profits of the whole congregation, for this length of time. These remarks are not made in a complaining spirit, but with the hope of inducing you to realize a part of your stewardship, which you may have forgotten. It is not so much with the hope of our becoming richer, that I have made this suggestion, for if it be the will of the Church that her ministers shall live on in poverty without laying by any thing for the future, we are content, and shall not cease to labor in the word, and with our hands. But it is that you may be largely blessed of God, for providing food and raiment and the means of education, for the families of those who have been "over you in the Lord." Every diocese should make a similar provision according to their ability for their several Bishops.

Lest it should be supposed that I am addressing you on this point, with an eye to a personal application, I take this occasion to say, that the only pecuniary reward, that I ask for my services (now that I am on the eve of my departure) above what I have received is, that you undertake with all cheerfulness the building of a Rectory, and thus bestow upon the church a small portion of the goods with which the Lord has blessed you. You will not doubt my sincerity in this matter, when you remember how much time I spent to effect this object, and that I offered to give twice as much as any other person towards such a building, without any regard to the length of time I might remain with you.

My brethren, there is another record of this parish that is truly known to no other than the great God, a record of the hearts of all, both the living and the dead—a record of the manner in which you have improved all the christian privileges with which you have been surrounded. On the one hand there is plainly brought to view the opposition your hearts have offered to the belief of christian doctrines, and the practice of of christian duties the opposition you have offered to the influence of the Holy Spirit. On the other hand, there is the child-like trust in the Lord Jesus, and the faithful conformity to the Divine Will; there is seen the faith and patience of the poor, the sick, and the afflicted, who looked unto Jesus as their example and their Redeemer. One part is fearful to look upon, the other fills our heart with joy. Before ten more short years run their course, some of us will be called upon to consider this record. The man of the world will examine it with the most intense interest; and perhaps then for the first time he will know himself; then for the first time will he realize the wretched opposition of his heart to the Divine law, and the Divine mercy. Let us then strive to improve the present time by serving the Lord with all faithfulness, that we may be prepared when he shall call us from these earthly scenes. Many who worshipped with us in former years, have gone hence, and now await their final account. My prayer to God is that you may continue to increase in faith, holiness and charity; in the most scrupulous obedience to every command, and in the love of sound doctrine, so that at the last you may attain unto the Heavenly Kingdom, through the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit, and the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

AN UNJUST CHARGE.—We have read with surprise and regret, the following sweeping declaration of hostility in "the English Churchman," which came by the last steamer. With the means of information possessed by this Journal, we may well wonder that its columns should contain such a paragraph as this.

"The rebellion in Ireland is at an end for the present. Several American sympathizers have been seized there, and the English Government ought to know that many of these mischief-makers are in Canada. In the United States, within the last few years, there has been a palpable increase of jealousy and dislike to England and every thing British, which exhibits itself in the bitterest and most uncompromising spirit in all their journals, and in the sayings and doings of all their public men. These symptoms of hostility ought to be guarded against."

Now, in plain English, we must say that the above statement is untrue. Who, we beg leave to ask "the English Churchman," are these "several American sympathizers" said to "have been seized there?" Are they not all originally British subjects? Is it right or just to call men, who have left their own country in disgust, and have returned at the first chance of showing their inbred hostility to the Government under which they were born; is it even true to call these "American sympathizers?"

And if there is "in the United States within the last few years a palpable increase of jealousy to England," what is the chief cause of this? Is it not to be found in the fact, that Great Britain is disgorging upon us hordes of her own discontented subjects, who bring with them deadly feelings of hostility as infectious as the fever plague which follows the famishing emigrant? "But," it may be said, "public meetings have been held in America and bitter feelings of hostility expressed which have found voice also in American Journals!" Well, what does this prove? Have not the same things happened in every town and city in Great Britain? And have not meetings and Journals of their own, expressed feelings, compared with which, the sentiments of "American sympathizers" are mild and friendly? Why, the argument of "the English Churchman" proves that Great Britain has become her own enemy, and that even in her own bosom, "there, has been a palpable increase of jealousy and dislike to England and every thing British."

We cannot imagine how an intelligent, well informed, and high-minded Journalist can deliberately say that "in the United States" this "jealousy and dislike to England and every thing British exhibits itself in all their Journals and in the sayings and doings of all their public men." Of this statement, we can only say again, in plain Saxon, it is not true.

In the first place, it is not true of all our journals. "The English Churchman" must know it is not true of our Church Journals. That paper exchanges with "the New York Churchman," and with "the Banner of the Cross," and no evidence can be shown of the condemned feeling of hostility in either of these Church Journals. On the contrary there has ever been shown the very opposite of this feeling, and we can say the same of all our Church Journals. In one or more late numbers of the "Banner," this honest feeling of friendliness was manifested, and an humble effort made to extend and strengthen it. We also quoted similar expressions from other Church papers. Had there prevailed in this country, "the jealousy and dislike" spoken of, these articles would have called forth expressions of condemnation from correspondents. If our editorials are very much disapproved of, we are sure to know it.

The charge of "the English Churchman" is not true of all of our secular journals. There are some American journals which follow "haud passibus aequis," some English journals in their dislike of British Institutions, exhibiting "the bitterest and most uncompromising spirit." But there are many noble exceptions, there are many influenced by too large and liberal a spirit to condemn all that is not American, who cannot see any good out of the United States.

Again, the charge of "the English Churchman," is not true of all our public men. The speech of Mr. Bancroft, the American Minister, at the Royal Agricultural dinner, which we quoted from the English Church papers, of itself, disproves this. And it cannot be said that Mr. Bancroft spoke merely as an individual. He spoke as the Representative of the United States. He uttered sentiments for which he knew he must answer before the American public. And we have not heard the individual, nor seen the Journal, by whom he has been condemned. We have, it is true "public men" who follow many "public men" of England in that jealous dislike which exhibits an uncompromising spirit of bitterness against the Institutions of Great Britain. But the sweeping accusation of "the English Churchman" is no more true of all our public men, than it is true of "all their public men."

Indeed, we speak as the result of our own observation gathered from two visits to Great Britain, we feel sure there is a more liberal feeling, generally prevailing, in America towards England, than exists in that country towards America. We are sorry to see such Journals, as "the English Churchman," lending their powerful aid to increase this bitter feeling. We feel it to be the duty of our Church papers, at least, to encourage by every means in their power, that mutual goodwill which should be reciprocated by countries so closely united, with so many ties to bind them together, as Great Britain and America.

We hope if these remarks should meet the notice of the Editor of "the English Churchman," he will be moved by the demands of justice and of truth, to correct his hasty and injurious charge against all the journals and all the public men in the United States.

We have always been ready to employ the columns of the Banner in making known the wants of the Church, and in setting forth cases of need which appeal to the charitable. We are happy to say that these appeals have never been entirely in vain. Some kind responsive voice has always answered our requests. We consider it a great use of our religious journals thus to excite the charitable feelings of the members of the Church and call them into exercise.

The case which is presented in the following communication, we think our charitable readers will regard as peculiarly a strong one. It is of vast importance to us, in a political view merely, that the citizens of Texas, now a portion of our Union, should be brought under the best moral and religious influence. Such an influence we are bound to esteem that of the Church whereof we are members. It is moreover of great moment that we should not leave so large a portion of our country to be preoccupied. This has been too often the practical error of Churchmen, and how small a foothold has our Church now in Texas, while we are assured Romanism and other Sectarianism are extending their dominion.

We are called upon then as citizens, and as Churchmen, to answer at once the following appeal. Let the response be prompt, cheerful and liberal. Contributions for this good object may be forwarded and directed to Mr. S. Cox, office of "the Banner of the Cross," and they will be acknowledged in our paper.

For the Banner of the Cross.

The Church in Texas.

REV. MR. EDITOR:—

I have lately received a letter from a Missionary in Texas, giving some information as to the condition and wants of the Church in that part of the country, which may prove interesting to your readers, and may induce them to lend their aid in a good work. The letter is from the Rev. Mr. Sansom, who has lately gone to San Augustine, and is now very anxious to build a Church there. He thus writes: "If you could furnish us with a plan for a Church that would accommodate some 300 persons you would greatly oblige us. I think it highly important for this Church to be built upon correct principles, as it will be the first Church in Eastern Texas, and will be a model for those which will be erected hereafter. The population of Eastern Texas is estimated to be 55,000; to meet the spiritual necessities of this population, we have not a single Church, and your humble servant has to stand up solitary and alone as the representative of that Church which contends 'earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints.'" "The nearest Church in Texas I believe is at Houston, a distance of 200 miles. There is a Church at Natchitoches in Louisiana, which is somewhat nearer, but at present the parish is destitute of the services of a Clergyman. Perhaps you may be aware that the white population of San Augustine is in the neighborhood of 600. Emigrating principally from the Carolinas and other Southern States, and many of them being the descendants of wealthy planters, they are men who have received a liberal education, and their intelligence generally, perhaps could not be equalled, certainly not surpassed, by that of the inhabitants of any interior town in the northern States. We can boast of having one jail, one College, one female Academy, and one Church (Methodist), dilapidated frame building, which a traveller would be inclined to take for a district school. There is an evident disposition 'on the part of the inhabitants 'to assist' in building a Church,' but to complete one ourselves I am afraid is impossible from several considerations. One is, the citizens generally are not wealthy; another, they have been called upon so frequently to subscribe for the College and Seminary and Methodist Church, and have paid in large amounts, which have never been satisfactorily accounted for. Hitherto Methodism has taken the lead in this place! Fanaticism, rank and wild, has been held up as genuine piety, and a religion that had no noise in it, no playing upon the passions, no excitement, was no religion at all. Now, coming in, amidst such a state of things, with a calm and sober religion which addresses itself to the heart and to the judgment, and with our set forms of prayer, solemn and impressive as they are, but which was a novel mode of worshipping God to many of them, it was not to be expected that they should receive us with open arms and bid us God speed; but still, the most intelligent, and a majority of the most respectable people in the town, have come forward and subscribed liberally towards building a Church, and I am thankful to say, our prospects are very encouraging; we have been able to commence with and carry out true church principles, and from the steady attendance, the earnest attention, and the hearty responses in our solemn services, I am persuaded there is a growing interest in favor of the Church."

A gentleman and lady in tolerable easy circumstances, and at the head of a large and respectable family, who had been prominent members of the Methodist society, sent for me the other evening; it was to tell me that they had read our tracts, that they had attended our worship, that they saw a beauty in our Liturgy, in requiring the congregation to unite in the devotions, and they believed it would be of incalculable benefit to the rising generation; moreover that they were convinced of the evil nature of schism, and wished to be admitted into the bosom of the Church. Another wealthy and influential gentleman met me this morning and expressed himself in a similar manner. I make it my plan to go round "from house to house" and enforce in private what I circulate from the desk, and I can discover a steady growing disposition in favor of the Church. Let us have a Church properly built, and constant service, and I have no doubt but in a short time, by far the greater part of this community will be united with that Church which is "built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone." Mr. S. goes on to say that they have hitherto been permitted to meet in the Methodist house, but that he had received some intimation that they would not long be allowed this privilege, and that then their only place for holding service would be "a miserable Court-house." "To convince you that we are trying to help ourselves, my Vestry met to-day and appointed two of their number to go through the town and surrounding country for the purpose of raising funds, and to be ready to report in two weeks."

I think, Rev. Mr. Editor, that this letter can scarcely fail to make us feel an interest in the success of this clergyman and his people, thus striving to erect an edifice in which the services of the Church may be properly performed. The Church once established there on the right footing, will grow with the increase of population, and the rising generation will look back with grateful hearts to those who provided them the means of entrance into the true fold, and gave them the opportunity of learning the way to everlasting life.

I may add that the plan of a Church, prepared by Mr. Wills, the Architect, has been forwarded to San Augustine for the approval of the Rector and his Vestry. It is of wood, consisting of a chancel, nave, and South tower, with accommodation for about 250 persons, and is estimated to cost exclusive of the tower and spire, which may be added at some future time, the very moderate sum of $1500. Of this sum, probably at least one third will be contributed by the congregation themselves, and for the remainder they look with earnest hope to their brethren at the North. Will not Churchmen answer the request, and according to their ability, either cast in of their abundance, or give their mite to God's treasury.

We publish the following correspondence by request.

September 5th, 1848.

To the Wardens and Vestry of St. David's Church, Manayunk.

Gentlemen:—After mature and prayerful consideration I have concluded to sever my present connection, and herewith present to you my resignation of this Parish.

It is now nearly five years since I came among you in pursuance, as I was informed, of a unanimous call of the vestry, and immediately entered upon the duties to which I had been invited. The longest period that I have been absent from the Parish since that time was a single week, and that absence was occasioned by sickness. Thankfully and contentedly I have continued to labour for your spiritual welfare, and that of my Parochial charge, and it gives me pleasure in view of my final separation to be able to say, that, with scarcely an exception I have found a welcome to every heart, and a home in every house.

In deciding to dissolve the tie which has so happily existed since my first settlement among you, I beg to assure you I have not been influenced by any considerations of self, or any diminution of interest in the church and congregation of St. David's, or the want of confidence in any of its members. In parting with the congregation of Christ's flock here I feel happy in the assurance that I have no divisions to heal, no heart-burnings to remove, no injuries of which to complain.—Peace and harmony rest upon the church. I have witnessed with great satisfaction its continued and increasing prosperity; for the further continuance of which I shall not cease to offer supplications and prayers. Be assured that a separation from it will not be made without a painful sacrifice of feeling:—And if I have wronged any one, by word or deed, I am sure they will not aggravate the pain of this parting hour by refusing me their forgiveness.

It is my wish that my resignation be accepted to take effect on the 1st day of November next, on which day the current year will close. In expressing this wish permit me to say I am influenced by convictions of duty under the plain leadings of Divine Providence.

And now beloved Brethren and members of the Vestry, accept of my resignation herewith tendered, and dismiss me with such marks of confidence and affection as your feelings and a sense of duty will permit; and accept the assurance of my earnest prayers that the blessing of Almighty God may rest upon each of you and your families, and direct you in the choice of another Rector; one who may be a blessing to the people whose charge I now resign; be wise in winning souls to Christ, and abundantly successful in building up our beloved Zion.

Believe me, my respected friends,

Faithfully and affectionately,

Your servant in the gospel.

AZARIAH PRIOR.

To Messrs J. Ripka, Sen. } Vestry of St. David's Samuel Wagner, &c. &c. } Church, Manayunk.

In accepting the resignation of our beloved Rector, the Vestry of St. David's deem it a duty, which they owe alike to him who has for so long a period watched over the spiritual welfare of this Parish, and to the Congregation which they have the honor to represent, to express, on this, it may be last occasion which may be offered, their esteem for the many virtues and valuable services of their spiritual adviser: Be it therefore Resolved, That in receiving the resignation of the Rev. A. Prior as Rector of St. David's Church, the Vestry are only complying with a request urged by that gentleman, who leaves the charge of St. David's with the confidence and esteem of all.

Resolved, That we have long witnessed, and cannot now omit to express, that the first and most important requisite, in a minister of Christ, is to be found in the conduct of Mr. P.—that of bearing the "Olive branch of Peace"—this he brought and this he carries away.

Resolved, That our best wishes are for the future prosperity and happiness of himself and family, and hope that his labours in the field upon which he will shortly enter, may be equally successful with those in the one which he relinquishes.

Resolved, That the Secretary be, and is hereby requested to forward to Mr. Prior a copy of the foregoing proceedings.

W. P. HODGSON, Secretary, &c.

Passed by Vestry of St. David's,

Sept. 6th, 1848.

The following is an authentic account of the design and plan of the GEN. CLARK MISSION in the Diocese of Missouri.

The design of the Mission under the direction of the Bishop of Missouri, is the religious education of youth. It will give to its pupils a thorough intellectual training, while that intellectual training will be modified and shaped, according to the principles of our holy religion, as now held and taught in the Catholic Church—as they are now held and taught in the creeds, formularies and ritual of the Protestant Episcopal Church in these United States. It is farther designed that it shall afford to the community in the midst of which it is situated, the ministrations of the service, worship and sacraments of the Church; that it shall preach the gospel to the poor, instruct the ignorant, relieve the distressed; that in short it shall do good to all who shall come within the sphere of its ministrations.

PLAN.

1st. The Rector will be a Presbyter of the Church, acting at all times under the immediate direction of the Bishop of Missouri. He will be assisted by competent instructors in carrying out the design of the system of education that is undertaken.

2d. The plan of instruction embraces a course of collegiate education, together with such a system of discipline as is suitable to prepare young men, physically, intellectually and as christians, for that station of life to which it shall please God to call them.

3d. All admissions will be by direction of the Bishop, and it is proposed to make the privileges of the school accessible to the poor as well as the rich.

4th. It will embrace the theological education and discipline of young men who are graduates of Colleges and others desirous of devoting themselves to the service of the Church as Priests, Deacons, teachers and catechists.

MISSIONARY MEETING.—A public meeting will be held at St. Andrew's Church, on Monday evening the 18th inst., commencing at half past seven o'clock. Addresses on the subject of Foreign Missions will be delivered by the missionaries, who are on the eve of their departure for Africa, and by several of the Rectors of the churches in this city. The friends of missions are cordially invited to attend. A collection will be made for the benefit of the African mission.

ORDINATION OF MISSIONARIES.—There will be an ordination held at St. Paul's Church on Sunday morning, the 17th inst., on which occasion the Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter will admit to the Order of Priesthood, the Rev. Messrs. Hoffman and Rambo, who are about to depart for Cape Palmas, W. Africa, their chosen field of missionary labour, services to commence at half-past ten o'clock.

We take the following favorable account of Dr. Rudd's health from "the Gospel Messenger." It will be read with interest and thankfulness by his many friends.

THE EDITOR'S HEALTH.—Many friends and readers will no doubt learn with gratification, that the Editor's health is considered by his medical advisers and other friends around him, as decidedly improving. But from the severity of the attack, its prostrating character, its long continuance, and consequent debility, it must necessarily be some time yet before he can safely attempt moving homeward. This will be attempted as soon as it shall be deemed prudent to do so. In the meantime he trusts that all who are interested in his welfare, and the usefulness of his work, will remember him in their prayers, that a merciful Father will continue to bless the means employed for his full restoration to his strength, his home and his duties.

NOTE.—The above is from his own pen.

DEFERRED ARTICLE.—The remainder of our extracts from Dr. Nevin's Discourse with our remarks, have been crowded out this week. They shall appear in the next Banner.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT.—We have received and forwarded to Mr. Breck, $10 for Nashotah from "a Marylander." Such gifts are undoubted evidences of "the true Catholic" feeling.

Academy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the City of Philadelphia.

This Institution, established in 1785 under the auspices of the late Bishop White, and lately revived under those of Bishop Potter as a Classical and English Academy, has been removed to the spacious four-story building on the north side of Market Street, the second house above Ninth.

It is under the immediate charge of the Rev. G. EMLÉN HARE, D. D., who is assisted by four well qualified masters. A Board of Trustees, sixteen in number, (four of whom are elected annually, the Bishop of the Diocese being President,) exercise a careful supervision over the interests of the Institution, and the Bishop, (who is also Chairman of the Executive Committee,) frequently inspects the school.

The pupils are conducted through a thorough course of Classical and Elementary Instruction, and are prepared for the junior class of colleges, for the counting room, or for professional study. To such as have the ministry in view, those branches of learning are imparted, which the Canons of the Church require as preliminary to entrance upon a course of Theological study. The Bible and the Church Catechism make prominent parts of the studies of all the pupils. No pains are spared, either in the discipline or in the instruction of the Academy, to lay for its pupils the foundation of an upright, manly and religious character.

A considerable proportion of the permanent revenue of the Institution, is applied to the education (free of charge) of such youths as give promise of merit. For the benefit of this provision, application must be made in writing to G. M. Wharton, Esquire, No. 13 Prune Street.

The terms of admission are $60 per annum, one-half payable on the first school-day of each half-year. The hours of attendance are from 9 o'clock A. M. to 2 o'clock, P. M. The vacations, about eight weeks at Midsummer, a week at Christmas, and a week at Easter. Applicants for admission must be not less than nine years of age, and must be able to read, write and cipher.

In addition to the yard attached to the building, a spacious room has been furnished with gymnastic implements for the use of the pupils in the daily interval for relaxation.

The Academy will provide instruction in modern languages for such pupils as may desire it, at extra times, and at extra charges. With this exception, there are no charges additional to the sum of $60 mentioned above. Drawing, vocal music, and fuel are included in the one price named.

MR. EDITOR:—

Will you permit me to invite the attention of those interested in it, to the advertisement for a Female Teacher, on the last page of your paper.

The situation is in one of the most important Parishes in this Diocese, the Rector of which wishes to establish schools for the proper training and instruction of all the children belonging to it.

A suitably qualified Teacher, whose "heart is in the matter," may make it a place of eminent usefulness to herself as well as to others.

She will have a most desirable home, with a compensation more than adequate to procure all the temporal comforts which a person of becoming moderation would desire.

Altogether, it seems to the writer of this note, to combine advantages both spiritual and temporal, which seldom offer.

THE CHURCH ALMANAC FOR THE YEAR OF OUR LORD 1849.—New York: The Protestant Episcopal Tract Society, 20 John Street.

This valuable and excellent publication seems to have been prepared with great care. We know it has been superintended by one well qualified to discharge the duty. Besides the usual Calendar, which contains the Lessons for every day in the year, this almanac contains accounts of the "succession of Bishops in the American Church," of the General and Diocesan Institutions of the Church in the United States, and of the Bishops in the Reformed Branches of the Church. To this is added a list of the Clergy, containing in alphabetical order the names of all the Presbyters and Deacons of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

It is published in a very neat and convenient form, and the title page is adorned with a picture of the Chapel of the Holy Innocents, Burlington, N. J.

THE AMERICAN QUARTERLY REGISTER AND MAGAZINE.—Conducted by James Stryker. September 1848. Vol. I: No. II. Philadelphia, E. C. Biddle, No. 6 South Fifth St.

The second number of this Journal fulfils the favorable opinion expressed of the first number. We have not room to give the table of contents, or it would show how much useful information may be found in its pages. If we were disposed to criticise any part of the book, it would be that headed "Religious Intelligence." The information is too meagre and partial and hardly in keeping with other parts of the work.

EVIDENCES OF NATURAL AND REVEALED RELIGION: ALSO THE DOCTRINES AND INSTITUTIONS OF CHRISTIANITY.—With questions for use in Bible Classes, in Parochial, Family, Sunday, and other Schools. By the author of "Reasons why I am a Churchman."

New York General Protestant Episcopal S. S. Union. Depository 20 John St.

We have examined this book as requested, and we decidedly think that for those who wish to introduce the subject treated of to the notice of the young, this is an excellent and useful book, one of the very best of its class. We particularly like the concluding part of the book on the Institutions of Christianity. The important subject is treated in the manner we might have expected from the author of "Reasons why I am a Churchman." We cannot do the work better justice than by giving the own author's account of it in the preface.

"THE present work is offered to the public in the belief, that among the numerous treatises extant on the Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion, there is not one which answers all the purposes of a book for general reading and for instruction, on this most important subject, in our parochial, Sunday and other schools. To provide such a book has been the object in preparing the following pages. The author has aimed, where so much might be said, at comprehensiveness, brevity and perspicuity. The testimony of the Church, as "the pillar and ground of the truth," will be found running through the chain of evidence. The objective Doctrines and Institutions of Christianity, in the concluding chapters, will not, it is hoped, be found out of place at the present day.

In using the work as a book of instruction, much must be left to the living teacher. A few leading questions are appended to each page; the faithful teacher, however, will not confine his attention to these, but will see to it that the pupil is thoroughly acquainted with the subject examined. Particular care should be taken not to hurry forward too rapidly. A few pages will be sufficient for a single lesson, except in reviews, which should be frequent, repeated and thorough.

Should the present volume shield any of the young from the enticements and the doom of the skeptic, or should it, in a single instance, lead to a more intelligent, ennobling service of the ONE AND ONLY TRUE GOD, in the way of His appointment, many an hour of arduous, pleasing labor will not have been spent in vain."

Virtue is so delightful, that men have found it their interest to cultivate manners which are in fact the appearance of certain virtues; and now we love the sign better than the thing signified, and prefer manners without virtue, to virtue without manners.—Sidney Smith.

Obituary.

DIED, on Sunday, the 10th inst., at the residence of his nephew Mr. William Pu ves, Dr. WILLIAM COLESBERRY, in the 64th year of his age.

It is with feelings of deep regret that we record the death of this amiable and excellent individual, for few among men have been endowed with equal gentleness and benignity of character, and fewer still have led a life at once so useful, innocent, and unobtrusive. Having resided many years abroad, he was comparatively little known in this country beyond the circle of his immediate family and friends; but to them he was endeared by qualities which will long cause them to cherish his memory with mingled emotions of sorrow and admiration. Singularly mild and affectionate in his disposition, polite and courteous in manner, considerate and unselfish in all his conduct, he entered "full of love and sweet humanity" upon his mission of good to man; and everywhere, at home or in the land of his adoption, secured the respect and esteem of all who knew him. Having made a voyage to Monte Video in 1812, his return was prevented by the war between Great Britain and America; and after spending a short time in the city of Buenos Ayres, which he was compelled to leave from the unfriendliness of its climate to an asthmatic complaint to which he was subject, he found a more salubrious and congenial residence in Mendoza, a town situated on the eastern declivity of the Andes. Here, among the gentle inhabitants of the South,—the first American physician who ever settled in that country,—he devoted himself to the practice of his profession; and by his uniformly upright and honorable deportment so won upon their confidence and affection as to conciliate for his countrymen a portion of the respect with which he was himself regarded. Among other improvements he introduced into that region, where Bronchocele extensively prevails, the use of Iodine as a remedy in stromous diseases; and the writer of this brief notice was informed many years ago by the late Mr. Forbes, then Charge d'Affaires of the United States at Buenos Ayres, a gentleman whose position furnished him with ample means for forming a correct opinion, that he had done more than any other person there to give estimation to the character of the North Americans. By General San Martin, the Liberator of Chili, he was held in high regard, and was offered by him the situation of Surgeon-General of the army; an offer which he declined with all the opportunities of enrichment it presented, preferring the quietness of private life to the scenes of strife and carnage in which he would have been called to bear so painful and responsible a part. He assisted however, in organizing the medical department of the army, and having accompanied its commander some distance on his perilous journey, left him and returned to Mendoza. His influence with that able and sagacious leader was unbounded, and was ever employed on the side of mercy and humanity. On one occasion it was signally displayed in behalf of two of his countrymen, who, being found in arms against the patriots, had been condemned to death, and were awaiting in prison the execution of their cruel sentence. Dr. Colesberry interposed his mediation, their lives were spared at his request, and he had the pleasure—to him an exquisite one—of restoring them to liberty.

Visiting his native country after the lapse of many years, he returned again after a short absence to Chili, and engaged with varied success in some mercantile and mining operations in Valparaiso and Coquimbo. Having thus acquired a comfortable independence he took a final farewell of the South, and for eight or nine years resided chiefly in Philadelphia and Wilmington; employing his retirement, as he had done his more active life, in offices of kindness and benevolence. Not long after his return he became a communicant of the Episcopal Church, of which his ancestors were members, and his life and conversation were such as eminently adorned the profession he made. His health, always feeble and latterly much impaired, became still more seriously undermined in the Spring of the present year. His last walk was to church in the month of May, in order to partake of the Holy communion, and on the Sunday preceding his death it was administered to him in his apartment. His approaching departure had long been foreseen; it was contemplated with perfect resignation; and his life, more particularly its concluding portion, was one continued act of preparation for it. It was the privilege of the writer to soothe his last moments and mitigate those evils which he could not cure, and never has he witnessed a more beautiful illustration of the truth that,

"Jesus can make a dying bed Feel soft as downy pillows are."

"Why should you wish me to recover," he remarked to a relative who attended with unwearied assiduity upon him, "when in my present freedom from suffering I should die so calmly and peacefully?" On inquiring how he felt, a short time before his death, "O, perfectly happy," he replied with almost inarticulate voice; and his half intelligible expressions subsequently, showed that he was holding sweet communion with his God and SAVIOUR. Several of the prayers in the office for the visitation of the sick were offered by his bed-side, and though the power of utterance was denied, his manner gave evident tokens of the satisfaction which they imparted. A few minutes afterwards he ceased to exist upon earth, more tranquilly even than if he had been taking rest in sleep. Well might the spectators of this impressive scene take up the language of the erring prophet, and with individual appropriation, exclaim, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!"

"Cheap Churches."

So extended and progressive seems the taste for what are aptly styled "cheap churches" that the present would appear no untimely moment, and this no unfitting place to offer a few plain reasons in opposition to the system—one that has not only no warrant of scripture, nor sanction of primitive days—days of pure devotion and burning zeal; but is equally opposed to reason and true economy—briefly to take these objections in their respective order. I imagine 'twould be difficult to show from holy scripture, when and where God hath expressed that He will accept a cheaper offering, save only when a better cannot be given. Have we not in God's holy word His chidings to His chosen people, for permitting the beauty of His house to decay? Was not the heaven stayed from her dew, and the earth from her fruit, for this neglect? And it would appear no very ingenious or subtle deduction that would place us in the same condemnation, when instead of temples something fitting even for His presence, we allow their beauty to waste away, and adopt the style of the present unsightly structures, remarkable only for their meagreness and unfitness; as places for His dedication—as worthy to be consecrated to His glory. Alas, "who is left among you that saw this house in her first glory, and how do ye see it now, is it not in your eyes in comparison as nothing?" Who can now exclaim, "Lord I have loved the beauty of thine house, and the place where thine honor dwelleth." Does it show no contempt of God, to erect costly edifices for our use, and cheap ones for His service?
